I have now to consider what would be the due date under this contract according to this finding. The plaintiffs were the Banians of the Bombay Company, an importing firm whose goods were the subject matter of this contract, both of which facts were known to the defendants. The contract in suit contains the words "godown due 90 days from 29th July, allowance and all other conditions are according to the outside (contract) (i. e, contract with European firm); interest and cooly charges are according to the inside customs (i.e,, the customs prevailing amongst the Indian merchants)". The words "all other conditions" must refer to something not specifically mentioned, but as regards the application of an "inside custom" there are no such general words. The defendant, when he received the letter of the plaintiff firm dated the 28th October, proceeded, as I have already found, to alter the date to make it appear that it was subsequent to his own letter. This is strong evidence that he was well aware that the 28th was the due date. All these circumstances in my opinion, show that the contract was entered into on the basis of the custom under which, if the due date falls on a Sunday, the goods should be delivered on the following day. I find, therefore, that Monday, the 28th October, was the due date for delivery under the contract. I also find that the plaintiff was ready and willing to deliver on the due date and as the market rate on the due date has not been challenged, there will be judgment for the plaintiff for Rs. 24,272 3-9 with costs on scale No. 2, including reserved costs (if any)—interest on decree at 6 per cent. The decree will not be drawn up until the order for amendment has been completed and the plaint amended."

JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, ACTG., C. J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Buckland in a suit for damages for breach of a contract for the sale of goods. The terms of the written agreement between the parties made on the 9th August 1918 were as follows:

"This is written to Bhai Hurnundroyjee Fulchand by Kasiram Pania with their compliments. Further, we have bought from you 45 bales, of Grey Shirtings No. B5-456 15 15 of Mahadeo Company, at Rs. 26-8 annas, ready goods; godwn due 90 days from the 29th July; allowance and all conditions are according to the outside (contract) (that is, contract with European firm), interest and cooly charges are according to the inside customs (i.e., the customs prevailing amongst the Indian merchants). Broker Meghrajee Ramkumar Serowgee."

The case for the plaintiffs is that as the due date of delivery, namely, the 27th October 1918 (the ninetieth day from the 29th July 1918), was a Sunday, the contract could be performed on the following day, according to a well-known usage in the market which was described in the following terms:

"There is a well-known usage in the market in connection with European importing firms that if the due date falls on a Sunday or on a public holiday, the same is excluded and the following day is taken as the due date. The plaintiff firm and the defendant firm are well aware of the said usage and have always acted in conformity thereto."

The plaintiffs allege that, according to this usage, the due date for delivery under the contract was the 28th October 1918, when they tendered the goods to the defendants, who refused to accept delivery. The plaintiffs accordingly claim damages on the basis of the difference between the contract rate and the market rate on the due date. The defendants repudiate the claim on the ground that the usage alleged by the plaintiffs has really no existence and assert that transactions are carried on according to a different practice which they described as follows :

"In transactions with the European firms if the due date falls on a Sunday, delivery is taken and given on the previous Saturday and not on the following Monday. In transactions between Indian firms, the due date is adhered to, irrespective of its being a Sunday or a week day, and delivery is given and taken on the Sunday, if that be the due date."

The defendants thus maintain that the due date under the contract was, as stated in the document itself, Sunday, the 27th October 1918, and they add that they offered to take delivery on that day, but the plaintiffs failed to give delivery as they had not the goods and were really not in a position to perform their part of the contract. Mr. Justice Buckland has rejected as untrustworthy the evidence adduced by the defendants to establish the alleged demand for delivery and tender of the price on Sunday the 27th October 1918. He has further held that the plaintiffs have proved the existence of a usage that in respect of imported goods to be delivered from the godown of the importing firm, if the due date falls on Sunday or on a holiday, delivery is given on the following working day. On this basis, Mr. Justice Buckland has held that the due date under the contract in suit was the 28th October 1918 and that although the plaintiffs were ready and willing to deliver the goods on that date, the defendants refused to accept delivery. The claim has accordingly been decreed with costs. The defendants have now appealed against this decree.

We may state at the outset that we see no reason to doubt the correctness of the conclusion that there was no demand for delivery and tender of the price by the defendants on the 27th October 1918 as alleged by them. The market on that date was against the defendants, and apart from contradictions in the oral evidence, it is extremely improbable that they would, of their own motion, offer to carry out the bargain on their part and thereby be involved in a heavy loss. We reject this part of the story of the defendants without hesitation as wholly unreliable. The real controversy in the appeal is, was there a valid trade usage as alleged by the plaintiffs, and, if so, what was its effect upon the contract between the parties.

According to the plaintiffs, there is a well-known usage in the market in connection with European importing firms that if the due date for delivery of goods falls on a Sunday or on a public holiday, the following day is taken as the due date. As regards transactions with European firms, there can be no doubt that the alleged usage is fully proved. Mr. Zalliehi, manager of the piece goods department of Ralli Brothers, states that they have a custom by which when the goods (ready or forward) fall due to be delivered on a Sunday or holiday, they deliver them on the next following day. Mr. Barker, who is in charge of the piece goods department of Graham & Co., states that when the due date for delivery on a contract for sale of goods falls on a Sunday, his firm gives delivery on the following working day, that is, on the first working day after Sunday. Mr. Morgan, who is in charge of the piece goods department of the Bombay Company, deposes that when the due date under a contract for delivery of piece goods falls on a Sunday delivery is given, according to usage, on the Monday following. In our opinion, the evidence is conclusive that in transactions with European firms, on the sale of piece goods, if the due date for delivery falls on a Sunday, the delivery is given on the next following day, and by usage this is regarded by all concerned as due performance of the contract. This is also clearly consistent with the probabilities, as European firms, prima facie, would not be kept open for business on Sundays.

The next point for consideration is, whether the same usage prevails with regard to transactions between Indian dealers, when the subject matter of the sale is goods purchased from a European firm of importers. The balance of evidence, in our opinion, points to the conclusion that the question should be answered in the affirmative. Mr. Zallichi, to whose evidence we have just referred, after stating the usage of his firm, adds that Indian merchants who deal with them recognise the usage. To the same effect is the evidence of Lakshminarayan and Loonkaran, who are members of respectable firms of piece goods dealers and who confirm the testimony on oath of Mulchand, the Manib Gomasta of the plaintiffs. The existence of the usage alleged by these witnesses is highly probable, because if the goods are lying in the godown of the importing firm, it is impracticable to give delivery on a Sunday; in such circumstances one would expect that delivery would be accepted if given on the next following working day, just as in the case of direct transactions with European firms. We are not unmindful that there is some evidence to show that delivery may be had on a Sunday, even from a European firm, by previous arrangement; but it is plain that such delivery, where given, is in the nature of a concession for the convenience or accommodation of the purchaser. Our attention has also been drawn to a ruling given by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce on the 25th June 1902, in the following terms:

"Sundays and Charter Party Holidays in relation to Mercantile Contracts.—Goods falling due for delivery on Sunday or on a Charter Party and shipping holiday must be delivered on the day previous to the Sunday or the Charter Party and shipping holiday, as the case may be."

No evidence has been adduced to show the circumstances under which the ruling was given; it is clear, however, that this has not been regarded as universally or even generally binding by mercantile firms and has not been observed by such firms as Ralli Brothers and Graham & Co. It is further worthy of note that it is not the case for the defendants that they demanded delivery on Saturday the 26th October 1918 as the due date. Their allegation is that Sunday was the due date; consequently the ruling of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce just mentioned can be of no possible assistance to them. This takes away from the value of the evidence of Mr. Fildes, who is piece goods salesmaster of David Sasoon & Co. (presumably a firm of non-Christian Jews) and who states that his firm has followed the Chamber of Commerce ruling. A similar observation applies to the evidence of Mr. Oldfield of the Overseas Export and Import Company, a firm which has acted on the Chamber of Commerce ruling. It is not necessary to refer in detail to the other evidence on the record, as, on the whole, we agree with Mr. Justice Buckland that the usage alleged by the plaintiffs covers not merely direct transactions with European firms but also transactions relating to goods imported by European firms and delivered from their godowns. In the case before us, as the defendants were aware, the plaintiffs were the Banians of the Bombay Company, an importing firm whose goods were the subject-matter of the contract. In such circumstances, the usage, if valid in law and not inconsistent with the written contract, would be applicable so as to make Monday the 28th October 1918 the due date for delivery.

It is well settled that, in the absence of statutory provision or trade custom or usage to that effect, the fact that the performance of a contract falls due on a holiday does not alter the rights of the parties by suspending the transaction of private business. This is well illustrated by the case of Richardson v. Goddard (1), where a ship arrived in port with a cargo of cotton and on a holiday discharged the goods, which were destroyed by accidental fire before they were removed. The question arose, whether there had been good delivery. It was ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States that in the absence of proof of statutory or customary prohibition of the transaction of business on a holiday, the delivery must be deemed to have been valid so as to throw the loss on the consignee. Substantially to the same effect is the decision of Farran, J., in Lalchand Balkissan v. Kersten (2). Consequently, in the present case, the plaintiffs have to establish that they were entitled to perform the contract on the day following the Sunday, by reason of the existence of a valid usage which may be deemed to have been incorporated in the contract between the parties. As was pointed out by Sir John Coleridge in Juggomohun Ghose v. Manickchund (3), such mercantile usage, though it needs not either the antiquity, the uniformity or the notoriety of custom, must be so well known and acquiesced in that it may be reasonably presumed to have been an ingredient tacitly imported by the parties into their contract. To the same effect is the observation of Baron Parke in Gibson v. Small (4):

"The custom of trade, which is a matter of evidence, may be used to annex incidents to all written contracts, commercial or agricultural, and others which do not by their terms exclude it, upon the presumption that the parties have contracted with reference to such usage, if it is applicable."

It is consequently plain that the usage of which evidence is received must not be repugnant to or inconsistent with the written contract. This view is lucidly expressed by Coleridge, J., in Broun v. Byrne (5):—

"In all contracts, as to the subject matter of which known usages prevail, parties are found to proceed with the tacit assumption of these usages; they commonly reduce into writing the special particulars of their agreement, but omit to specify these known usages, which are included, however, as of course, by mutual understanding. Evidence, therefore, of such incidents is receivable. The contract, in truth, is partly express and in writing, partly implied or understood and unwritten But in these cases, a restriction is established on the soundest principle, that the evidence received must not be of a particular which is repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the written contract. Merely that it varies the apparent contract is not enough to exclude the evidence, for it is impossible to add any material incident to the written terms of a contract without altering its effect, more or less" See also Ross v. Shaw (6).

But in order that the material incident which it is sought to annex should fall within the exception of repugnancy, the incident must be such as, if expressed in the written contract, would make it insensible or inconsistent or thoroughly unreasonable. See the observations of Coleridge, J., in Cuthbert v. Cumming (7), of Lord Campbell, C. J. in Humfrey v. Dale (8), of Cockburn, C. J., in Dale v. Humfrey (9), of Keating, J., in Russian Steam Navigation Trading Co. v. Silva (10), of Lord Esher, M. R., in Aktieselkab Helios v. Ekman & Co (11), of Stephen, J., in Barrow v. Dyster (12) and of Kennedy, J., in Gulf Line v. Lyock (13). These cases show that the real difficulty in interpretating transactions of this character lies in the reconciliation of two conflicting principles, namely, first, that evidence of usage is admissible on the presumption that the parties did not mean to express in writing the whole of the contract by which they intended to be bound but contracted with reference to those usages, and, secondly, that the evidence received must not be of a term which is repugnant to or inconsistent with the written contract. The distinction is well put by Mr. Justice Story in Reeside, The (14):—

"The true and appropriate office of a usage or custom is, to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intentions of parties, and to ascertain the nature and extent of their contracts, arising not from express stipulations, but from mere implications and presumptions, and acts of a doubtfull or equivocal character It may also be admitted to ascertain the true meaning of a particular word or of particular words, in a given instrument, when the word or words have various senses, some common, some qualified, and some technical, according to the subject-matter to which they are applied. But I apprehend that it can never be proper to resort to any usage or custom to control or vary the positve stipulations in a written contract, and a fortiori, not in order to contradict them. An express contract of the parties is always admissible to supersede, or vary or control a usage or custom: for the latter may always be waived at the will of the parties. But a written and express contract cannot be controlled or varied, or contradicted by a usage or custom; for that would not only be to admit parol evidence to control, vary or contradict written contracts, but it would be to allow mere presumptions and implications, properly arising in the absence of any positive expressions of intention, to control, vary or contradict the most formal and deliberate declarations of the parties." To the same effect is the decision of the House of Lords in Produce Brokers Co. v. Olympia Oil and Cake Co. (15) and of the Court of Appeal in Westacott v. Hahn (16).

The plaintiffs must consequently not only prove the existence of a trade usage but also establish that the usage when read into the written contract does not make it insensible or inconsistent. We must, in this connection, bear in mind that the mere fact that the usage varies the apparent contract is not of itself sufficient to exclude the evidence, for it is manifestly impossible to add any material incident to the written terms of a contract without altering its effect, more or less. The test is, whether the incident, if expressed in the written contract, would make it insensible or inconsistent or unreasonable. Examined in the light of the principle thus understood, the case of the plaintiffs is free from difficulty. The written contract states explicitly that the due date of delivery is ninety days from the 29th July 1918, that is, the 27th October 1918. We have then to read into the contract the proviso that if such date falls on a Sunday, the due date will be the day following. It may be conceded that this does vary the apparent contract; indeed, if it did not, the parties would not seek to prove the usage; but although the apparent contract is varied, the contract as modified is sensible and self-consistent. The added term consequently is not open to the objection of repugnancy We hold accordingly that the plaintiffs have proved the existence of a legal custom annexed to the written contract.

The result is that the decree made by Mr. Justice Buckland is affirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1037 OF 1918.

March 9, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice Hayward.

KUVERJI KAVASJI SHET—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

THE MUNICIPALITY OF LONAVALA—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 123—Gift—Registered deed, whether indispensable—Consent to make gift, whether sufficient to vest property in donee.

Under section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act, a registered conveyance is an essential requisite of a valid gift of immoveable property. Mere consent to make such a gift is not sufficient to vest the property in the donee. [p 404, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decision of the Joint Judge, Poona, in Appeal No. 147 of 1917, confirming the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge, Wadgam, at Lonavala, in Civil Suit No. 629 of 1914.

Mr. S. Y. Abhyankar, for the Appellant.

Mr. V. D. Limaye, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—This second appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff to recover possession of certain land from the Municipality of Lonavala. The Municipality took possession of the land in suit for the purpose of making a road in June 1903. In July 1903 the plaintiff's father was pressed by the Managing Committee of the Municipality to give over the land to the Municipality by way of gift, and, according to the finding of the lower Appellate Court, which may be taken as a fact now, the plaintiff's father consented to make a free gift of the land to the Municipality. Beyond recording a resolution with reference to this so called gift nothing further was done by the Municipality, nor by the plaintiff's father. Plaintiff's father died a few years later ; and in 1914 the present suit was filed by the plaintiff to recover possession of the land from the Municipality. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff's father had acquiesced in the possession of this land being retained by the Municipality for such a long time and that on account of his consent to make a gift of the land to the Municipality the plaintiff's title was extinct.

In both the lower Courts the defendant has succeeded and the plaintiff's suit has been dismissed.

In the appeal to this Court it is urged on behalf of the plaintiff that in the absence of any registered deed as required by section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act, the gift could not be complete in law and that the title to the land is still vested in the plaintiff. On behalf of the respondent Municipality there is practically no answer to this contention based on the provisions of section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act. But it is urged that the plaintiff is estopped from contending that the title is still vested in him in consequence of what happened between the plaintiff's father and the Managing Committee of the Municipality in July 1903. It is clear that the mere consent of the plaintiff's father to make a gift of the land was not sufficient to vest the land in the Municipality. According to section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act the title is required to be conveyed by a registered deed signed by the donor and attested by at least two witnesses. That was not done, and, therefore, in law the title remained in the plaintiff. The suit is brought within twelve years from the date on which the Municipality took possession, and unless the plea of estoppel is made out, it is clear that the plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of the land.

As regards estoppel it appears that the Municipality took possession of the land and used it for the purpose of the new road before the understanding between the plaintiff's father and the Managing Committee was arrived at in July. It is urged, however, in the argument before us that a part of the road was completed after this arrangement and that the Municipality acted to that extent on what was represented to them by the plaintiff's father in July 1903. The evidence, bearing on this point to which our attention has been invited, shows that substantially all that the Municipality had to do was done prior to July 1903; and even if a part of the road was completed after this understanding between the plaintiff's father and the Municipality, I think substantially the Municipality acted on its own responsibility and prior to any assurance given by the plaintiff's father. It is not, therefore possible to apply the provisions of section 115 of the Indian Evidence Act on that ground. It is urged, however, that the Municipality omitted to take the necessary legal steps to acquire this land in consequence of the plaintiff's father having given his consent to let the Municipality have the land. I am not satisfied by any means that such an omission on the part of the Municipality is sufficient to create an estoppel under section 115. The omission is easily attributable to the ignorance of the Municipality of their legal position as to the title to the land on the strength of the assurance given by the plaintiff's father, and there is apparently no evidence whatever in the case to justify the suggestion made before us that this omission was due to the assurance given by the plaintiff's father. I do not think that the proved facts create any estoppel against the plaintiff.

The plain position seems to be that both the plaintiff's father and the Municipality failed to realise the effect of section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act. The Municipality failed to take the essential step of having a registered conveyance from the plaintiff's father, and the plaintiff's father omitted to give legal effect to what he then according to the finding undoubtedly intended to do. Under these circumstances, however improper it may appear for the plaintiff to assert his title to the land at this distance of time, I do not think that in law he could be denied the relief by way of possession which he claims in the suit.

The area of the land, to which the plaintiff is entitled, has been stated before us to be $9\frac{1}{2}$ gunthas, as found by the trial Court. The decree must be limited to that area.

I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal must be allowed, that the decree of the lower Appellate Court must be reversed and that there should be a decree in favour of the plaintiff for possession of the land in suit measuring $9\frac{1}{2}$ gunthas.

I do not think that any case is made out for allowing mesne profits to the plaintiff. It is an open piece of land with regard to which there could hardly be any amount of mesne profits, and having regard to all the circumstances connected with the case I do not think that the plaintiff is entitled to any mesne profits.

In view of the finding that the plaintiff's father had consented to make a gift of this land to the Municipality, I think that the plaintiff should not be allowed any costs against the Municipality. The parties to bear their own costs throughout.

The defendant's Pleader suggests that some reasonable time should be fixed for delivering possession of this land to the plaintiff and the plaintiff's Pleader has no objection to three months being allowed. We accordingly direct that the decree for possession will take effect on the expiration of three months from to day.

HAYWARD, J.—I agree that the plaintiff is entitled in strict law to recover possession of this strip of land. I agree that the plaintiff is not entitled to much sympathy in view of his conduct in going back upon the promise of his father. It is on the other hand a well-recognized rule of law that powers conferred on public bodies must be exercised strictly within the limits expressly allowed by the law and it has been clearly shown in this case that the powers to acquire land for public purposes conferred by law were unfortunately not strictly exercised by the defendant Municipality of Lonavala. The defendant has, therefore, been driven to fall back upon the defence of acquiescence, a considerable period amounting to about eleven years having elapsed before the repudiation of the promise given to the Municipality. But acquiescence cannot be successfully pleaded unless it should refer to equitable relief or should amount to an estoppel preventing recourse to a legal remedy. It would, therefore, be necessary in this case to establish an estoppel, as this is a case of a legal remedy. It has no doubt been proved that there was a promise which led to a belief that the ownership of the land had been transferred. But it has not been proved that anything whatever was done upon the strength of that belief. The road itself would appear to have been practically completed before and not after the promise which was the foundation of that belief. It has been suggested that an act would also include an omission and that there was the omission to take the necessary steps to acquire the land. But no endeavour whatever was made at the trial to prove that it was ever debated whether steps should or should not be taken to acquire the land. No acts or omissions have in fact been established on the part of the Municipality which would, in my opinion, have justified us in applying the provisions relating to estoppel contained in section 115 of the Indian Evidence Act. The gift itself was, as pointed out by my learned brother, incomplete and it could in the circumstances have only ripened into title by a complete twelve years' adverse possession or by a registered deed under section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act.

There should, therefore, in my opinion, be the decree proposed for possession within the period named by the parties without mesne profits and each party bearing his own costs.

Decree reversed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XL, r. 1 (a)—Receiver, appointment of, after termination of litigation, legality of.

NAMDEV SATVASHET v. DHONDU SADASHIV.

A Court has no jurisdiction to appoint a Receiver in respect of property regarding which no litigation is pending.

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Muzaffarpur, dated the 1st May 1919.

Messrs. P. K. Sen and Jalgobind Prasad Sinha, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. A. Asghar, Government Advocate, and Mr. Fakhruddin, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This is an appeal against an order of the Subordinate Judge of Muzaffarpur, continuing the appointment of a Receiver.

It appears that during the pendency of a certain suit a Receiver was appointed to the estate of Musammat Mulkrani Kuer. There were four defendants in the suit. The suit was compromised by the plaintiff and the defendant No. 2, the plaintiff admitting the claim of the defendant No. 1. The defendants Nos. 3 and 4 objected to the compromise but the Court by a judgment, dated the 20th of January 1919, dismissed the plaintiff's suit. On the 23rd of March 1919 the Receiver who had been appointed in this suit filed his accounts and apparently would have been discharged, but the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 objected to his discharge and wished the property in respect of which the Receiver had been appointed in the suit to continue in his possession for better preservation. This has been allowed and it is against this order that the present appeal has been filed. Although the order is an order continuing the appointment of the Receiver, the order of continuance has merely been passed for the sake of convenience and actually what has been done is that a fresh Receiver has been appointed.

The point which is argued by the learned Counsel for the appellant is that there being no litigation pending regarding the property in respect of which the Receiver has been appointed, the learned Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to make this appointment. In my opinion this contention must succeed. Under the old Code of Civil Procedure when a suit had been decreed the Court had no power to appoint a Receiver, but under the present Code the power of appointment of a Receiver has been extended and the Court has power under Order XL, rule 1 (a), to appoint a Receiver of "any property whether before or after the decree." This, however, obviously refers only to the appointment of a Receiver in respect of the property in regard to which litigation is pending, that is to say, as long as a suit before the Court remains lis pendens, the functions of the Receiver will continue until he is discharged by the order of the Court. Although the dismissal of a suit may in some cases mean the discharge of the Receiver, still the Court has jurisdiction over the Receiver who is an officer of the Court. The Court has jurisdiction to require accounts from the Receiver, to allow parties to examine accounts and to deal with all matters connected with the management of the Receiver. If in this case the Receiver had merely been continued until his accounts had been examined and disposed of, there would have been no objection to the order, but this is in fact not what has occurred. As I have already said, a new Receiver has been appointed and has been appointed as a Receiver of property in regard to which no litigation is pending before the Court, either in the form of a suit or in the form of an execution proceeding. The order is, in my opinion, entirely without jurisdiction. I would, therefore, set it aside and decree this appeal with costs.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree.

NAMDEV SATVASHET v. DHONDU SADASHIV.

Defendant sold certain property to plaintiff. At the same time the latter executed an unregistered agreement to reconvey the property to the defendant after five years Defendant continued in possession of the property under a rent-note In a suit by the plaintiff to recover possession of the property:

Held, (1) that under the circumstances, it could not be said that there had been misrepresentation by the plaintiff: [p. 407, col. 2.]

(2) that the agreement to reconvey, being unregistered, could not be admitted in evidence. [p. 407, col. 2.]

Where the question is whether a sale-deed and an agreement to reconvey make together a mortgage by conditional sale, the Court must look to the actual contents of the documents and construe them accordingly. But it may be that there is such extrinsic evidence and circumstances which show the relation of the written language to existing facts and the Court might be able to come to the conclusion that the documents which on the face of them constitute a sale, and an agreement to reconvey within a certain period or after a certain period, amount to a mortgage. JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued to recover possession of the plaint lands and house, together with the crops standing on the lands, and Rs. 120 for damages for the loss of rent of the lands, and Rs. 18 for damages for loss of the house rent for three years before suit, and future profits. He based his suit on rent notes. The defendant contended that he and his brother unwillingly passed the sale deed of the plaint property to the plaintiff's father; that the property was worth Rs. 2,400 or 2,500, and the sale deed was got instead of a mortgage deed so that the debt might be soon satisfied; that they passed the deed as persons in need and because the plaintiff's father represented to them that he would not claim ownership over the property; that the plaintiff's father had given them an agreement in writing to reconvey the property to them on satisfaction of the debt so that the defendants might have confidence after passing the sale deed.

The plaintiff purchased the property in 1895. At the same time he passed an agreement to reconvey the property after five years. This document was not registered. Thereafter plaintiff leased the land to the vendor. The trial Judge held that section 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act would not apply, and that the agreement to reconvey could not be looked into for want of registration. Therefore, he passed a decree in favour of the plaintiff. This decree was reversed on appeal, the learned Appellate Judge coming to the conclusion that there had been misrepresentation, that the defendant and his brother would never have passed the sale deed if the plaintiff's father had not assured them that their ownership was not lost and that they would be allowed to redeem. I think really the learned Judge did not mean that there was misrepresentation at the time the transaction took place, but that the representation made at the time had not been adhered to thereafter by the plaintiff, and that in reality the plaintiff's suit was in fraud of the representation made by him in 1895. However that may be, the argument that the transaction must be considered a mortgage, because there had been a misrepresentation at the time the document was signed, cannot be upheld.

The real question is whether the sale-deed and the agreement to reconvey make together a mortgage by conditional sale. Strictly speaking, the Court has to look to the actual contents of the documents, and construe them accordingly. But it may be that there is such extrinsic evidence and circumstances which show the relation of the written language to existing facts that, therefore, it would be possible to come to the conclusion that the documents which on the face of them constitute a sale, and an agreement to reconvey within a certain period, or after a certain period, amount to a mortgage. But the case was not treated in either of the Courts below on that footing. It was never suggested anywhere, as far as I can see, that these two documents constituted a mortgage by conditional sale. The defendant's case appears really to have been one for specific performance of an agreement to reconvey, and that defence could not succeed for many reasons. Therefore, as it has never been suggested in the lower Courts that there was a mortgage by conditional sale, it would be very difficult for this Court to come to that conclusion on the evidence before it. There might be cases in which extrinsic evidence and circumstances would be so strong that we could come to the conclusion that the parties intended to effect a mortgage by conditional sale. But we do not see such extrinsic evidence in this case. Certainly not of such a strong character that we could possibly upset the decision of the trial Court. We, therefore, think that the appeal must be allowed, and the decree of the trial Court restored, the appellant being entitled to his costs throughout.

HEATON, J.—I agree. I think the only way in which a conclusion in favour of the defendant could be arrived at would be by holding that the transaction of 1895 was a mortgage by conditional sale. But that is not the case made out, or dealt with, in either of the Courts below, and it would be irregular for us to re-estimate the evidence and on our own account arrive at a conclusion that a mortgage by conditional sale was actually entered into. We cannot, I think, do that in this case. The reasoning of the lower Appellate Court seems to me to be faulty, mainly because the Judge has used the word "misrepresentation," when apparently he meant representation. Consequently his argument is fallacious, for the conclusions which follow from a case of misrepresentation are not those which follow from a case of representation. Here undoubtedly, on the facts as stated by the lower Appellate Court, there was not a misrepresentation. There was a representation that the land would be re-sold after five years, and that representation was in writing. That writing, however, was not registered; so it cannot form a part of the disposition of the property. We must restore the decree of the first Court with costs throughout.

Decree reversed.

Where, for the purposes of an appeal, an application for copies is made after the expiry of the period prescribed for appealing, the appellant is not entitled to deduct, under section 2 of the Limitation Act, the time requisite for obtaining copies in computing the period prescribed for the appeal. The "time requisite for obtaining a copy" counts from the date on which the application for a copy is made. [p. 409, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—(July 13, 1920).—A preliminary objection has been taken to this appeal which is directed against two orders—one made by Mr. Justice Greaves on the 23rd March 1920, the other by Mr. Justice Rankin on the 8th April 1920. The appeal was not filed till the 17th May 1920; that is 55 days after the first order and 39 days after the second order. The appellant has consequently to satisfy us that he is entitled to a deduction of time to such an extent as to bring down the period to the 20 days allowed by Article 151 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act. For this purpose, the appellant has placed reliance upon section 12 (2) of the Limitation Act, which provides, amongst others, that "in computing the period of limitation prescribed for an appeal, the day on which the judgment complained of was pronounced and the time requisite for obtaining a copy of the decree, sentence or order appealed from shall be excluded." The appellant argues that he has brought his case within the scope of this provision of the law. In our opinion, there is no foundation for this contention. We need refer in detail to the dates only in so far as the earlier order is concerned. An application for copy of the order was not made till the 29th April 1920; the copy was ready for delivery on the 5th May following. A deduction of this period is obviously not sufficient for the purposes of the appeal. But the appellant contends that on the 24th March he had made a requisition that the order might be drawn up and filed. We are of opinion that this application does not bring the case within sub-section (2) of section 12 of the Limitation Act. As was pointed out in the case of Bechi v. Ahsanullah Khan (1), in computing the time to be excluded under section 12 of the Limitation Act from a period of limitation, "the time requisite for obtaining a copy" does not begin until an application for copies has been made. This view was adopted by this Court in the case of Harish Chandra Tewari v. Chandpur Company Limited (2) and is also supported by the decision in Pramatha Nath Roy v. W. A. Lee (3). In fact it is plain that if an application for copy is made after the expiry of the 20 days prescribed by Article 151, reference to section 12 of the Limitation Act is of no avail to the appellant. This applies not merely to the earlier order but also to the later order of the 8th April 1920. In respect of that order, no application for copy was made till the 30th April; that is after the expiry of 20 days. We are consequently of opinion that the appeal is barred by limitation and must be dismissed with costs. No special order as to costs will be made in this case.

FLETCHER, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.—(July 23, 1920).—This is an application to review the judgment of this Court in an appeal from two orders made by Mr. Justice Greaves and Mr. Justice Rankin on the 23rd March and 8th April 1920, respectively. The appeal was dismissed on the 13th July last, on the ground that it was barred by limitation. We see no reason to resile from the view we took on that occasion. On the other hand, we are of opinion that the appeal was unquestionably out of time. The petitioner, however, asks us to vacate that order in so far as it dismisses his appeal and to substitute therefor an order under section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act. For this purpose, the petitioner has filed an affidavit by his Attorney, which sets out in detail the various steps taken before the appeal was lodged and the reasons why he acted as he did. On these new materials, the petitioner has urged that if what was undoubtedly the practice of the Court for many years had not been changed, the appeal would have been treated as in time. The respondent, on the other hand, has contended that the practice was altered by virtue of the judgment of this Court in the case of Framatha Nath Roy v. W. A. Lee (3) and that as that decision was pronounced at least a year before the present appeal was lodged, there is no good ground why the appellant should not have followed the new practice. It is plain, however, that the decision in Pramatha Nath Roy v. W. A. Lee (3) did not decisively settle the question which was decided by us on the 13th July 1920. Chitty, J., no doubt took the view which was subsequently adopted by us; but the Chief Justice in his judgment did not proceed exactly on that basis. It is further significant that notwithstanding the decision in Pramatha Nath Roy v. W. A. Lee (3) the officers of this Court have continued to follow the old practice (as they actually did in the present instance) to determine whether a memorandum of appeal was or was not presented in time. We are consequently not prepared to hold that there was any negligence on the part of the Attorney for the plaintiff when he followed what was undoubtedly the practice of this Court for many years, and we are of opinion that this is a fit case for an order for enlargement of time under section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act. No universal formula can be framed to regulate the exercise of judicial discretion in this class of cases; but it may be stated generally that delay may well be excused when the appellant is misled by a doubtful point of practice or by a change of practice of the Appellate Court; Horil Puttuck v. Ram Bhowmes (4), Sukh Dial v. Jey Singh (5), McNair & Co. v. Audeshaw (6), Baker v. Faber (7).

The result is that the application is granted in part. Our judgment, in so far as it held that the appeal was presented out of time, will stand; but the order for dismissal will be vacated and the time for presentation of the appeal will be extended so as to remove the bar of limitation. This order is made on condition that the petitioner pays to the opposite party the costs of this application. The costs will be taxed separately, but, subject to such taxation, the petitioner must forthwith pay to the opposite parties Rs. 800 (Rs. 400 to each) on undertaking given by their respective Attorneys, Mr. Kally Nath Mitter and Mr. Pyne, that the money will be refunded if the Court otherwise order subsequently. The order for costs which was made on the 13th July 1920 will stand unaffected by this order. The interim injunction will continue until the hearing of the appeal.

Letters Patent appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Walsh, modifying a decree of the Judge of the Court of Small Causes, exercising the powers of a Subordinate Judge, Agra.

Mr. Narain Prasad Asthana, for the Appellant.

Mr. Lital Prasad Ghosh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This Letters Patent appeal arises out of a suit brought by a Zemindar Lambardar against an agricultural tenant. The case for the plaintiff was that the defendant was only an agricultural tenant to whom a right to reside in a house had also been given together with the right to cultivate his land, that the defendant had commenced to pull down the old building which was kachcha and to reconstruct it as a pucca building, that he had no legal right to do so; hence the suit for an injunction restraining the defendant from continuing the same, and he also sought for demolition of so much of the building as had already been constructed pucca.

The Court of first instance distinctly found that the defendant's predecessor-in-title had come to the village and taken land as a tenant and had been allotted the site of the present building for the purpose of erecting a dwelling-house thereon in which to live while he cultivated the land. Even on the basis of this finding, however, it held that the defendant had no right to reconstruct the house and make it pucca. It, therefore, granted an injunction restraining him from continuing with the construction but refused to order the demolition of the building which had already been erected. The defendant-tenant appealed and the lower Appellate Court dismissed the appeal. The plaintiff filed cross objections, urging that he was entitled to the demolition of the building. The cross-objections were disallowed. The defendant appealed to this Court and a learned Judge of this Court dismissed his appeal, holding that he could not go behind the finding of fact. He allowed the cross-objections filed by the plaintiff, thereby granting demolition of the construction which had already been erected.

The lower Appellate Court wrote a somewhat confused judgment. It stated that the Court of first instance had found that either the house or the site had been granted to the predecessor-in-title of the defendant. It then went on to say that the finding of the first Court was correct. As a matter of fact the finding of the first Court is, as we have already stated, that the site was granted to the predecessor-in title of the defendant for the purposes of building. We, therefore, must accept that as the actual fact found. In fact in the case there was only one witness examined on the point, an old man of 73 years of age, who stated in his examination-in-chief that the house had been given to the defendant's predecessor-in-title. In cross-examination, however, he clearly admitted that it was the site only that had been granted and not the house. It is, therefore, patent that when the predecessor in title of the defendant settled in this village as a tenant he was granted a site in the abadi for the purposes of building a house. On that site he clearly built a house of kachcha construction. It is this house which he is now rebuilding and making pucca.

The sole question is one of his legal right to make this alteration. The defendant clearly is only a licensee. The plaintiff therefore, has to prove that the defendant has overstepped the right granted to him by the license and that in building the house pucca he was doing an act for which he had no authority. No attempt whatsoever has been made to prove the terms of the original grant. All that we find proved before us is that a grant was made, i. e., a license was given for the purposes of building, and there is nothing to show that the licensee was restricted as to the method in which he was to construct the house. The bare fact that in the beginning he made the house kachcha is not a sufficient reason for holding that the license granted was only one for building a kachcha house. In all probability the quality of the house to be built was never then taken into consideration at all and in the ordinary way permission was given to build a dwelling house without any restriction. In any case the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove that the defendant was overstepping the boundaries of the license; and he has completely failed to do so. On these facts the plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to the decree which was granted to him and we are forced to allow this appeal. The appeal is, therefore, allowed, the decrees of the Court below and of this Court are set aside and the plaintiff's suit will stand dismissed with costs in all Courts.

Appeal decreed.

Mr. Ranjnekar (with him Mr. W. B. Pradhan), for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff brought this suit against the defendant, who had been appointed a Receiver in an insolvency application No. 13 of 1915 in the Thana District Court, to get it declared that the property in suit belonged to her. The suit was decreed in the trial Court, but was dismissed on appeal on the ground that notice under section 80 of the Civil Procedure Code has not been given. Instead of giving notice, and then filing a fresh suit if her demand was not complied with, the plaintiff filed a second appeal, and the question now before us is whether a Receiver under the Provincial Insolvency Act is a Public Officer within the meaning of section 2, sub section (17), of the Civil Procedure Code. The defendant is not an Official Receiver under section 1 / of the Act, and so an officer of the Court whose duty it is to take action on every adjudication. He is merely a person specially authorised in this particular insolvency to act as Receiver. Section 20 of the Provincial Insolvency Act states what are the duties and powers of a Receiver: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Receiver shall, with all convenient speed, realize the property of the debtor, and distribute dividends among the creditors entitled thereto, and for that purpose may (a) sell all or any part of the property of the insolvent; (b) give receipts for any money received by him; and may, by leave of the Court, do all or any of the things" defined in the remaining part of the section.

It has been urged that because such a Receiver is merely appointed Receiver by the Court, he is not specially authorised by the Court to take charge or dispose of any property and that his powers to do so arise, not from the order of the Court, but from section 20 of the Act. But it appears to me that the powers under section 20 given to a Receiver are in effect given by the order of the Court which appoints him Receiver. It is a necessary consequence of the order. Therefore, it may well be said that the Court especially authorised him to take charge or dispose of the particular insolvent's property. It is only on account of the provisions of section 20 that the general powers need not be entered in the order appointing a Receiver. When special powers are asked for, then special leave of the Court is required. General powers arise by the mere appointment by the Court. It seems to me, then, as soon as a Receiver is appointed under the Provincial Insolvency Act, he becomes a Public Officer and he is protected by section 20 against any plaintiff who files a suit against him with regard to any act done by him as such Receiver without giving the requisite notice. The decision, therefore, in my opinion, of the lower Appellate Court was correct and the appeal must be dismissed. No order as to costs.

HEATON, J.—I think that must be the order in this case. As the result of argument the thing has filtered down to this: that if the Receiver is a Public Officer within the meaning of section 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure, then a notice as provided by that section must be served on him or the suit must be dismissed. Whether he is a Public Officer or not depends upon the definition of that term in clause (17) of section 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and he is undoubtedly a Public Officer if he is a person especially authorised by a Court of Justice to take charge or dispose of any property. Now there is no doubt that a Receiver, at any rate that this particular Receiver we are concerned with, was appointed by a Court of Justice as Receiver, that is to say, he was authorised by a Court of Justice. And as a Receiver he was authorised by the Court to do those things which a Receiver may do under the provisions of the Provincial Insolvency Act, for otherwise he would not have been appointed a Receiver. The argument urged by the appellant comes to this that although all this may be so, the Receiver was not especially authorised by the Court. It is urged that the especial authorisation is not contained in the order of the Court, but follows only from the provisions of the Provincial Insolvency Act. As a matter of fact we do not know what the order of the Court was. It is not on the record, and we have been spending our time over an ingenious argument as to the meaning of a document which nobody in Court has ever seen. It frequently happens, but, of course, it is not very enlightening. I will, however, assume that the Court did not say in its order that it appointed a Receiver to take charge of or to dispose of the property of the insolvent. If it had said either of those things, it would undoubtedly have especially authorised the Receiver to take charge of the property or to dispose of it. I will assume that the Court said nothing more than this, "I appoint so and so to be the Receiver," leaving everything else, even the name of the insolvent, to be inferred. Of course the latter would appear in the title of the proceedings. So it would very properly be inferred that the Receiver was to deal with the property of that particular person. The powers conferred by the Provincial Insolvency Act would be inferred also, and so it comes to this: if the Judge adopts the brief method of expressing his order, that I have assumed, then the Receiver is not especially authorised by the Court. If he makes a longer order, writes another dozen or two dozen words saying specifically that the Receiver was to take charge of the property and to dispose of it, then the Receiver is specially authorised. Now, for the purposes of the Provincial Insolvency Act it is really superfluous to add these extra dozen or so words. In either event the position and powers of the Receiver are the same; there is not a hair's breadth of difference. I cannot suppose that the Legislature, curious as its vagaries are sometimes supposed to be, really intended that if a Judge made a brief order of the kind I have described, a notice under section 80 would not be necessary; whereas if he made his order a little longer in words, but in no way different in effect, such notice would be necessary. Undoubtedly it would be necessary in the case of the longer order, as the order would in terms especially authorise the Receiver to take charge of the property. I cannot suppose that the necessity for the notice is got rid of because the Judge happens to adopt a somewhat briefer form of expressing himself.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The appeal having been dismissed, I will add this. The plaintiff on the findings of both the lower Courts ought to succeed on the merits. We are told that another person has been appointed now as Receiver of the insolvent's property, and we think that he ought to seriously consider the findings of fact against him, and seek for directions from the District Judge, or the Judge who appointed him as Receiver in charge of the insolvency, as to whether he should not return the plaint property to the plaintiff, and so avoid the filing of another suit. No order as to costs.

HEATON, J.—I concur.

Appeal dismissed.

Letters Patent appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda, dated the 22nd July 1919 and reported as 54 Ind. Cas. 750, in Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 1086 of 1918, against the decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Mymensingh, dated the 23rd January 1918, reversing that of the Officiating Munsif, 4th Court at Netrokona, dated the 25th January 1917.

Babu Upendra Kumar Roy, for the Appellant.

Babu Annada Charan Karkun, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent from the judgment of Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda in a suit for ejectment.

The plaintiff claims to be a raiyat, and alleges that the defendant was an under-raiyat for five years, whose term had expired and who had notwithstanding stayed on the land.

The suit has been dismissed on the ground that as the plaintiff is a raiyat holding at a fixed rate of rent, the defendant who holds under him must be a raiyat with a right of occupancy. This view is opposed to the clear provisions of section 4 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. That section defines the various classes of tenants as (a) tenure holders, including under-tenure-holders, (b) raiyats, and (c) under raiyats, i e. to say, tenants holding, whether immediately or mediately, under raiyats. Raiyats are next classified as raiyats holding at fixed rates, occupancy raiyats and non occupancy raiyats. It is perfectly plain that a tenant who holds under a raiyat is an under-raiyat, whether the person under whom he holds is a raiyat holding at a fixed rate of rent or an occupancy raiyat, or a non occupancy raiyat. The defendant in the present case was consequently an under-raiyat, although his immediate landlord, the plaintiff, was not an occupancy raiyat or a non occupancy raiyat but a raiyat holding at a fixed rate of rent. Reference has, however, been made to section 18 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and to the case of Hari Mohan Pal v. Atul Krishna Bose (1), which shows that a raiyat holding at a fixed rate of rent is competent to create a permanent subordinate tenancy, in the same way as a tenure-holder. But, clearly, that does not affect the present case. The status of the defendant here is that of an under-raiyat, and it is immaterial whether his superior landlord is a raiyat holding at a fixed rate of rent or is an occupancy raiyat, or a non-occupancy raiyat.

The appeal must accordingly be allowed, the decree made by Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda set aside and that of the Subordinate Judge restored with costs both here and before Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda.

Where, in execution of a decree on a prior mortgage, properties are sold to satisfy the decree, these properties are no longer liable for contribution towards a puisne mortgage. The fact that the auction-purchaser at the sale is a decree-holder and the same person who is the owner of the puisne mortgage and the fact that he obtained the property at a low price would not affect the case in any way. First appeal from a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Basti.

Mr. Surendra Nath Sen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is connected with First Appeal No. 321 of 1917, which we have just heard and decided. It is an appeal by the defendants Nos. 1 and 2, and relates to the three villages Dharaoli, Kundrupur and Hanumanpur. The point taken before us is a very brief one. The present appellants are the representatives of Sarju Prasad, who is the mortgagee under the three mortgages of the 1st of August 1879, the 14th of December 1883 and the 9th of January 1885. It is an admitted fact that under the decrees obtained under two prior mortgages these three villages, Dharaoli, Kundrupur and Hanumanpur, were sold and purchased by the decree-holder. It is for this reason, it is urged, that these three villages cannot be in any way liable for contribution towards the sum paid by the plaintiff to save his property from sale. The learned Subordinate Judge has calculated the value of these three villages in a certain manner to which exception is taken, but which we need not now consider. He found that the values were greater than the sums paid by the decree holder when he purchased in execution of the decrees obtained on the prior mortgages. As the decree-holder was also the decree-holder under the third mortgage, he has held that the three villages are proportionately liable with a fourth village Rupgarh, and in calculating the proportionate liability he has deducted from their actual values the sums paid by the decree-holder when he purchased them at auction sale. It is urged, and we think with considerable force, that whatever may have been the price that the decree-holder paid for them at the auction sale the properties, having once been sold to partly satisfy the decree under a prior mortgage, can no longer be held liable for any portion of the puisne mortgage debt. We think that the principle which underlies the decisions in Hari Raj Singh v. Ahmad-ud-din Khan (1) and Bohra Thakur Das v. Collector of Aligarh (2) governs the present case. As was laid down in the former of these two decisions, the unsold portion of the mortgaged property affords the fund out of which the claims of all the persons whose villages had contributed more than their common share of liability must be satisfied. In the latter of these two cases it was laid down that where two properties are mortgaged under a second mortgage, and one of them is swallowed up by a first mortgage, the whole burden of the second mortgage falls entirely on the remaining property, the owner of which has no right to contribution against the owner of the property sold to satisfy the first mortgage. The fact that the auction-purchaser at the sale in execution of the decrees obtained on the prior mortgages is a decree-holder and the same person who is the owner of the third mortgage and the third decree and the fact that he obtained the property at a low price seem to us not to affect the case in any way. These three villages were liable for all three of the mortgages. They were sold under the first two decrees with several other properties and the decrees remain still unsatisfied. If the third mortgagee had been a separate person, he could not possibly have proceeded against this property for the satisfaction of his decree. It is quite clear that so much of the security for the third mortgage had vanished and had been swallowed up in satisfying partly the claims of the first two mortgages. There remains nothing that could be sold under the third decree and, therefore, nothing in these three villages which could possibly contribute towards the plaintiff's claim. We think that the decision of the Court below on this point is wrong and we, therefore, allow this appeal; so far as that decree directs that any portion of the sum decreed to the plaintiff shall be recoverable by the sale of these three villages, it is set aside. The suit as against the present appellants will, therefore, stand dismissed. They will have their costs in both Courts.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The pedigree of the parties in this suit is set out at page 7. The property in suit originally belonged to two brothers, Bhimaji and Jiwaji, who were separate, although this particular property had not been divided by metes and bounds.

It is admitted that Jiwaji's branch has an eight-annas share in the suit property. Nilkanth, one of the sons of Bhimaji, claims to be entitled to the other half against his brothers, alleging that at a partition between the sons of Bhimaji the half share in the plaint lands was given to his share. It appears that the family had property not only in British India, but also in Kolhapur. An arbitrator was appointed for partition of the family property. He issued an award partitioning the property in Kolhapur, but there is no record as to whether a partition was made of the property in British India. In 1900 the four brothers signed receipts in which they acknowledged having accepted certain portions detailed in the respective receipts of the family property. The plaintiff in 1915 filed this suit against the children of his brothers to obtain his half share in the suit property. He also joined the sons of Jiwaji.

The trial Court declared that he was the owner of a half share in the plaint property. In appeal this decree was set aside on the ground that "these receipts constitute an instrument of partition and in so far as they relate to the property in British India, they required registration, and therefore, not being registered, they are inadmissible in evidence."

We have been referred to the decision of the Privy Council in Mahomed Musa v. Aghore Kumar Ganguli (1). There there had been a compromise which purported to extinguish the equity of redemption in certain property. That was not registered but a decree was passed in the suit between the parties which recognized the compromise. For thirty years the compromise had been acted upon as was proved by the evidence, and I think their Lordships, in holding that the right to redeem the mortgage was extinguished, arrived at their conclusion, not on the deed of compromise which was unregistered, but on the evidence of what had occurred since the compromise was executed. Having found that the parties had acted under the terms of the compromise for thirty years, they considered that as evidence of what had been done, so that the terms of the compromise were proved not by the document itself but by the actions of the parties after it had been executed. Now if in this case it had been proved that the four brothers since 1900 had been in separate occupation of the various properties detailed in the four receipts up to the date of the suit, I think that might well be taken as evidence that there had been a partition, in 1900 and the Court would have come to the conclusion that there had been a partition, without referring to the receipts. But in this case the plaintiff seeks to prove the partition by the evidence of the receipts themselves, and except that there seems to be some evidence that the plaintiff had been in possession of the plaint property until 1903, there is no evidence in the case that in other respects these four brothers acted in conformity with the alleged partition.

I think, therefore, that the Assistant Judge was right in coming to the conclusion that these four documents required registration and were, therefore, inadmissible in evidence, and that the rest of the record was not sufficient to prove that a partition had taken place.

I think, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed with costs to respondents Nos. 1, 2, 4 and 6.

HEATON, J.—I also think the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

I make one preliminary remark. I feel quite certain that their Lordships of the Privy Council in giving judgment in Mahomed Musa's case (1) did not intend either to modify or to limit that part of the enactments of the Indian Legislature which appears as sections 17 and 49 of the Indian Registration Act; nor do I believe that the Privy Council ever have intended by their judgments to modify or limit that which has been enacted by the Legislature in India. So the effect of sections 17 and 49 of the Indian Registration Act remains as totally unaffected as before, by anything that is said in the case of Mahomed Musa v. Aghore Kumar Ganguli (1).

Now the four documents with which we are concerned may be looked at in two ways. They may be taken together and read together as one whole. In that case they constitute an instrument of partition and would be totally ineffectual, because they were not registered. In another way they may be looked at as four individual lists of property, each one signed by one of the four sharers, made after the partition had been effected and made merely to indicate as a matter of mutual convenience what share had fallen to each sharer. If that is the true nature of the documents, they might be of very great importance for the purpose of corroborating or contradicting what witnesses might depose to. They would be useful also as establishing the fact that it was probably understood at the time that particular lands had fallen to particular persons; but they would not in themselves prove a partition. That would have to be done by somebody who had personal knowledge of the partition. So that we are left in this position. If it is sought to prove the fact of the partition by these documents, that cannot be done, because the law of registration prevents it. If it is sought to use them in any other way, they can only be used as subsidiary papers and are of no use whatever, until there is evidence altogether outside them, that the partition was made and was given effect to in some such way as these papers suggest. But that is not proved in this case.

I think, therefore, as I began by saying, that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Where land in the occupation of a tenant is acquired by the State, the sum awarded as compensation should be apportioned between the landlord and the tenant according to the present value of the interests of the respective parties in the land so acquired; the apportionment must not be based on merely hypothetical grounds. Appeal against the decree of the President, Calcutta Improvement Tribunal, dated the 20th August 1917.

Babus Provash Chunder Mitter and Gour Mohan Dutt, for the Appellants.

Babus Mahendra Nath Roy and Sarat Chandra Mukherjee, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal in a case for apportionment of compensation awarded for land acquired for the Calcutta Improvement Trust. The land acquired is one of three parcels of which a lease for 99 years was granted by the predecessors of the appellants to the predecessor of the respondent on the 28th February 1859 at an annual rent of Rs. 25. A sum of Rs. 13,140 has been awarded as compensation, and the question in controversy is as to the mode in which this sum is to be divided between the landlord-appellants and the tenant respondent.

The first question for determination is as to the proportionate amount of rent fairly payable by the tenant to the landlords in respect of this parcel. The President of the Tribunal has held, on the basis of a series of rent receipts, in which the amount of rent payable was stated to be Rs. 7, that that figure should be accepted as conclusive between the parties. In our opinion, this view cannot be supported. No explanation has been given as to the circumstances under which this entry came to be made in the rent receipts. The entries themselves were immaterial, because the total rent of Rs. 25 was paid in one lump sum and a joint receipt obtained therefor. No explanation has been suggested as to why and on what principle the rent was distributed amongst the three parcels as Rs. 16, Rs. 7 and Rs. 2. On the other hand, there is important evidence to show that the rent payable in respect of the parcel now acquired is nearly equal to the rent payable in respect of the other two parcels. In 1892, proceedings were instituted on the original side of this Court for partition of this property and the parcel now acquired was stated to be worth Rs. 3,550, while the other two parcels were valued at Rs. 3,035. We have further the significant fact that the area of the plot now acquired is 2 cottas 2 ch., whereas the areas of the other two plots were 2 cottas 14 ch. and 10 chittaks respectively. We must also bear in mind that the parcel acquired has frontage on two streets, whereas the other two plots have frontage on one street only. Consequently, in view of the areas of the plots as also their valuation, it is not unfair to draw the inference that the rent payable in respect of the parcel now under consideration is equal to the rent payable on account of the other two plots. We consequently hold that the rent payable in respect of this parcel must be taken to be Rs. 12-8 a month, that is, Rs. 150 a year.

The question next arises, how the sum awarded as compensation should be distributed between the landlords and the tenant. The amount awarded as compensation is Rs. 13,440. From that sum deduction is to be made for the value of the huts; we thus get the net amount, Rs. 12,940. The President of the Tribunal has held that the principle to be followed in the apportionment of the compensation money is identical with the principle adopted for assessment of the compensation. In our opinion, this view is erroneous. The amount of compensation was calculated on the basis that the land would remain permanently covered with huts as they were at the date of the declaration and that the property, that is, the land and the huts, would yield in perpetuity a net return of Rs. 940-8-0 per annum. It is not for us to consider whether this hypothesis was or was not sound; but it is plain that this hypothesis cannot be made the basis of apportionment of the compensation as between the landlord and the tenants. The reason is obvious. The market value of the land acquired may be determined on many hypothetical considerations. But the question of apportionment of the sum awarded as between the landlord and his tenant must be based, not on hypothetical grounds, but on an accurate determination of the value of their respective interests in the land. The moment the land is acquired, it ceases to be the property of both the landlord and the tenant, and it is consequently erroneous to bring into consideration the hypothetical assumption that the land would continue to be covered by the huts for 42 years and that at the end of that period would be delivered by the tenant to the landlord. What we have to do is to calculate the present value of the interests of the respective parties in the land acquired, in which both of them have lost their interest by the action of the State. Now what is the position of the landlord? At the moment of acquisition he was entitled to the reversion in the land. During the continuance of the tenancy, he was entitled to Rs. 150 a year as rent. It is not difficult to calculate the present value of each of these interests. The value of the land has been determined to be Rs. 12,940. The present value of Rs. 12,940, if the rate of interest is taken at 5 per cent. per annum, is Rs. 1,673. If the landlord is entitled to Rs. 150 annually from this land for a term of 42 years, the present value is Rs. 2,638. The aggregate amount which the landlord is entitled to obtain is the total of these two figures; that is Rs. 4,286. We may point out that the principle which the President has applied would have been obviously inapplicable if the land had been valued, for instance, by a reference to the price fetched at sales of similar lands in the neighbourhood. No question could then have arisen as to the hypothetical delivery of the land by the tenant to the landlord after the expiry of 42 years. We hold accordingly that the order made by the President cannot be supported.

The result is that this appeal is allowed and the decree of the Court below modified. The landlord appellants are entitled to Rs. 4,286: but as the appeal has been valued at Rs. 1,500, the decree will be limited to that sum and the balance of the compensation will be given to the tenant. The appellants are entitled to their costs of this appeal. We assess the hearing fee at five gold mohurs.

Mr. V. O. Kelkar, for the Appellant.

Mr. V. D. Limaye, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued to recover on account of profits of the plaint lands Rs. 150 for the three years 1915, 1916 and 1917 as per decree in Suit No. 35 of 1916.

There was a partition suit, in which partition was asked for and possession with a claim not only for past mesne profits, but also for future mesne profits. The decree which granted partition made no reference to future profits, although prior profits were awarded. The trial Court allowed the plaintiff's claim, saying that "because the Court did not notice it, it does not follow that plaintiff must lose future profits." This decree was reversed by the District Judge on the ground that as future profits were expresely asked for and had not been expressly granted by the decree, the case came within Explanation V to section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code. Therefore, the claim should, for the purposes of that section, be deemed to have been refused.

At first sight that would seem to be the obvious meaning of Explanation V. But we have been referred to two decisions, one in Doraisami Aiyar v. Subramania Aiyar (1) and the other in Mohammed Ishaq Khan v. Mohammed Rustum Ali Khan (2), in which the contrary was decided. A distinction was made between a claim for past profits and a claim for future profits, because the claim for the latter would not have accrued when the suit was filed.

It was held that the word 'relief' in the Explanation meant relief arising out of the cause of action which had accrued at the date of suit and on which the suit was brought, and did not include relief, such as mesne profits, accruing after the date of suit as to which no cause of action had arisen. We have not been referred to any decision of this Court on the point. No doubt there are authorities to the effect that the relief claimed must have been one which the Court was bound to grant and not one which it was discretionary with the Court to grant, but I see no logical basis in this case for such a distinction. The authorities with regard to future mesne profits which are cited by Mr. Mulla at page 60 (5th Edition) of his Commentary on the Civil Procedure Code of 1908 are all cases under the Code of 1882.

Granted that a claim for future profits can be made by a plaintiff, and can be granted by the Court in its decree, then it is difficult to see, with all due respect to the learned Judges who decided in favour of the opposite view in the cases I have referred to, why a claim for future profits, if made, cannot be considered as relief claimed in the plaint within the meaning of Explanation V. Under the Code of 1882 the amount of mesne profits had to be determined in execution proceedings and section 244, which dealt with the questions which had to be decided by the Court in execution of a decree and not by a separate suit, enacted by clause (c) that nothing in that section should be deemed to bar a separate suit for mesne profits accruing between the institution of the first suit and the execution of the decree therein, where such profits were not dealt with by such decree. That is to say, I presume, in execution of such decree. Therefore, it could be deduced from that clause that even if future profits were claimed but were not dealt with by the decree, then in spite of Explanation III to section 13, which corresponded to Explanation V of section 11 of the Code of 1908, a separate suit for future profits was not barred. That clause does not appear in Order XX, rule 12, the corresponding provision in the Code of 1908, and there must be some very cogent reason for its not having been re-enacted That rule deals with the question what the Court may decree in a suit for the recovery of possession of immoveable property. It was for the first time provided that the Court might direct an inquiry as to future profits and then a final decree would be passed in accordance with the result of such inquiry. Now it appears to me that the last clause of section 244 of the Code of 1882 was not re-enacted because there was no longer any necessity that the bar against multiplicity of suits provided by section 11 should not apply to claims for future profits if made. The question whether a subsequent suit for future mesne profits would lie was decided in the affirmative under the Code of 1882 in Sheo Kumar v. Narain Das (3). Whether such a suit, if the claim has not been made in the fresh suit, will still lie, considering the provisions of Order II, rule 2, and the alterations made in the Code of 1908, Order XX, rule 12, remains to be decided. On the whole I prefer to agree with the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Ayling in Doraisami Aiyar v. Subramania Aiyar (1), adhering to the decision of himself and Mr. Justice Hannay in Ramasami Iyer v. Srirangaraja Iyengar (4). It appears to me desirable to give its plain meaning to Explanation V of section 11, so that in this case the plaintiff having claimed future mesne profits and the Court having in its decree said nothing with regard to the future profits, we must take it that the Court refused to grant them.

(2) 44 Ind. Cas. 88; 40 A. 292; 16 A. L. J. 182.

Therefore, the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—The point before us relates to what happens when a plaintiff sues for redemption or possession and in his plaint claims future mesne profits and the decree is silent as to such mesne profits.

There are two views; one is that plaintiff can bring a second suit to recover the mesne profits; the other that he cannot.

The matter has been a good deal discussed and is the subject of two decisions, one in Doraisami Aiyar v. Subramania Aiyar (1) and the other in Mohammed Ishaq Khan v. Mohammed Rustum Ali Khan (2). Opinions have not been unanimous. The matter at first sight appears to be one of detail. Nevertheless it seems to me to conceal an important matter of principle. Our law provides as a matter of principle—a very important principle—that the multiplicity of suits should be discouraged; that two suits should not be brought where one will suffice. That, broadly stated, is the principle, and it is given effect to by section 11 of our Code of Civil Procedure. Explanation V to that section says: "Any relief claimed in the plaint, which is not expressly granted by the decree, shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have been refused." Now in the earlier suit this relief of future mesne profits was expressly claimed. It was not granted and, therefore, apparently it must be deemed to have been refused, and if it is so deemed to have been refused, then the present suit clearly will not lie.

Rule 12 of Order XX expressly empowers a Court to make an order for future mesne profits. What the Court may do, the litigant can properly ask the Court do. It is, therefore, quite in order for the litigant to ask in his plaint for future mesne profits. It seems to me that if he does so, then it is his business to obtain an order of the Court or an adjudication of the Court on that matter which he himself has expressly brought into his plaint. If it is overlooked by the Court, then it is the litigant's business to remind the Court of its oversight and to have it corrected, or to appeal against the decree which is silent as to this matter which the plaintiff has asked to have decided. It seems to me, therefore, that the matter is typically of the kind to which our general principle embodied in section 11 of the Code is intended to apply. My Lord the Chief Justice has pointed out that under the old Code there was a different provision, that there was a reason then, arising out of specific words appearing in section 244 of that Code, for holding that a second suit for future mesne profits would lie. That exception to a very important general principle no longer appears in our present Code, and it seems to me, therefore, to be incumbent on us to apply the general principle.

(4) 26 Ind. Cas. 622; 2 L. W. 8.

I think, therefore, that this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Langford James (with him Mr. R. C. Bonnerjee), for the Appellants.

The Advocate General (with him Mr. A. N. Chaudhuri), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs against the judgment of Greaves, J.

The claim was in respect of injuries caused to the infant plaintiff by a dog, alleged to belong to the defendant, on the 22nd June 1917.

The claim was for Rs. 1,642 9-9 in respect of expenses incurred by the plaintiff Mr. F. J. Hull, the father of the infant plaintiff, which sum included Rs. 723 for salary and commission for 13 days at Rs. 1,680 per month and for Rs. 10,000, in consequence of the injuries sustained by the infant plaintiff.

The defendant by his written statement set up several defences and denied liability. He then alleged that the plaintiff's claim in paragraphs 8 and 9 was fanciful and excessive and without admitting liability he paid into Court a sum of Rs. 900 as being ample to satisfy any claim of the plaintiffs.

At the trial after the opening of the learned Counsel for the plaintiffs, liability on behalf of the defendant was admitted, and the only question was one of damages.

After the plaintiff Mr. F. J. Hull was cross-examined, his learned Counsel said that he would drop the question of salary and commission and he agreed to accept Rs. 900 in respect of all out of pocket expenses incurred by the adult plaintiff on behalf of his son in connection with the injuries received from the dog on the 22nd June 1917, so that the only issue which the learned Judge had to try was, what damages, if any, had the infant plaintiff suffered.

The learned Judge awarded the infant plaintiff Rs. 300 to compensate him "for the pain and suffering caused to him by reason of the accident;" and the learned Judge made the order as to costs which appears in his judgment for the reasons mentioned therein. The first ground urged by the learned Counsel for the appellants was that the amount of Rs. 300 was an inadequate sum.

First, because the learned Judge had omitted to include any damage for the scar caused to the infant plaintiff's face and for the nervousness from which it was alleged he suffered in consequence of the injury, and in any event it was urged that the sum was not sufficient for the pain and suffering.

And 2nd, because it was contended that this was a case for exemplary damages and the learned Judge had not awarded such damages.

As regard the amount of Rs. 300:—

It cannot be said that the learned Judge did not consider the question of the scar: he referred to it in his judgment, and I gather that after seeing the infant plaintiff himself and hearing the evidence he did not consider it of much, if any, importance, and indeed the 9th ground of appeal makes it clear that the learned Judge had considered this matter but did not regard it as of any importance.

The evidence was that the scar was much better at the time of the trial Doctor Cameron thought that it would improve and that it might disappear altogether, but he did not think it would. A scar on the face may be a real disfigurement or it may be of little or no importance, and in view of the fact that the learned Judge who has seen the infant plaintiff's scar, has said that he did not regard the scar of any importance, it must be in this case that the scar is not a disfigurement and on such a point, I, sitting in the Court of Appeal, without having seen the infant plaintiff, am certainly not prepared to disagree with the learned Judge on a point of this kind.

As regards the nervousness:—

It does not appear that much importance was attached to that by the plaintiffs. It is not referred to in the plaint, no question was put to Dr. Cameron about it in the examination-in-chief, the Doctor had not been asked to examine him with reference to nervousness.

He said that when the infant plaintiff got back from Shillong he was all right, so far as bodily health was concerned. He had suffered no after effects at all except that he supposed he was probably a little nervous: he anticipated he would always be nervous of dogs. Such evidence does not lead me to think that there was really any permanent injury to the infant plaintiff's nerves

I do not think the evidence of Mr. Hull as to the boy's nervous condition is reliable, for he said that after the incident in November 1916 the boy would not go anywhere near a dog. He would simply run away. He became unmanageable when a dog came by his side.

Yet the evidence of Mrs. Hull was that on the day of the accident, viz., the 22nd June 1917, the infant plaintiff tried to pat the dog 'Britannia,' a bull dog which Mr. W. Bryant had with him.

Mr. W. Bryant said the child was a little nervous but still he patted his dog. This makes me think that Mr. Hull's description of the boy's nervous state was exaggerated. Mrs Hull said the boy was nervous of all, what he terms, 'knocker' mouth dogs, by which I suppose the boy meant, bull dogs.

The learned Judge on the evidence came to the conclusion that the infant plaintiff had suffered no permanent damage. He saw the boy and heard the witnesses give their evidence in Court, and on a question of this kind I should hesitate long before interfering with the decision of the learned Judge who has tried the suit; on the evidence as regards this matter I am by no means satisfied that the learned Judge was wrong.

As regards the amount awarded for pain and suffering:—

It is a difficult matter to estimate the amount of compensation for pain and suffering even in the case of an adult who can come into Court and describe his feelings, the pain and the suffering which he has undergone. It is still more difficult in the case of a small boy such as the infant plaintiff who did not give such evidence.

In this case it does not appear that there were any complications and apart from the operation of stitching the wound when he was given a whiff of chloroform, there does not seem to be any evidence that the boy suffered much pain, or passed sleepless nights or anything of that kind

The evidence shows that the father and mother, with whose feelings I can fully sympathise, were much upset by the sight of the boy's face.

It must have been harrowing to Mr. Hull's feelings, as he said, seeing his son under chloroform and having his face stitched, but we have not to consider the feelings of Mr. and Mrs. Hull or the worry to which they were subjected: there is here no claim for that.

We have to consider the pain and suffering endured by the minor plaintiff himself. The learned Judge has thought that Rs. 300 was enough.

I am not trying the case in a Court of first instance but hearing an appeal. It was held by this Court in the Englishman case [Englishman Limited v. Lajpat Rai (1)] that the Court of Appeal should not interfere unless the decision of the learned Judge on a question of damages appears to be clearly erroneous Having given this matter careful consideration I am not satisfied that the learned Judge's finding on this point was clearly erroneous.

As regards the claim for exemplary damages:

In my judgment there is no ground in this case for awarding such damages. Even if it were permissible to the Court to award such damages for a claim such as the present, upon which I express no opinion, I do not think the facts of the case are sufficient to justify an award of exemplary damages.

The claim to exemplary damages is based upon the failure of the defendant to fulfil his undertaking to remove the dog from the hotel, which it is alleged he gave after the incident in January 1917.

I think it is unfortunate that the defendant did not carry out his intention to remove the dog from the hotel.

Still having regard to the facts of this case and to the precaution which the defendant took, in my judgment the failure to send the dog away would not justify the Court in awarding exemplary damages.

It is clear from the evidence that the dog, generally speaking, was not a dangerous dog. The defendant's children and Mrs. Coachafer's children were in the habit of playing with the dog, even after the incident of the 22nd June 1917: but the dog seems to have had an antipathy against the infant plaintiff, as the learned Judge held, for some reason which has not been discovered.

It appears that after the January incident the defendant removed his room to another floor so that the dog and the infant plaintiff might not accidentally meet. The dog was always on the leash when he was taken out of the defendant's or Mr. Bryant's room and the learned Judge has found that such precautions as were possible with regard to the dog were taken by the defendant, and that this course was also followed while the dog was in Mr. Bryant's custody during Mr. Paull's absence.

The incident itself was in the nature of an accident, and it would not have happened but for the fact that the infant plaintiff had gone along the corridors of the hotel some considerable distance from Mr. Hull's room with another child and Mrs. Coachafer's nurse to the immediate neighbourhood of Mr. Bryant's room in which the dog was with Mr. Bryant. Mr. Bryant's brother, without thinking, left the door of the room open, when he entered Mr. Bryant's room, the dog ran out, and found the infant plaintiff immediately outside the door, and knocked him down.

I think it is not unreasonable that two views might be taken of the previous incidents. Mr. Hull and his wife regarded them as serious. Mr. Paull apparently took a different view. I cannot help thinking that if the dog, which was a bull dog, had been really savagely inclined towards the boy, more serious damage would have been done.

The same remark applies to the incident of the 22nd June 1917 for if the nurse's evidence is to be believed, the dog knocked the boy down three times there, was no evidence of a bite, though it is obvious that the gash or wound on the child's face must have been caused by the dog's teeth, which might have been done in the knocking down of the boy without any biting by the dog.

Under these circumstances in my judgment this is not a case for exemplary damages. At any rate I am certainly not prepared to hold that the decision of the learned Judge, in not awarding exemplary damages was clearly erroneous.

The last ground upon which the judgment was impugned was that the order of the learned Judge as to costs was wrong. The defendant paid into Court Rs. 600 and the plaintiffs were awarded Rs. 900 and Rs. 300, i e, Rs. 1,200 in all.

Prima facie, therefore, the plaintiffs would get the costs of the suit.

But the costs were in the discretion of the Judge. Such discretion must, of course, be a judicial discretion to be exercised on legal principles, not by chance medley, nor by caprice nor in temper, as was said by Lord Coleridge, C. J., In Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (2) and it was held in Ranchordas Vithaldas v. Bai Kasi (3) that the Appeal Court could interfere with the exercise of discretion as to costs by the lower Court, when there has been any misapprehension of facts or violation of any established principle, or where there has been no real exercise of discretion at all.

In this case the learned Judge said: "so far as costs are concerned, the plaintiff has succeeded in his claim for damages to the extent of Rs. 300 but his claim was Rs. 10,000 and I think if he had been reasonable in his attitude certainly yesterday morning the case would have been settled, and I think I must take this into account and his attitude as shewn by the correspondence with regard to the costs," and he then made an order as to costs giving to the plaintiffs three-fourths of their costs of the suit, the costs were to be on scale No. 2 as of one day's hearing and included the de bene esse examination. The learned Judge had said in a previous part of his judgment: "I think this letter and telegram shew that Mr. Paull was genuinely sorry for what had happened and was genuinely anxious so far as lay in his power and if he was allowed to do so, to make full compensation for all expenses in connection with the accident, that he did all he could to settle the matter amicably and I cannot help thinking that if the parties had been left to themselves or if some reasonable sum had been claimed for damages, this suit would never have come into Court and the matter would have been amicably arranged between the parties."

The learned Judge further referred to the claim for Rs. 10,000 and held it to be a most excessive sum, and that although the natural indignation of Mr. and Mrs. Hull must be taken into account especially at the time of the accident, he thought this action had been pursued in some spirit of vindictiveness and with a desire to inflict punishment.

In my judgment there is no doubt that the claim for Rs. 10,000 was an exorbitant claim.

It was urged that the plaintiffs had to insert some figure in the claim, and it was desired to insert a sufficiently large one.

But this, in my judgment, is no excuse in this case; further from the plaintiffs' Solicitor's letters, notably the letter of the 20th July 1917 in which the Solicitors wrote at the end of the letter "if your client is not prepared to pay the sums claimed, Rs. 12,000 in all, will you kindly let us know if you will accept service of the writ on his behalf," it is clear that Mr. Hull the plaintiff would be satisfied with nothing less than the sums he claimed.

Further at the trial he persisted in what I consider was his exorbitant claim. There is the further fact that the plaintiff Mr. Hull included in his claim Rs. 728, for salary and commission. He had lost no salary at all and he dropped his claim for commission, when he was being cross-examined, though he had given evidence in support of his claim for the salary and commission during his examination-in-chief. I do not lay great stress on this, for the learned Judge has not relied upon it; it is some evidence, however, of the spirit in which this claim was made and of the nature of the claim.

There is also no doubt that the learned Judge was right on the facts of the case and the evidence given by Mr. Hull himself that this suit was pursued in a vindictive spirit and with a desire to inflict punishment upon the defendant. He admitted that one reason for the action was to punish Mr. Paull, and he considered that rather less than half the claim of Rs. 10,000 should be put down for punishment of the defendant and that the balance of the Rs. 10,000 should be awarded to his son for damages.

These matters were obviously present to the learned Judge's mind when he made the order as to costs; and were matters which he could legitimately consider. He, however, took into consideration a matter upon which, in my judgment, it would be unsatisfactory to rely. He referred to some thing which had evidently taken place in Court the day before he delivered his judgment and he thought the case could certainly have been settled then if the defendant had been reasonable in his attitude. What exactly took place, I do not know as the learned Judge has not stated in his judgment what took place in Court on the previous day, or what it was that he had in his mind. If what occurred amounted to no more than negotiations between the parties as to a settlement, which came to nothing, I do not think that was a matter which the learned Judge should have taken into consideration, for it seems to me that this must involve, to some extent, speculation on his part, as to the attitude of the respective parties.

On the other hand, it may have been, and probably was, something much more definite than the above; at the same time, as stated already, I do not know exactly what it was to which the learned Judge referred. In my judgment, therefore, it is safer to say that this was a matter which should not have been taken into consideration.

I think further that the matter referred to may have influenced his mind, for part of his order was that the costs should be taxed as of one day's hearing which rather goes to shew that he thought if the plaintiff Mr. Hull had been reasonable on the first day of hearing, two days would not have been necessary.

I am loth to interfere with the order as to costs which the learned Judge in his discretion has made, for I feel that there was ample material before him, apart from the above-mentioned matter, to justify him in interfering with the ordinary rule as to costs; at the same time I cannot help feeling that he has been influenced to some extent by the matter to which I have referred, and which, I think, should be left out of consideration.

In my judgment, therefore, the learned Judge's order as to costs may be reviewed by this Court.

Apart from the matter to which I have just referred, there are matters which the learned Judge could, and no doubt did, legitimately consider; the exorbitant claim made and persisted in at the trial by the plaintiff, Mr. Hull—the fact that the suit was prosecuted in a spirit of vindictiveness and with a desire to punish the defendant, and the uncompromising and unreasonable attitude of the plaintiff Mr. Hull before the trial as disclosed by the correspondence.

In Jones v. Curling (4) it was held by the Master of the Rolls that the facts must shew the existence of something, having regard either to the conduct of the parties or to the facts of the case, which makes it more just that an exceptional order should be made than that the case should be left to the ordinary course of taxation, and the learned Judge proceeded to give examples which would in his opinion be a good cause for a Judge interfering; one of such examples was if the plaintiff had made an exorbitant claim by carelessness or recklessness.

In this case in my judgment the claim was not only exorbitant but also it was made and pursued in a vindictive spirit and with a desire to punish.

Further it was held by Lord Halsbury in Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5) as follows:—

"Everything which increases the litigation and the costs, and which places on the defendant a burden which he ought not to bear in the litigation is perfectly good cause for depriving the plaintiff of costs."

In this case there can be no doubt that the exorbitant claim and the way in which it was persisted in increased the litigation and prolonged the hearing of the suit.

In my judgment the exorbitant claim, the uncompromising attitude of the plaintiff Mr. Hull in persisting both before and at the trial in such exorbitant claim, and the vindictive spirit in which the suit was pursued are sufficient grounds for interfering with the ordinary course as to costs.

For the reasons above mentioned I think the proper order as to costs will be to vary the learned Judge's order by striking out of the decree the words "other than the costs of this day's hearing," which, as already stated I think, probably were inserted by reason of the matter to which I have already referred and which, I think, should be left out of consideration. As regards the costs of this appeal, according to my judgment the plaintiffs have failed upon the main grounds of the appeal, but have succeeded to a small extent as to the order for costs.

It is difficult to allocate the costs, which have been incurred in the Court of Appeal, to the various points argued, and I think under the circumstances it will meet the justice of the case if an order is made that each party should bear his own costs of the appeal.

Consequently in my judgment the appeal should be dismissed except that the decree as to costs should be varied, as above mentioned, and each party should pay his costs of the appeal.

WOODROFFE, J.—I regret I am unable to agree in the conclusion at which the Chief Justice has arrived.

This is a suit in tort by the infant plaintiff, a child of Mr. F. J. Hull, for Rs. 10,000 damages and Rs. 1,642-9-9 out of pocket expenses for injuries caused by the defendant's dog. The written statement denied liability and was accompanied by payment of the sum of Rs. 900 into Court, which was alleged to be sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff if he was found entitled to anything. This denial of liability was abandoned at an early stage of the trial after framing of issues. It was admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to Rs. 900, as an agreed sum by way of out of pocket expenses (Rs. 1,642-9-9) claimed. It was never admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to anything for pain and suffering and injury over and above the amount now admitted as payable for out of pocket expenses. For though the written statement is wide enough to cover claims of every kind, the evidence of the defendant and what occurred at the trial make it quite clear that the defendant was unwilling to pay anything on account of pain and injury. The trial accordingly proceeded, with the result that the learned Judge held as against the defendant that the plaintiff was entitled to something (evidently in the learned Judge's opinion not much) and the decree was given to him for the sum of Rs. 300 in addition to the sum of Rs. 900 above stated; but for certain reasons he deprived the father and next friend of the infant of $\frac{1}{4}$th of the general costs of the suit, of $\frac{1}{4}$th of the costs of the 1st day's hearing and whole of the costs of the 2nd day's hearing.

There is, as I have stated, no question of liability of the defendant to pay damages. The two questions before us are, firstly, as to the amount he should pay by way of damages and, secondly, as to the next friend's costs of which he has been deprived.

A number of English cases have been cited to us with a view to show when the Court may and when it may not interfere in an appeal on the question of the sufficiency of damages awarded. I adhere to the opinion which I expressed in Englishman Limited v. Lajpat Rai (1) that the English cases which deal with the question of the revision of damages by the Court of Appeal have no application in this country where the Jury system, with respect to which the English decisions have been given, does not prevail. Here the question of damages is to be dealt with by the Court of Appeal as any other portion of the case, that is the Court in appeal will not interfere either as regards award of damages or any other matter (both classes of facts standing on the same footing), unless the decision appealed against appears to be clearly erroneous. In that case the Court of Appeal reduced the damages.

The first question then is whether the sum of Rs. 300 should be increased. As regards this I may in advance observe that the conduct of the plaintiff's next friend can, in no way, affect the damages to be paid to his infant son for actual injury and suffering. Whatever claim his father may have made, he is entitled to be compensated for his suffering and injury. It must be first ascertained (so far as is possible) what is a proper sum to pay, and this sum may be on a larger scale if the conduct of the defendant has been such as to justify it. The second question is as regards the costs. I will take up the former first.

In this case we have not to deal with a single attack but with four attacks by the same dog on the same child in November 1916, 10th January 1917, 17th January 1917 and 22nd June 1917. After the third attack Mr. Hull saw the defendant and the following is his evidence:—

"I said it was fortunate that no very great physical injury had been done, and that I hoped that we could settle the matter but that I thought that there was only one way, and that was by destroying the dog, and then I offered to buy the dog at Mr. Paull's own price. Mr. Paull said that the dog was a prize dog and he wished to keep it, and that he intended to show it at the dog show which would take place at the end of February, and then he would take it away to Darjeeling and that I would not see it again. He said that in the meantime he would keep the dog under lock and key and that I would never see it again: He also said that he would remove to other rooms in the hotel and asked me if I would be kind enough to tell my servant not to take the boy in that direction." After he got back to his rooms Mr. Hull then wrote the following letter:

"17th January 1917.

"Dear Mr. Paull,

"After further consideration I want, in the most friendly yet firm way, to put in writing just what I feel concerning what happened yesterday.

"The dog has now attacked the child on three different occasions. The first time it drew blood; on the second occasion I was present and my wife and I were able to prevent any bodily harm being done; yesterday the dog bit the child on the foot, and it would certainly have drawn blood but for the fortunate fact that its teeth fastened on the child's shoe. On no occasion has the child given the dog any provocation.

"The above proves that so far as my child is concerned, the dog is dangerous.

"You and I both want to do the right thing to prevent anything really serious happening or even a recurrence of what has already happened. In my view, the only way to make sure is for the dog to be sent away or destroyed.

"I understand that you wished to show the dog on the 26th and that immediately after the show, it is to be sent to Darjeeling. This is all right so far as it goes, but I would like an insurance of what is to be done in the meantime. It is due to my child, and my wife (who was seriously upset yesterday and on the first occasion), to say that I shall hold you strictly to account for any physical or mental suffering which may be caused by your dog.

"I feel certain that you will make it impossible for the dog, either in hotel or outside, to attack the child in future.

Yours Sincerely,
F. J. Hull."

to which the defendant replied as follows:—

"324, Grand Hotel,
"17th January 1917.

"F. J. Hull, Esqr.

"Sir,

"I am in receipt of your letter of date and regret the unfortunate occurrence to which you refer. The dog is used to children and has no vice, but, of course, I wish to meet you in this matter, so have made arrangements to move to rooms on the next floor, as soon as available in a few days. As suggested by you, it would be better if your little boy would use one of the other staircases until I have made the change of rooms. I on my part will naturally take care the dog is chained up in the interior.

Yours Sincerely,
A. F. Paull."

The statement in Mr. Hull's letter about the dog being sent to Darjeeling is not here challenged, though the defendant in his evidence says that he is not sure whether he told Mr. Hull that he would send the dog away to Darjeeling or not. The defendant then says that it is quite likely that Mr. Hull invented that statement. In my opinion Mr. Hull is stating the truth in this matter. In his evidence the defendant says he "pooh poohed" the whole thing absolutely, that Mr. and Mrs. Hull were "making a mountain out of a mole hill," that they "exaggerated" and that it was "a paltry thing," and that they were "making a great fuss and that even the last occasion when the dog made a wound on the child's face, which was $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches long and a $\frac{1}{4}$th to $\frac{1}{8}$th of an inch deep and which had to be sewn up, leaving what the doctor said was likely to be a permanent scar, it was "a very doubtful thing." Seeing these constant attacks by the dog on this child which was only $4\frac{1}{2}$ years old, I think that his parents were very naturally apprehensive and that it was not a matter to be "poch poohed" at all. If greater injury was not caused, it was, I think, due to the fortunate circumstance that on each occasion some one was present to help the child and to take off the dog. I do not accept the defendant's statement that Mr. and Mrs. Hull were exaggerating. If they were, why did not the defendant deny the statements in Mr. Hull's letter of the 17th January? The attitude taken by the defendant in his evidence has also a bearing on the argument that the defendant before suit was so entirely reasonable and willing to make such compensation as was proper that the suit was unnecessary, a matter with which I deal later.

The fourth attack by the plaintiff's dog on the 22nd June 1917 is the subject-matter of this suit.

The defendant had promised that the dog should be sent away after the dog-show which took place at the end of January. The reasons why he did not do so are immaterial. It may not have suited the defendant, but a promise made was a promise to be kept. It has been suggested that it was a good thing that the dog was not sent to Darjeeling, as it might have attacked the child when the latter was also there. The defendant does not himself say that the dog was not sent to Darjeeling on account of any such fears. Moreover the gist of the matter was, not that the dog should be sent to Darjeeling in particular, but that it should be sent away. On the contrary the dog was kept in the hotel and afterwards made over to a Mr. Latouche. Meanwhile the defendant went himself to Darjeeling and returned about the middle of June. At that time the Hull family had returned. Then the defendant returns and knowing that the Hull family were in the hotel, he brought the dog again into the hotel. For sometime the dog was in his control and was then left, on his going to the Sandheads, in the hotel in charge of his friend Mr. Bryant, who lived on the same landing and used the same lift as the Hull family. And this was done though in the defendant's letter of the 17th January previous, the defendant has suggested that the child should use one of the other staircases until he had moved to rooms on another floor. The result then was that the dog was not sent away but kept in the hotel under circumstances similar to those under which the first three attacks had occurred. The defendant, however, had told Mr. Bryant to be careful with the dog. The dog was loose in his room and when his brother Mr. W. Bryant opened the door, the dog rushed out, attacked the child who was almost at once picked up by Mr. W. Bryant and saved from further injury than that which it has suffered. As to this we have Dr. Cameron's evidence. The left cheek was cut and there were two small wounds on the hand. The first wound was he says fairly serious, being $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches long and the depth varied from $\frac{1}{4}$th of an inch to $\frac{1}{8}$th or $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{8}$th. It required stitching, which was done after the child was given chloroform. He says that he certainly thinks there will be a permanent scar. He described it as prominent. The learned Judge in his judgment, dated the 5th July of last year, that is more than a year after the event, states that the scar was still visible from where he was sitting at a distance of 5 or 6 yards. The Doctor was twice questioned as to his statement that the scar would be permanent and said that he did not think it would disappear. On the right hand the skin was just broken and showed tooth marks. Being cross-examined whether he anticipated any further permanent results, Doctor Cameron said that the question was a difficult one, but that the child would be nervous of dogs. And the evidence shows that the child was, as one might expect it to be, after four attacks from this dog, nervous.

As regards this medical evidence it is uncontradicted.

The question then is, what damages the defendant should pay for these injuries. In the defendant's view the matter was a very small one and that if there was anything due a very little sum was payable. The defendant stated that if any little sum was due there was contributory negligence on the part of this child of $4\frac{1}{2}$ years, and if one were set against the other nothing was due. The supposed contributory negligence is that the child was on the corridor near the room of Mr. Bryant and at a distance of some 200 paces from its own. Whether this would have made any difference in the result is doubtful. There might have been perhaps more serious injury if the dog had attacked the child at a distance from Mr. Bryant's room, when it would have taken longer for him to come up and help it. However this may be, the child was entitled to use the corridor as much as any one else. Doubtless it was an accident that the dog attacked the child owing to the opening of Mr. Bryant's door, but as the learned Judge has held having regard to what happened before, the defendant must be held responsible. I may here point out that the statement above mentioned and other facts make it abundantly clear that the defendant never offered to pay anything on account of injury and suffering and limited his offer to out of pocket expenses only. I refer to this again on the question of costs.

The learned Judge has held that the plaintiff is entitled to the sum of Rs. 300 only which he himself described as a small compensation for his pain and suffering, and he has further deprived the plaintiff's next friend of $\frac{1}{4}$th of the general costs of the action, $\frac{1}{4}$th of the costs of one day's hearing and the whole of the costs of one day's hearing. The result, therefore, is that though the plaintiff has been attacked four times by the defendant's dog and has suffered the injuries described, he gets only Rs 300 for his pain and injury (which are, of course, exclusive of the out of pocket expenses) and the next friend of the child in this action will be out of pocket as regards $\frac{1}{4}$th of the costs of the action as also of the first day's hearing and as regards all the costs of the second day's hearing. I cannot agree that this is a right conclusion.

In the first place, it is based on the finding that the child has suffered no permanent damage. That finding is a question of fact and not a matter of discretion. That finding is not based on the evidence, for in Dr. Cameron's opinion the scar will be permanent. That is the only evidence in the case. It was suggested that the child was not a girl and that a scar was not, therefore, of any importance. May be it is not of such importance as it would have been in the case of a girl, but it is an injury all the same and if permanent must be compensated. It is true that the learned Judge saw the scar which we have not, but he has also told us that the scar was still visible at a distance from where he was sitting and he is in no better position to say whether it will disappear than we are. It is true again that Doctor Cameron in cross examination said that it was possible that the scar might disappear. No other answer in such case could be given, because neither he nor any one else could absolutely deny such a possibility, but he also said three times that, in his opinion, though the scar might improve it would not altogether disappear. He said "I certainly think there will be a permanent scar." I do not consider myself justified in relying on what he stated might be within the bounds of possibility and rejecting his positive opinion thrice repeated that the scar was a permanent injury. If it be suggested that Dr. Cameron's evidence was too favourable to the party calling him or that it was medically unsound, it was open to the defendant to call other medical evidence which was not done. It stands unrebutted

Dr. Cameron's opinion may have been right or it may have been wrong. Doctors like others make mistakes. But there is no ground in my opinion for holding that he was more likely to be wrong than right. I may here observe that the learned Judge was in error in stating that no evidence was sought to be put forward that any permanent injury had been done.

Nextly, there is medical evidence that the shock, which the child has suffered and which I think must have been intensified by reason of three previous attacks, may have permanent effect. The actual existence of the continuance of nervousness is supported by other evidence in the case. I hold that permanent injury has been proved.

This finding is sufficient to invalidate the learned Judge's decision on the question of damage. It cannot be contended that the doctrine of non interference in certain matters with the Judge's discretion extends to this that if he thinks that no permanent injury has been proved on the evidence, we are bound to accept his conclusion when the only medical evidence is the other way. I need not, therefore, elaborate the argument that the learned Judge has also misdirected himself by taking into consideration matters which are irrelevant, such as the conduct of the plaintiff's father and defendant.

The first question which the Court had to decide was whether the case was one which called for damages on an exemplary scale or not. On this question some of the circumstances to which the learned Judge has alluded might be taken into consideration;

He would then, in his view of the case, have held that this was not a case for exemplary damages. The next question would have been whether any damage was suffered and if so, to what extent. If compensation was due, the final question was whether the sum payable was a nominal or a small sum as the learned Judge calls his award, or whether a substantial or at any rate greater sum should be given to the plaintiff. On this question the considerations to which I have alluded would have no bearing whatever. The simple question then was what, if any, was the actual injury and suffering and what compensation should be paid on an ordinary scale free of all considerations which influence a Court in awarding exemplary damages.

It appears to me that there is some ground for the argument that the learned Judge has not sufficiently distinguished between matters affecting the question of exemplary and ordinary damages. It is clear that the conduct of the plaintiff's father (however it may affect the question of costs) cannot be relevant on the question of damages (exemplary or ordinary) payable to the plaintiff. Further such matters as the general attitude of, and precautions or lack of precautions taken by, the defendant, and the dangerous character of the dog may be relevant on the question whether damages should be on an exemplary scale, but not on the question of actual injury and suffering. It is possible that though he has not said so, he was, in referring to such matters, dealing with the claim for exemplary damages. On the other hand there are remarks which put this matter in doubt. It is, however, not necessary to labour this point because if the evidence proves permanent injury and if the learned Judge has held there is none and based his award of damages on such conclusion, it is clear that the award of damages cannot stand.

I will deal then first with the question of exemplary damages which the plaintiff claims. There is nothing wrong in itself in claiming exemplary damages, or to use a more ill sounding term, vindictive damages. For the Courts themselves award such damages. The only question is one of fact, viz., whether a case has been made out for such damages.

As both Greaves, J., and the Chief Justice are of opinion that there is no case for exemplary damages, I do not press my view on this point beyond saying this that whilst the plaintiff's claim may have been excessive, I cannot say that under the circumstances it was unreasonable for the plaintiff to believe that he was entitled to damages on an exemplary scale, seeing that there had been three previous attacks by the dog and that the defendant persisted in keeping the dog in the hotel notwithstanding his express promise to send it away, with the result that the injury complained of became possible and in fact ensued. As, however, there was, apart from this, no wilfulness on the part of the defendant and no malice or the like, exemplary damages would not be given on the highest scale. Accepting Dr. Cameron's evidence as to the likelihood of permanent injury, I think that more substantial damages should be given than those the learned Judge has granted. I deal with the amount later.

As regards costs the learned Judge has deprived the plaintiff of $\frac{1}{4}$th of the general costs and of the first day's hearing and the whole of the costs of the 2nd day's hearing. He has, therefore, to this extent directed that the costs shall not follow the event. For the plaintiff has established his claim both to the sum paid into Court and to a greater sum.

The ordinary rule is that costs do follow the events. The Court may, however, direct otherwise, but under the Code (section 35) if it does so, it must state its reasons in writing. This provision was enacted both to secure a proper exercise of discretion and in order that the Court of Appeal may be in a position to control the order and see whether there is good cause for departing from the general rule. It is no sufficient answer to say in such case in an appeal from the judgment that the costs are in the discretion of the Court. The Appellate Court must itself decide whether the order should be sustained, that is whether the reasons required to be stated are good reasons founded on the facts of the case. There are certain well known principles on which a successful party may be deprived of his general right to costs. But where the Court purports to act on these principles, it is open to the Appellate Court to enquire whether on the facts these principles have been rightly applied. Thus the main grounds on which the costs have been disallowed are frivolous and vexatious and needless actions, misconduct, malice, falsity, unscrupulousness, omission, neglect or anything which increases the litigation and the costs and which places upon the defendant a burden which he ought not to bear. Avoiding any attempts to be exhaustive, the rule has been stated in the following general terms "we can get no nearer to a perfect test than the enquiry whether it would be more fair as between the parties that some exception should be made in the special instance to the rule that costs should follow upon success" [per Bower, L. J., in Forster v. Farquhar (6)].

In my opinion none of the grounds specially stated exist here and referring to the general rule I have a clear opinion that it would not be more fair that the plaintiff in this case should be deprived of any of his costs.

I may observe in the first place that no improper motive is charged against the plaintiff's next friend, in the sense that the suit seeks any personal benefit for him. At one time I thought that the suggestion was made in the argument by the learned Advocate-General, and I said I thought that the suggestion was not a fair one on the facts and the cross-examination of Mr. Hull. I withdrew this observation as I had either misheard or misunderstood what learned Counsel had said. Nor can there be said to be malice, because the plaintiff's father rightly or wrongly thought that four attacks by the defendant's dog on his child, the last taking place after a broken undertaking to remove the dog, called for exemplary damages. All that is charged is that Mr. Hull too hastily commenced the suit for an excessively large amount of compensation such large amount being claimed with a view to punish the defendant. There is nothing morally wrong in seeking damages on an increased scale, called variously punitive, vindictive or exemplary damages. The Court grants such damages in suitable cases and there is no wrong in asking for them. The only question is one of fact, viz, whether litigation was necessary at all, whether if so, a case for exemplary damages has been made out, and if not, whether the costs have been unnecessarily increased for the defendant by reason of the plaintiff's claim. Litigation was necessary in this case, because there was never at any time either before or after suit any offer to pay any sum as compensation for injury and suffering over and above out of pocket expenses, and on the commencement of litigation Rs. 900 was paid in without admission of liability for any sum whatever, and then only in respect (as the defendant himself states) of out of pocket expenses. Nextly as regards the amount of the claim, the practice (in this unlike that of the English Courts) requires that a plaintiff should state the amount he claims for damages and is not given any more than he has claimed. This naturally leads parties to put their claim at its highest. In the present case doubtless Mr. Hull was (as the defendant admits he would himself have been) angry that his child had been attacked four times by the plaintiff's dog, and that after an undertaking by the plaintiff that he would send the dog away. He and his advisers may, therefore, reasonably have considered that this was a case for exemplary damages, and in fact they so wrote. The plaintiff has been given damages but not on this scale. The real question then is whether because the plaintiff claimed a large amount and has got a small one, he should be deprived of any costs. I may here observe that if the plaintiff claimed too much for compensation, for injury and suffering, the defendant offered nothing on that account. In my opinion the mere fact that in a case of this kind a plaintiff (against whom nothing else is shown) may claim more than he actually receives is not a ground for depriving him of costs, unless it is shown that the costs of the action have been increased by his claim. Nor has this Court, so far as I am aware, proceeded as a matter of general practice on any other footing. Possibly this may be due to the circumstance that the Code requires the plaintiff to state the amount claimed as damages. A striking instance of this is the "Englishman case (1)" to which I have referred, where though the claim was for Rs. 1,00,000, the amount given was Rs. 1,500 only with costs. In the present case it is not shown that the suit was unnecessary or that the costs had been increased in any degree by the fact that more was claimed than granted. As the defendant denied that anything was due for the compensation stated, evidence was offered, which had to be of the same character whether ten thousand or one thousand rupees was claimed.

In my opinion the grounds stated by the learned Judge are not, having regard to the facts of the case, good cause for the exceptional order he has made. They are "the plaintiff's father's attitude as shown by the correspondence," that if he had been reasonable, the case could have been settled and lastly the excessive amount claimed. When examined, these grounds reduce themselves to this, that if the plaintiff's claim had not been so inflated, it would not have been necessary to sue at all. The question is, is that fact made out. It is possible to speculate but, going by the acts, it is clear that the defendant never at any time offered to pay anything for compensation for injury and suffering. He says he "poob, poobed" the whole thing absolutely, "it was a very paltry thing" and so forth. It is not possible for me to say that with such an attitude on the part of the defendant the matter could have been settled, seeing that even when the case was in Court nothing was offered in respect of the matter for which a decree has been given. However, it is not necessary to further pursue the matter, for in my opinion the award of damages should be increased.

The learned Judge has next totally deprived the successful plaintiff of the 2nd day's costs on the ground that the case could certainly have been settled the preceding day. There is nothing in the record which supports this. On the contrary all the evidence goes to show that up to the last the defendant was unwilling to pay any compensation over and above the out of pocket expenses.

It is stated in the ground of appeal, and not denied, that at the conclusion of the opening of the case for the plaintiff the learned Judge remarked that he supposed that if the plaintiff would not take his out of pocket expenses only, there was no chance of settlement to which view the defendant's Counsel expressed his assent and that it was only in reply that Counsel for the defendant argued that no sum whatever should be paid but, if any, Rs. 100 was ample. As a fact these contentions were overruled and Rs. 300 were given by the Court. It is thus clear that the action was necessary as regards this compensation and that the learned Judge must be in error when he says that the case could have been settled on the first day, which is his reason for totally depriving the plaintiff of the 2nd day's costs.

As regard the amount of damages it is, of course, difficult to make an accurate assessment in such matters. One can only deal with approximate figures. The learned Judge is of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to only a small compensation, which he fixes at Rs. 300. In my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to something more substantial. If as the learned Judge holds and I agree Rs. 300 is a small sum, then Rs. 900 roughly represents in figures the view I take of the case as regards suffering and injury, accepting Dr. Cameron's evidence as to the permanency of injury.

In my opinion also there are no sufficient grounds for depriving the plaintiff of any of his costs, as the action was necessary and no unnecessary increase of costs has been shown by reason of the fact that the plaintiff claimed more than Greaves, J., has given him or which I would award him. As matters now stand, the plaintiff, whose claim is admitted to be bona fide though excessive, is actually out of pocket in seeking compensation for injury to and suffering of his child against the defendant who has all along contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to anything on this account. If on this head the plaintiff has claimed too much, the defendant has, on the other hand, offered and contended that the plaintiff is entitled to nothing.

I would, therefore, decree the appeal with costs and setting aside the judgment and decree of Greaves, J., decree the suit for the total sum of Rs. 1,200, with full costs.

[The Judges composing the Bench having differed in opinion, and a question having arisen whether in an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent, such as this, clause 36 of the Letters Patent or section 98 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies the following judgments were delivered:—]

SANDERSON, C. J.—For the purpose of today it is immaterial whether clause 36 of the Letters Patent or section 98 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies. If clause 36 of the Letters Patent applies, then the Chief Justice's judgment prevails. On the other hand, if section 98 of the Code applies, my learned brother and I are in agreement to this extent, namely, that the words in the decree, "other than the costs of this day's hearing," should be deleted.

Consequently the result is that the decree of the Court below is confirmed, subject to the variation that the words in the decree "other than costs of this day's hearing" are deleted.

As regards the costs of the appeal, section 98 of the Code does not apply and the judgment of the Chief Justice prevails. Therefore each party will pay his or their own costs in the appeal.

There will be no costs for to-day.

Usurious Loans Act (X of 1918), s. 3 (1)—Suit on bond—Court, jurisdiction of, to consider merits of transaction—Interest, progressive increase of, whether unfair.

In a suit to recover on a bond in which the defendant does not appear, the Court has jurisdiction, under section 3 (1) of the Usurious Loans Act, to consider the merits of the transaction. [p. 433, col. 2.]

Where in such a suit the Court finds that the provision as to payment of interest is substantially unfair, the case is a fit one in which the transaction between the parties may be re-opened, and relief given in respect of excessive interest. [p. 434, col. 1.]

Where interest on the whole sum borrowed continues at the rate fixed, though the principal is being progressively discharged by instalments, the provision as to interest is altogether unconscionable and unfair and will not be enforced. [p. 433, col. 2]

Mr. D. A. Ghasvalla, for the Plaintiffs.

JUDGMENT.—In this suit, the plaintiff, a Poona money lender, seeks to recover on a bond executed by the defendant on the 7th of September 1918. The considertion of the bond is a cash advance of Rs. 5,000, and the obligor agrees to re-pay Rs. 8,400, i. e., Rs. 5,000 principal and Rs. 3,400 interest. The interest is assessed at 2 per cent. per mensem, i. e., Rs. 100 a month for Rs. 5,000; and it is calculated in advance for thirty four months. The total amount of Rs. 8,400 is then re payable in thirty-three instalments of Rs. 250 and one 34th instalment of Rs. 150. Thus the principal is re-paid in thirty-three instalments of Rs. 150 and one instalment of Rs. 50 and the interest is re paid in thirty-four instalments of Rs. 100.

The first three instalments have been recovered by a suit in the Court of Small Causes. The present suit is for six instalments from January to June 1919.

The defendant does not appear but though the suit is ex parte, the Court has, under section 3 (1) of the Usurious Loans Act, 1918, jurisdiction to consider the merits of the transaction.

The bond professes to charge interest at 2 per cent. per mensem, but the scheme of the bond is that the interest on the whole sum of Rs. 5,000 should continue to be paid at this rate though the principal is being progressively discharged by instalments. The obligor of the bond, therefore, continues to pay interest on money which he has actually re paid. This provision seems to me altogether unconscionable and unfair. Moreover, the effect of it is that though at the end of the first month the interest paid, is at the rate of 2 per cent. per mensem yet this rate progressively increases until at the end of the 33rd month Rs. 100 interest is paid for a balance of Rs. 200 or at the end of the 34th month Rs. 100 interest is paid for a balance of Rs 50. The rates of interest at the end of the 33rd and 34th months work out to the preposterous rates of 50 per cent. per mensem and Rs. 200 per cent. per mensem.

Under the Act, the Court may re-open the transaction and relieve the debtor of all liability in respect of excessive interest if two conditions are fulfilled. These are that the Court has reason to believe (a) that the interest is excessive, and (b) that the transaction was as between the parties thereto substantially unfair.

On the first point, there can, of course, be no doubt. As to the second, it may be said that the defendant is a member of the Indian Finance Department and that he must have understood the terms of the bond and that his agreement is evidence that the transaction was not unfair. But the Explanation to section 3 enacts that interest may of itself be sufficient evidence that a transaction was substantially unfair. The Legislature has adopted the view of Lord Loreburn in Samuel v. Newbold (1) that excess of interest may in itself rebut any presumption of reasonableness arising from the agreement of the party. Moreover, I have already found that the transaction which involves payment of interest on money, which in fact has been re-paid, is substantially unfair. I, therefore think this is a fit case for re-opening the transaction between the parties and giving relief in respect of excessive interest.

I do not and cannot disturb the transaction so far as it has been concluded by the decree of the Small Causes Court in regard to the first three instalments. As regards the six instalments in suit there is no occasion to disturb the provision for repayment of the principal by instalments of Rs. 150 per mensem.

The loan was made on personal security and I may take it that the rate of 2 per cent. per mensem was reasonable in view of the risk incurred. But the progressive increase of this rate and the provision which makes money chargeable with interest after it has been re-paid, is both excessive and substantially unfair. I, therefore, disallow interest on sums actually re-paid. This will not make much difference in the present suit, but will make a considerable reduction when the account comes to be taken of the future instalments. If the account were taken in this way, the interest chargeable on the six instalments in suit would not be Rs. 100 per mensem but would be reduced as follows:—

| Instalment. | Principal unpaid. | Interest at 2 per c. p. m. |
| January | 4,550 | 91 |
| February | 4,400 | 88 |
| March | 4,250 | 85 |
| April | 4,100 | 82 |
| May | 3,950 | 79 |
| June | 3,800 | 76 |
| | | 501 instead of 600 |

But as no instalment of principal has been paid the plaintiff is entitled to 2 per cent. per mensem on Rs. 4,550 due in January.

Decree, therefore, for the plaintiff for Rs. 900, interest at 2 per cent. per mensem on Rs. 4,550 from the 10th of January 1919 till judgment. Costs and interest on judgment at 6 per cent.

Decree accordingly.

Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act (VI B. C. of 1908), s. 87—Decision by Revenue Officer—Appeal to Judicial Commissioner—Second appeal, whether lies.

No second appeal lies to the High Court from the decision of the Judicial Commissioner passed on appeal against the decision of a Revenue Officer under section 87 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. [p. 435, col. 2.]

Appeals against the decision of the Judicial Commissioner, Chota Nagpur, dated the 23rd May 1918, affirming a decision of the Settlement Officer, Chota Nagpur, dated the 24th April 1917.

Messrs. Kulwant Sahay and Shambhu Saran, for the Appellant.

Mr. B. C. Mitter, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SULTAN AHMED J.—These appeals arise out of four suits, which were instituted under section 87 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act asking that the fair rents settled under section 85 should be set aside and that the state of affairs which prevailed up to the fair rent settlement should be restored. It appears that the fair rents were settled by an Assistant Settlement Officer under section 85 before the final publication of the Record of Rights in January 1916. Against his orders appeals were preferred by the appellants, but it was held in 1915 that no appeal lay and the appeals were consequently dismissed.

After the appeals were dismissed and apprently before the final publication, the appellants filed applications under section 89 to the Settlement Officer. The Settlement Officer took up the matter and considered the question afresh. He eventually upheld the decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer who had fixed the fair rents under section 85.

Against the decision of the Settlement Officer the plaintiffs appealed to the Commissioner, who decided in August 1916 that the appeals were incompetent because the Settlement Officer had not revised the order made by the Assistant Settlement Officer under section 85. On the 14th August 1916 the suits out of which these appeals arise were instituted before the Settlement Officer under section 87. The Settlement Officer held that the suits were barred by the provisions of section 258 of the Act. Appeals were preferred to the Judicial Commissioner of Chota Nagpur, who held that all the suits were barred by limitation. Against this decision of the Judicial Commissioner these appeals have been filed.

A preliminary objection has been raised that no second appeal lies. Under section 87 clause 2: "An appeal shall lie in the prescribed manner and to the prescribed officer from decisions passed under sub-section 1." Under the rules framed by the Lieutenant Governor in exercise of the power conferred by clause 8 of section 264 of the Act, appeals from decisions of Revenue Officers under section 87 (1) lie to the Judicial Commissioner. There is, however, no provision in the rules that any second appeal will lie to this Court. The only section in the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act where provision has been made for a second appeal to this Court is section 224, clause 2, which runs as follows:— "A second appeal shall lie to the High Court under Chapter XLII of the Code of Civil Procedure from any appellate decree passed by the Judicial Commissioner under this Chapter or from any order passed by him on appeal under section 215, sub section 3." This provision is to be found in Chapter XVI so that a second appeal shall lie from any appellate decree under Chapter XVI. Section 87 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act does not fall within this Chapter and, therefore, there is no provision in the Act which provides for a second appeal in a case instituted under section 87. It is, however, contended that under section 100 of the Code of Civil Procedure a second appeal lies to this Court. Section 100 provides for an appeal from an appellate decree passed by any Court subordinate to the High Court, and the Judicial Commissioner's Court being undoubtedly subordinate to the High Court, it is submitted that a second appeal lies from a decree of the Judicial Commissioner. It will, however, be noticed that section 87 clearly refers to a "decision" and not to a "decree," and the first appeal which has been provided for under clause 2 of section 87 is from the decision passed under sub section 1. There is no provision for the preparation of any decree under that section. It is, however, urged that the word "decision" in section 87, clause 2, is synonymous with the term "decree" as defined in section 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Like the Bengal Tenancy Act the words "decision" and "decree" have been used differently in different sections in the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act, and I am not prepared to accept the argument that "decision" means "decree." I may point out that even under section 107 of the Bengal Tenancy Act the Legislature has deliberately enacted that decision "shall be deemed" to be a decree and not that "it is a decree." There is no corresponding provision in the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act where "decision" has even been deemed to be a decree. Section 100 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides for an appeal from an appellate "decree", is, therefore, inapplicable to a "decision" passed on appeal by the Judicial Commissioner under section 87. It may also be forcibly argued that by clear implication a second appeal in a suit under section 87 is barred under section 224 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. The view that I have taken is clearly supported by the decision in the case of Raghubir Sahi v. Protap Udoy Nath Sahi Deo (1), where it was held that no second appeal lies to the High Court from the decision of a Judicial Commissioner passed on appeal against the decision of a Revenue Officer under section 87 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. A different view, however, seems to have been taken in this Court in the case of Lal Man Naik v. Kanhaya Lall Pandey (2). This decision was of a single Judge and his attention does not appear to have been drawn to the decision of the Divisional Bench of the Calcutta High Court, above referred to. We are, therefore, clearly of opinion that no second appeal lies and the preliminary objection must prevail.

(1) 13 Ind. Cas. 193; 39 C. 241; 16 C. W. N. 294; 15 C. L. J. 145.

Having, however, heard the case on all the points, I now proceed to consider the question of limitation. Under section 87 a suit must be instituted within three months from the date of final publication. It is admitted in this case that there was seven months' interval between the final publication and the institution of the suits. The plaintiff, however, brings to his aid section 14 of the Limitation Act, which has been expressly made applicable by section 230 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. He claims that under this section he could deduct as a matter of right the time spent in conducting the case under section 89 before the Settlement Officer and the appeal from the Settlement Officer's decision thereunder before the Commissioner. Under section 14 of the Limitation Act, it is only when a civil proceeding is prosecuted in a Court which has no jurisdiction to entertain it, that the time spent in prosecuting it may be deducted when calculating the period of limitation of a suit subsequently instituted. True it is that the Commissioner could not entertain any appeal, but it is not contended that the Settlement Officer had no jurisdiction to entertain the application under section 89, and as the period of limitation had admittedly expired before the appeal to the Commissioner was lodged, section 14 of the Limitation Act clearly has no application; and once section 14 of the Limitation Act is held to be inapplicable the suits must be held to be barred.

The result is that these appeals must be dismissed with costs.

COUTTS, J.—I agree.

Appeal against the decree of the 1st Additional District Judge, Akola, dated the 17th January 1917, confirming the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Basim, dated the 26th July 1916.

Mr. M. V. Joshi, for the Appellants.

Mr. G. R. Pradhan, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It appears to me that the Courts below have decided the case upon a misreading of the judgment of Bose, Additional Judicial Commissionor, in Moti v. Kanhya (1).

On the 23rd June 1916 the Court ordered process-fee to be paid in three days. It was paid on the 1st July. Three witnesses were duly served, one on the 11th July and the other two on the 15th. They were to attend the Court at Basim on the 26th July. They did not appear and the Court refused to grant an adjournment.

Under Order XLVIII, rule 1 (2), the Court-fee chargeable for service of summons shall be paid within the time to be fixed before the process is issued. For non-compliance with the Court's order, the plaintiff-appellant lost his right to have an adjournment. This is all that was decided in Moti v. Kanhya (1). But the further question here arises whether the witnesses were served in "sufficient time" to allow them a reasonable time for preparation and for travelling to the place at which their attendance is required (Order XVI, rule 9). If this is answered in the affirmative, their non-attendance is not due to the delay in the payment of the process fee. Whilst the litigant has no right to an adjournment in such a case, the Court has under Order XVII, rule 1, the power to adjourn the hearing for sufficient cause. The exercise of this discretionary power is liable to correction by an Appellate Court in a proper case. In Kaji Ahmad v. Kaji Mahamad (2) West J., says:—

"If there has been delay and want of diligence through which witnesses not having been served in good time are not present, the Court will properly refuse to adjourn the hearing for their attendance, even though they have been summoned."

In Meti v. Kanhya (1) witnesses were not served through the plaintiff's negligence and the question did not arise as to what should be done when they are served in sufficient time. The law does not contemplate the punishment of a party for delay in paying the process fee, if it is his good fortune to have the witnesses served in sufficient time notwithstanding such delay, and, in my judgment, the Court's discretion will not be rightly exercised if in such a case the attendance of the witnesses is not enforced or an adjournment granted for the purpose. The judgments of the Courts below seem to indicate that they thought that they are precluded by the ruling of this Court from granting an adjournment merely because there was delay in paying the process-fee. It will be now for the lower Court to decide whether any of the witnesses were served in sufficient time within the meaning of Order XVI, rule 9. The distance from the place of residence to the Court, the time of the year, the mode of conveyance available, the occupation of the witnesses, these are some of the factors to be taken in to account.

The decree of the lower Appellate Court is reversed and the appeal remanded to that Court for a fresh decision on the point indicated above. Costs of this second appeal will follow the event.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XX, r. 2—Judgment, written by officer who heard evidence, pronounced by successor—Prejudice—Objection to procedure, absence of—Judgment, whether legal.

The mere fact that a judgment written by an officer who heard and recorded the evidence is pronounced by his successor would not render the judgment illegal, unless the parties affected are prejudiced and objection to the procedure is taken promptly at the earliest possible opportunity. [p. 440, col. 2; p. 441, col. 1.]

Appeals from the decision of the District Judge, Cuttack, dated the 11th July 1918, in Original Suit No. 6 of 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. P. N. Chatterjee, (with him Messrs. S. N. Chatterjee, and S. N. Roy), for the Appellants.—In this case Mr. Williams, District Judge of Cuttack, tried the case and heard the arguments on the 5th of June. He then ceased to be the District Judge. On the 11th of July the judgment was written by Mr. Williams and signed by him as H. W. Williams, without any designation. The judgment was not written by the District Judge of Cuttack, nor signed by him Order XX, rule 3, says that a judgment shall be dated and signed by the Judge in open Court, but in this case there is no compliance with the provision.

The testator was seriously ill and was semi-unconscious when the Will is alleged to have been executed. A heavy onus lies on the applicant, and he has failed to discharge it.

The Hon'ble Mr. M. S. Das (with him Mr. B.N. Das), for the Respondents.—Order XX, rule 1, lays down the procedure where the judgment is delivered and pronounced by the same Judge. Rule 2 lays down that it may be pronounced by the successor, but rule 3 lays down the procedure to be followed in pronouncing the judgment under rule 1.

The question had been settled as early as 1872 in Musammat Parbutty v. Musammat Higgin (1), which was on all fours with the present case, and the principle was followed in the later decisions of Sundur Kaur v. Oahandreshwar Prasad Narain Singh (2) and Satyendra Nath Ray Chaudhuri v. Kastura Kumari Ghatwalin (3).

It might be at most an irregularity, as has been held in Fort Gloster Jute Manufacturing Co. v. Chandra Kumar Das (4), the latest decision on the point, and cannot be taken into account unless the parties are seriously prejudiced and only when objections to the procedure are taken at the earliest opportunity after notice.

JUDGMENT.—These two appeals arise out of a judgment of the District Judge of Cuttack, dated the 11th July 1918, whereby he granted Letters of Administration with a copy of the Will annexed to the petitioner, Lokenath Das, in respect of the properties left by the late Ram Prapanna Das. Appeal No. 10 is on behalf of Lakhiama Jiu, and Appeal No. 12 is on behalf of Sudersan Mata and her two minor sons, Narsingh Das and Krishna Das, who were caveators before the Judge. The Will, which is the subject-matter of this appeal, purports to have been executed by Ram Prapanna Das on the 4th November 1917. He died on the 6th November 1917. Upon his death, the Sub-Inspector of Police took possession of the property, as it appeared to him that there were disputes regarding the succession to his properties. The claims preferred by Lakiama Jiu and Sudersan Mata were registered as Miscellaneous Intestate Claim Cases Nos. 137 of 1917 and of 1918 respectively. The Letters of Administration case was numbered 6. These cases were disposed of by the same judgment.

The Will purports to be in favour of the respondents Lokenath Das and one Narsingh Das, minor son of the appellant Sudersan Mata. The main ground upon which this appeal is contested by the appellants is that the Will in question was not executed by the deceased Ram Prapanna Das, and that he was not in a sound disposing state of mind at the time when the Will is said to have been executed.

The case of Lakhiama Jiu further was that the deceased died intestate and the properties left by him would devolve upon the Malik of the Muth of Narsingh Kashari in Puri of which the deceased was a Chela, and Lakhiama Jiu is the present holder of that Muth. The case of Sudersan Mata, who acts also on behalf of her minor sons Narsingh and Krishna Das, was that she was the lawfully married wife of the deceased and that the minor sons were lawfully begotten by the deceased and the properties of Ram Prapanna Das, therefore, devolved upon Sudersan Mata and her minor sons.

It would thus appear that there were three distinct claimants to the properties of the deceased: the respondent Lokenath Das on the strength of the Will in question, Sudersan Mata with her minor sons and Lakhiama Jiu, who claimed to succeed to the exclusion of each other on the ground that he, Ram Prapanna Das, died intestate.

The deceased was ill for a few days before his death; according to Sudersan Mata ten or twelve days; according to Lokenath Das seven or eight days; Lakhiama Jiu does not give any definite idea upon this point. He was suffering from fever and cold and rheumatism and was a fairly aged man. His condition became worse on the 3rd November, when, according to the evidence of Lokenath Das, he was not able to come out of his room. Lakhiama Jiu does not appear to have attended the deceased during his illness and contented herself with sending some of her attendants to look after him. Sudersan Mata appears to have been in attendance throughout. On the 3rd November, her case is the deceased expressed a desire to execute a Will in her favour and in favour of the two minor sons, and for that purpose she gave a sovereign to Lokenath Das to purchase stamp and prepare the Will, but that the Will could not be signed or properly executed as the deceased became unconscious on the evening of the 3rd. She however, says that according to her wishes and in consultation with Lokenath Das and others the Sub-Registrar of Puri was called to have the Will registered, but that when the Sub-Registrar came he found the deceased in a semi-unconscious state and hence he was unable to obtain from him any statement regarding the Will in question. Sudersan Mata believed, according to her, that a Will was executed by the deceased in her favour and in favour of her sons, and she actually demanded the Will after the death of the deceased from Lokenath Das and was told that the Will was deposited with the Sub-Registrar and subsequently came to know that it was not so deposited. The case of the respondent is that the deceased was indebted to one Michhu Misra, witness No. 3 on behalf of the petitioner, and that the deceased was anxious to pay off the debt, naturally because he felt that his end was coming near and for that purpose he wanted to have a Kobala executed in favour of Lokenath Das. Not only a stamp for the Kobala was purchased, but as a matter of fact a Kobala was executed and the thumb impression of the deceased was taken thereon. This Kobala is Exhibit 6, and bears date the 3rd of November 1917. It being late in the evening on Saturday the 3rd November, the Kobala could not be presented for registration on that date. On Sunday morning sometime about 9 A. M. Lokenath Das and Michhu Misra went to the Sub-Registrar's residence and asked him to visit the deceased and to register the document. The Sub-Registrar refused to do so as it was Sunday and informed them that if it were a Will he could do so. Lokenath and Michhu Misra returned to the deceased and told him what the Sub-Registrar had told them. Thereupon the deceased expressed his desire to execute a Will. A Will was accordingly written out and executed. Thumb impression was affixed upon it between 9 and 10 A. M. These persons went back to the Sub-Registrar at 3-30 P. M. The Sub-Registrar came at 4-20 P. M. and found the deceased in a semi unconscious state as already stated.

The question is whether, in these circumstances of the case, the evidence on behalf of the respondent is such as can be accepted to prove that the deceased was in a sound disposing state of mind and that he actually did execute the Will. The Will in question was attested by Michhu Misra and Kashinath Misra; Jagabandhu Chhotra is the scribe. The evidence of Michhu Misra appears to be convincing. He is a Municipal Commissioner, holds a Zamindari, the sadar jama of which is Rs. 1,500, and he pays income-tax of Rs. 900. He clearly states that the Will was written under the instructions of the deceased, it was read to, and understood by, him; he then touched the pen and Jagabandhu read karamala santak for him and Ram Prapanna Das placed his thumb impression on the Will. This man had been in consultation with the deceased at least from the 3rd when the Kobala was executed, he attended him on the morning of the 4th, he went to the Sub-Registrar and came back and was also present when the Will was executed. There is absolutely no reason why the evidence of this witness should not be accepted. Nothing has been suggested, either in the cross-examination or in the argument of the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellant, why the evidence of this witness should not be accepted. Jagabandhu Chhotra, the scribe of the document, is clear in his statement that Ram Prapanna was in his senses when the Will was read out to him. This is direct evidence of the mental condition of the testator and of his having executed the Will in question.

The circumstances in the case do not at all, in any way, shake the credit of these witnesses. The first and the most important circumstance is the intention of the testator to execute a Will. Sudersan Mata admits that this was his intention and also asserts that the Will which was executed was actually in her favour. The next circumstance of importance is the anxiety of the deceased to pay off his debts. He actually executed a Kobala in favour of the respondent on the 3rd November in order to pay off his debt, but it proved infructuous as it could not be executed on the 4th, that day being Sunday. This intention to pay off his debts has been given effect to by the Will and the respondent actually paid off the debts of the testator. The property that was intended to be sold to him by the Kobala has been given to him by the Will.

There is no doubt that the deceased had become hopeless of his life, as is admitted by the witnesses on behalf of Lakhiama Jiu and also from the statement made in the Will itself. No doubt, when the Sub-Registrar came on the evening of the 4th he found the deceased in an unconscious state of mind; this circumstance is in favour of the appellants, but the effect of it is only to cast a heavier onus upon the respondent to prove that the deceased was in a fit condition of mind to execute the Will. That onus, to my mind, has been amply discharged by the evidence on the record.

I would, therefore, agree with the finding of the Court below, and hold that the Will was properly executed by the deceased, and that he was in a sound disposing state of mind.

Our attention has been drawn to the fact that the Will ignores the second son of Sudersan Mata, Krishna Das, and that nothing has at all been given to him. From this it is argued that it is unlikely that the testator would have executed such a Will. It is impossible to know the reason why the testator did give all the property to Narsingh and not to Krishna Das. Sudersan Mata claims to be the lawfully married wife of the deceased, but the learned Court below has held, and rightly, upon the evidence in the case that she was no better than a kept mistress. If the Will is properly proved to have been executed by the deceased, it is no business of ours to enquire into the reasons for giving certain property to persons named in the Will, and not to the second son of Sudersan Mata. This contention is overruled.

The result is that the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed.

The learned Vakil has, however, contended that the judgment in this case is illegal inasmuch as Mr. Williams, who heard the case and is said to have written out and signed the judgment, was not the District Judge of Cuttack at the time when the judgment was pronounced.

The trial of the case was over on the 5th June 1918, when the arguments on both sides were heard by Mr. Williams. Mr. Williams then ceased to be the District Judge of Cuttack, and Mr. Allanson succeeded him. On the 11th July 1918, the judgment in question was written out by Mr. Williams, and was received by Mr. Allanson "for favour of pronouncement." On the 29th of July 1918 the judgment was after notice to the parties pronounced by Mr. Allanson. In accordance with the judgment, Mr. Allanson ordered the suit to be decreed, and on the 3rd August the decree was signed and sealed by Mr. Allanson.

The contention of the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellant has been that Mr. Williams had no jurisdiction to write the judgment and send it to Cuttack to be pronounced by the District Judge of this Court. Reliance is placed upon Order XX, rule 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but that rule has obviously no application inasmuch as it simply says that "The judgment shall be dated and signed by the Judge in open Court at the time of pronouncing it and when once signed, shall not afterwards be altered or added to, save as provided by section 152 or on review." That rule relates to the case when the judgment is pronounced by the very Judge who wrote it, but does not cover the case where the judgment is written by one officer and is pronounced by another. To meet this difficulty, rule 2 of the same Order has provided that a Judge may pronounce a judgment written but not pronounced by his predecessor. Here Mr. Allanson pronounced the judgment written by Mr. Williams, his predecessor, but not pronounced by him. There was some difference of opinion at one time, but it was settled so long ago as in the year 1872 by the decision in the case of Musammat Parbutty v. Musammat Higgin (1). To meet the difficulties created by the earlier authorities in V Madras High Court Rulings and Mahomed Akil v. Assadunnissa Bibee and Mutty Lall Sen Gywal v. Deshkar Roy (5), the above rule in the above Court was made clear. The recent decisions of the Calcutta High Court also support the view which I have taken: vide Satyendra Nath Ray Chaudhuri v. Kastura Kumari Ghatwalin (3) and Fort Gloster Jute Manufacturing Co. v. Chandra Kumar Das (4). The latter decision lays down that, at most, it would only amount to an irregularity, and that applying the principle governing cases of irregularities, it is one that cannot be taken seriously into consideration, unless it prejudices the parties affected thereby, and an objection to the procedure is taken promptly at the earliest possible opportunity. In the present case, the evidence was heard by Mr. Williams, and he was, therefore, the best person to write the judgment. He did write it and sent it for pronouncement to his successor, Mr. Allanson. The parties were given notice thereof, but did not make any objection. Therefore, there was no prejudice at all.

Attention has also been drawn to an unreported decision of a Division Bench of this Court, Coutts and Adami, JJ, in the case of Benodini Dasi v. Bholanath (6). The authorities quoted above do not appear to have been cited to the learned Judges, nor does their attention seem to have been invited to Order XX, rule 2.

The result is that the appeals are dismissed with costs.

Where the widow of an occupancy tenant transfers her right of occupancy to her daughter and gets her recorded as the tenant, such transfer has the effect of determining absolutely her life-estate as a widow and she cannot, on the death of the daughter, resume that right [p. 442, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the order of the Commissioner, Agra Division, dated the 25th of September 1919.

JUDGMENT.

HARRISON, J. M.—(February 21, 1920.)—This is a Zamindar's second appeal in an ejectment suit in which the circumstances are somewhat unusual.

From 1309 F. until recently the recorded occupancy tenant was one Musammat Rania and recently the original defendants in the suit were recorded as her sub tenants. The Zamindar sued to eject the latter as the recorded occupancy tenant had died without any heir entitled to succeed her under section 22 of the Agra Tenancy Act. The present respondent, Musammat Phul Kuar, applied to be made a party and claimed that the occupancy holding had devolved upon her in succession to her deceased husband and that she had got her daughter, Musammat Rania, who was herself a widow, recorded as tenant simply to console and give her a means of livelihood. Her claim was in short that she had herself been the occupancy tenant ever since her husband's death and her daughter's name was only recorded as a matter of form. The Commissioner in first appeal accepted her contention and held that she had all along been the occupancy tenant in law, especially noting that she had never abandoned or surrendered the holding. He also laid stress on the fact that from the moment that the daughter was recorded as tenant she was recorded as occupancy tenant

The Zamindar in his appeal insists that the transaction between mother and daughter was in the nature of a transfer which was accepted by the Zamindar. It is in fact plain that throughout the Zamindar accepted the daughter as his tenant. The receipts he gave were always in her name and there was no mention of the mother. There is on the other hand a certain amount of evidence that both the women had depended upon the holding for their subsistence; but it is plain that whole of the occupancy holding was made over to the daughter without any portion being reserved for the mother.

For the appellant it is argued that a widow enjoying a widow's estate is entitled to accelerate the succession of a reversioner and I am referred to Ram Krishan's work on Hindu Law, Volume II, page 361. This principle of relinquishment or acceleration is also alluded to in paragraph 638A of Mayne's Hindu Law, 8th Edition, at the bottom of page 892. It appears from that when such acceleration is effected, the widow's life-estate determines absolutely. Here from the papers on the record it seems that the transfer to the daughter took place from the beginning of 1309 F., that is to say, while Act XII of 1881 was still in force and the succession to a tenancy devolved as if it were land. It is argued that the daughter, being the next in succession after the widow, could legally be clothed with the rights of the former male tenant. I see no reason to reject this contention; and if it is accepted, the mother could not on the death of the daughter resume the right which has been transferred.

For the respondent it is argued that the transaction was not really a transfer but it was merely adopted as a means of securing the daughter's livelihood. I cannot accept this contention. The daughter's livelihood would have been secured equally well if the mother had retained her occupancy right, and her deliberate act in getting the daughter recorded as the tenant must be taken rather as a precaution in case she, the mother, should predecease her daughter, because unless the daughter outlived the mother, the tenancy would in all probability cease on the mother's death. It is true that when the transaction was carried out, Act XII of 1881 was still in force and the daughter herself had a chance of succeeding if it had remained in force, but very possibly the parties had knowledge of the impending change in the law which had been a matter of common knowledge for some years previously. Moreover, in case of Shambhu Narain Singh the v. Jagdat Singh (1), quoted at page 131 of Agarwala's 6th edition of the Tenancy Act, it was held that the deliberate causing of mutation of names amounted to a transfer, and similarly it is pointed out that even if a tenant was not authorised to transfer, there is nothing to prevent a landholder from recognising the transferee as his tenant in place of transferor from the date of the transfer. Various rulings to this effect are quoted at page 132 of the same publication.

(1) A. W. N. (1886) 305.

On the whole, therefore, I incline to the view that the mother has lost her rights and cannot now claim them. I would therefore, set aside the decree of the Commissioner and restore that of the Assistant Collector with costs in favour of the appellant in both Appellate Courts.

HOPKINS, S. M.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

CIVIL PETITION No. 69 OF 1920.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 5 —Security, failure to furnish—Execution of decree, whether can be stayed—Duty of judgment-debtor—Order staying execution, whether can be made after decree has been executed.

A Court cannot stay execution of a decree upon a mere speculation of a vague character. [p. 444, col. 1.]

A judgment-debtor is not entitled to have an order for stay of execution when the security required by the law has not been given. [p. 444, col. 1.]

It is the duty of the judgment-debtor to ask the Court to fix the amount of security which he has to furnish in order to get a stay of execution of the decree. [p. 444, col. 1.]

No order for stay of execution can be made after the decree has been executed. [p. 444, col. 2.]

Petition under Order XLI, rule 5, Civil Procedure Code, for stay of execution proceedings pending decision by the High Court of the Appeal Case noted above.

FACTS.—Plaintiff obtained a decree for possession of a certain area of land on 17th December 1917. On 2 th January 1920 he filed an application for execution of the decree. The defendant had in the meanwhile appealed to the High Court and his appeal had been admitted. On 2nd February 1920 he made an application to the High Court, praying that execution of the decree should be stayed pending the decision of the appeal. On this application the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Abdul Raoof passed the following order on 4th February 1920:

"Let notice go to the opposite side to show cause why this application should not be granted. Stay execution meanwhile on the applicant giving security to the satisfaction of the Court executing the decree."

On 7th February a letter issued from the High Court asking the executing Court to stay execution and forward the records to the High Court. This letter was not complied with and several reminders were sent, and it was not till 8th May that the records were forwarded to the High Court. In the meantime the decree had been executed and possession had been given to the decree holder.

Mr. Abdul Rashid, for the Petitioners.—The lower Court disregarded your Lordship's ad interim order of the 4th February and delivered possession to the decree-holder in spite of it. The explanation given by the lower Court is that the High Court's letter was mislaid. Even if that were so, there were several reminders and they must have reached the lower Court.

[RAOOF, J.—I shall not go into that question. If you establish your right to a stay on the merits, I shall set aside the proceedings of the lower Court subsequent to the date of my order as ultra vires; if on the other hand you fail to establish your right on the merits, your application will be dismissed. Mr. Zafrulla Khan, it is for you to show cause why execution should not be stayed.]

Mr. Zafrulla Khan, for the Respondent.—Before a stay of execution can be ordered, it is incumbent upon the judgment-debtor to satisfy your Lordship that substantial loss may result to him unless execution is stayed [Order XLI, rule 5 (3) (a), Civil Procedure Code.]

In this case there is no longer any apprehension of loss to the judgment-debtor. The judgment-debtor has gathered his crops and possession was delivered to me before fresh crops were sown by the judgment-debtor. If the land now remains with me, no loss will be caused to the judgment-debtor. The land cannot run away and in case the decree in my favour is set aside by the High Court the land will be restored to the defendant. In the meantime having obtained a decree I am entitled to the fruits thereof.

Again the application for stay cannot be granted unless your Lordship is satisfied that the applicant has furnished security as required by Order XLI, rule 5 (3) (c) of the Civil Procedure Code. Your Lordship's order of 4th February was conditional on the judgment-debtor furnishing security. No securityhas been furnished by the judgment-debtor.

Lastly, the decree having been executed there is nothing to stay. An order staying execution can only be made during the pendency of an execution proceeding. Here no such proceeding is pending. The land is now in my possession and I have sown crops upon it.

Mr. Abdul Rashid, for the Petitioners.—It is the practice of this Court to stay execution in cases of immoveable property in order to prevent the decree-holder from alienating the property pendente lite. In this case if the decree-holder is allowed to retain possession of the land, he might sell it and I should then have to bring a second suit.

[RAOOF, J.—There is no suggestion that the decree-holder is contemplating to sell the property. If he sells it you will be protected by the rule of lis pendens.]

Security was not given because when I offered to give security, the lower Court refused to take it on the ground that it had received no order from the High Court. This was not my fault and your Lordship ought to set aside the lower Court's proceedings as ultra vires. The lower Court had no jurisdiction to proceed with the execution proceedings after your Lordship had passed an ad interim order staying execution.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan, in reply.—The mere fact that possession of the land has been delivered to me gives me no right to sell the property, and the absence of possession would not prevent me from selling it if I were determined to sell it. But I have no intention to sell it.

Your Lordship's ad interim order of 4th February was never brought to the notice of the lower Court. The judgment-debtor should have made an application to the lower Court, stating that such order had been made and offering to furnish security. No such application was made to the lower Court.

The order of 4th February was conditional and such an order does not become operative till the condition is fulfilled.

ORDER.—On the 4th February 1920, when I issued a Rule, crops belonging to the judgment-debtor were standing on the land. Under clause (a), sub-rule 3, rule 5 of Order XLI, Civil Procedure Code, the judgment-debtor stood the chance of suffering a substantial loss if the decree for possession were to be allowed to be executed. On the matter coming up for final disposal before me to day, Mr. Zafrulla Khan has opposed the application for stay of execution on two grounds, namely:—

(1) That as contemplated by clause (c), no order for stay of execution should be made because security has not been given by the judgment-debtor; and (2) that the crops have already been gathered by the judgment-debtor and, therefore, he stands no chance of suffering any substantial loss.

In my opinion there is force in this argument. The decree-holder having obtained his decree is entitled to have the fruits of it. The subject-matter of the litigation was land. If possession is delivered to the decree holder over the land, no substantial loss apparently can arise merely by the fact of delivery of possession of the land to the decree-holder. It is, however, suggested that possibly the decree-holder after getting possession over the land may transfer it to third parties. There is no suggestion, however, either in the application or in the affidavit that the decree-holder is contemplating such a course. We cannot refuse to execute a decree upon a mere speculation of a vague character. There is also force in the contention that the judgment-debtor is not entitled to have an order for stay, because the security required by the law has not been given. It is contended on behalf of the judgment-debtor that if the order granting ad interim injunction had reached the Court below and that Court had called upon him to furnish security, the judgment-debtor would have furnished security as required by the law. It was, however, to the interest of the judgment-debtor—rather his clear duty—that he should have gone to the Court and asked it to fix the amount of security which he was to furnish in order to get a stay of the execution of the decree. That duty he evidently neglected. In my opinion there is no reason why the execution of the decree should be stayed. I discharge the Rule but without costs under the special circumstances of this case.

Over and above what I have already said, there is another difficulty which cannot easily be got over. As mentioned in my previous order, dated the 20th May 1920, the decree has already been executed and the decree-holder has been put in possession of the land decreed to him. There is, therefore, nothing to stay now. It is suggested that I should order the execution proceedings, subsequent to my order of the 20th May 1920 to be set aside. There are obvious difficulties in adopting the suggested course. Mr. Zafrulla Khan for the decree-holder says that his client has sown Kharif crops on the land. It will not be right to dispossess him under the circumstances, specially as under the decree he has a right to get possession of the land. The application for stay is, therefore, dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 151—Remand—Appellate Court, power of, to remand case.

Under section 151 of the Civil Procedure Code an Appellate Court has power to remand a case although it falls outside the scope of Order XLI of the Code. [p. 445, col 1.]

Application from a decision of the District Judge, Patna, for revision dated 27th June 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, Behar.

Messrs. Akbari, Khurshid Husnain and Muhammad Hasan Jan, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Fakhruddin for Mr. Muhammad Ishfaq, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—This application arises out of a suit by a widow against her husband's heirs for a portion of her dower debt. The Munsif gave a decree to the plaintiff, but on appeal the District Judge reversed it and directed that the plaintiff should bring into hotchpot all the properties of her husband of which she was in possession and that an account should be taken as in an administration suit.

It appears that some of these properties are alleged to be in the possession of the plaintiff, which the plaintiff claims to have purchased from her husband's heirs. In regard to another set of properties the parties are in dispute as to whether these properties were the properties of the deceased husband or whether they belonged to the plaintiff though standing in the name of her husband. The learned District Judge holds that these disputes must be tried by the trial Court before a final decree can be made in regard to the claim for dower, and he has remanded the suit for an adjudication upon these points.

If it is contended that the learned District Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order of remand and that his powers are limited in this respect by Order XLI, Civil Procedure Code, the reply is that it is now settled that the Code in section 151 recognises the inherent power of Courts to make such orders as are necessary for the interests of justice, and that this inherent power extends to orders for remand outside the scope of Order XLI.

The only question, therefore, we have to decide is whether the learned District Judge has exercised his inherent power wrongly. It is strongly urged that he has changed the nature of the suit and that instead of serving the ends of justice, he will be prolonging the litigation by an intricate enquiry into questions of title and into the profits derived from the properties. That the litigation will be prolonged there can be no doubt, but it does not appear possible to make a proper adjudication except in the manner ordered by the District Judge and the authority which he has followed, namely Mohammad Sharafat v. Wahida Sultan Begum (1), seems in our opinion to lay down the correct procedure.

(1) 28 Ind Cas. 191; 19 C. W. N. 502; 21 C. L. J. 319.

It is urged that one of the properties is already the subject of litigation in the District of Darbhanga and that the enquiry ordered by the District Judge cannot proceed till that litigation has been concluded. We have no materials before us for determining whether section 10, Civil Procedure Code, will be a bar and we cannot therefore, entertain the objection. We have suggested to the learned Vakils appearing on either side that perhaps a settlement might be effected, but there seems to be no hope of this and the only order that we can pass will be that the present application be dismissed with costs. SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.
CIVIL RULE No. 621 OF 1918.
May 9, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Walmsley and Justice Sir Syed Shamsul Huda, KT.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL AND OTHERS— DEFENDANTS—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXIII, rr. 5, 6—Application to sue as pauper by next friend of minor—Next friend not pauper—Procedure.

In dealing with an application by the next friend of a minor for permission to sue as a pauper where the next friend is not a pauper, the Court ought to proceed under rule 6 of Order XXXIII of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 446, col. 1.]

Rule against the order of the Sub Judge, Sibsagar, dated the 21st September 1918.

FACTS.—An infant, through her father as next friend, brought a suit in forma pauperis in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of the Assam Valley Districts, for recovery of damages in respect of serious bodily injuries sustained by her in consequence of the negligence of the defendants. Then application of the minor plaintiff for permission to sue as a pauper was rejected by the Subordinate Judge, who was of opinion that in order to entitle the infant to sue in forma pauperis it was not sufficient to establish that the infant herself was a pauper but it must also be shewn that her next friend was a pauper as well. Against this order of the Subordinate Judge the infant moved the High Court under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure and obtained the present Rule.

Moulvis Nuruddin Ahmed and A. S. M. Akram, for the Petitioner.

Babu Ram Charan Mitter, for the Opposite Parties.

JUDGMENT.—We think in this case that the learned Judge is in error in rejecting the application as he has done. The order which he has passed is an order passed under Order XXXIII, rule 5, Civil Procedure Code. In our view, he ought to have proceeded under rule 6 of the same Order. We accordingly set aside his order and send the case back to him for disposal in accordance with the above observations.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

CIVIL APPEAL No. 224 OF 1918.

September 24, 1919.

THE JANANUKOOLA DANA SEKHARA SANKANIDHI (LIMITED) THROUGH A. VENKATASAMI NAIDU, THE OFFICIAL LIQUIDATOR—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 19—Acknowledgment, what is—Promise to pay, whether necessary ingredient.

A promise to pay is not a necessary ingredient of a valid acknowledgment under section 19 of the Limitation Act: all that is required under that section is a definite admission of liability. [p. 447, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge Madura, in Original Suit No. 45 of 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami Aiyar (with him Messrs. K. B. Rangnadha Ayyar and K. S. Jayarama Ayyar), for the Appellants.—The letter Exhibit E written by the appellant's father is not an unqualified acknowledgment of liability. In that letter, he wants the manager to communicate to him in detail how much was due by him and states that if accounts are furnished and the orders of the higher authorities obtained he would act accordingly. That is only a conditional admission of liability and the acknowledgment takes effect only from the fulfilment of the condition.

Messrs. A. Ramaswami Aiyar and C. Padmanabha Aiyangar, for the Respondent.—The letter Exhibit E cannot be construed as a conditional acknowledgment of liability. All that the defendant's father states is that on receiving a statement of accounts he would pay whatever was found due. That is an acknowledgment within the meaning of section 19 of the Limitation Act. Under the section it is not necessary that there should be a promise to pay. If there is an admission and a willingness to pay, even if the payment is to be made after a settlement of accounts, it is an acknowledgment and time runs from its date. Maniram v. Rupchand (1), Shaik Meera Sahib & Co. v. Shaik Nainar Lubbay (2), Shrigopal Chiranjilal v. Dhanalal Ghasiram (3) and Narayanan Chetty v. Chidambaram Chetty (4).

JUDGMENT.—In this case we have to deal only with the question whether certain statements in writing made by the defendant amounted to an acknowledgment of liability within the meaning of section 19 of the Limitation Act. The other question raised by Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami Ayyar, the learned Vakil for the appellant, viz., that a sanction should have been obtained by the Official Liquidator in respect of the institution of this suit was very fairly not pressed by him, when it was pointed out that there was a general authority given to the liquidator to take the necessary action in order to realise the outstandings in the order of the appointment itself.

(4) 12 Ind. Cas. 410.

The first acknowledgment, Exhibit C, is contained in a resolution passed in the meeting held on the 17th March 1907 and signed by the father of the appellants, the cash-keeper whose liability is questioned in this suit. It says: "The money payable to the members of the Executive Committee and the amount belonging to the Reserve Fund are lying with the cash keeper without interest.....Therefore, it was resolved that the Rs. 2,500 (rupees two thousand five hundred) from the Reserve Fund and Rs. 2,000 (Rupees two thousand) from the amount belonging to the members of the Executive Committee shall be lent at an interest of Re. 0-12-0 per cent. per mensem and that from the amount obtained therefrom the establishment charges must be met." Then on the 23rd August 1908 the following resolution was passed:—"The cash-keeper shall keep ready on the said date the amount accruing due under promissory note and Chitta." This is signed by the cash-keeper among other persons. That seems to us to be clearly an acknowledgment of the liability of the cash-keeper on the promissory note and Chitta account. Similarly there can be very little doubt as to the effect of Exhibit F, the third and last acknowledgment. It says: "About four years ago, I was the cashier of the Jananukoola Dhanasekhara Nidhi Limited Company. Subsequently I resigned the said post. While I was the cashier, the money of the aforesaid company was collected and has been given to me alone.....I am ready to deposit the amount if it is stated on a reference to the account.....I can know only by a reference to the account, whether the statement made by him therein that Rs. 4,500 was on a promissory note and Rs. 231-1-5 was on a Chitta, making up thus a total of Rs. 4,731 1-5, is correct or not." "As stated by him in his deposition, I consent to a meeting being held in Dindigul camp on 6th August 1913 and to a settlement of my accounts therein. I am also willing to pay the balance falling due on getting receipt from the President, etc., in respect of the same. In case they do not consent to so receive the money, I am willing to deposit it in your office." This is also a clear acknowledgment of the liability on the part of the cash-keeper, and the statement that the exact extent of his liability is to be determined by a settlement of the account can make no difference in this respect. Mr. Krishnaswami Ayyar, however, laid much stress in his arguments on Exhibit E. That is a letter addressed by the cash-keeper Subbayya Goundan to the Manager of this Nidhi. He says: "If you write to me in detail as to how much is payable by me to the said Nidhi obtaining the orders of the higher authorities and communicate to me a copy of the order together with the aforesaid account, I am ready to act accordingly." He contends that this a conditional acknowledgment and that it is only from the date when the condition is fulfilled that the acknowledgment operates. We have been referred to a number of cases, English and Indian, in support of this contention. We do not think that we can read the statement here in the way he wants us to read; nor do we think there is anything in the decisions to which we have been referred which would constrain us to hold that the statement such as this is not an unconditional acknowledgment of liability. As to what does or does not amount to an acknowledgment of liability, the law here may be taken to stand on the same footing as the law in England. But as has been pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Kaniram v. Rupchand (1): "The Indian Limitation Act, section 19, says nothing about a promise to pay and requires only a definite admission of liability, as to which there can be no reason for departing from the English principle that an unqualified admission and an admission qualified by a condition which is fulfilled stand upon precisely the same footing." As pointed out, the Indian Statute does not require a promise to pay, but if there is sufficient acknowledgment within the meaning of the law, that is all that is necessary to make the time run from the date of acknowledgment. See Shaik Meera Sahib & Co. v. Shaik Nainar Lubbay (2) and by the Bombay High Court in Shrigopal Chiranjilal v. Dhanalal Ghasiram (3). The Act itself is quite clear it nowhere speaks of any promise to pay, but only speaks of the acknowledgment of liability, and the Explanation says that "for the purposes of this section an acknowledgment may be sufficent though it omits to specify the exact nature of the property or right, or is accompanied by a refusal to pay, or is addressed to a person other than the person entitled to the property or right." As we read this Exhibit E, it clearly means this: "I admit my liability to the Nidhi and I am ready to pay the amount that is due from me as soon as I know from you or the higher authorities." That does not mear, reading the letter in its natural sense, that the acknowledgment was conditional upon receiving further communication from the addressee or from the higher authorities. There is one English decision to which our attention has been drawn which comes very near the facts of this case, that is Skeet v. Lindsay (5). There the debtor says to this effect: 'If you send me the particulars of your account, I shall have it examined and cheque sent to you for the amount due, but you must be under some great mistake in supposing that the amount due to you is anything like the sum you now claim." It was held that this was a clear and absolute acknowledgment of the balance due sufficient to take the case out of the Statute of limitation. There is also a ruling of this Court to which one of us was a party reported in Narayanan Chetty v. Chidambaram Chetty (4). There the letter written by the debtor expressing his willingness to pay whatever might be found due on a settlement of account was held to be a sufficient acknowledgment within the meaning of section 19 of the Limitation Act.

The result is that the appeal is dismissed with costs.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.
CIVIL REVISION No 100 OF 1919.
March 11, 1920.
Present:—Justice Sir P. C. Banerji, KT.
KALLOO KHAN—PETITIONER

ABDULLAH KHAN AND ANOTHER—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Execution of decree—Property attached placed in charge of third person—Attachment raised and proceedings struck off—Failure to produce property—Court, power of, to initiate proceedings against defaulter—Remedy, proper.

Where in execution of a decree a property is attached and placed in charge of a third person, and that person, on the property being released from attachment and the termination of proceedings in execution, fails to account for it, the executing Court has no jurisdiction to institute proceedings against him and direct him to hand over the property to the judgment-debtor, or to pay the latter its price. The remedy of the judgment-debtor in such a case is to sue the defaulter for recovery of the property or its value or for damages.

Civil revision against the decision of the Munsif, Sahaswan, dated the 2nd June 1919.

Mr. Lakshmi Narain, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—The order complained of in this case was passed wholly without jurisdiction. What happened was this:—' decree was obtained against Abdullah Khan by Bashir Khan on the 25th of February 1919. He applied for execution of the decree on the 13th of March 1919. The judgment-debtor paid a portion of the decretal amount and obtained time to pay up the balance and the case was struck off in April 1919. In execution of the decree some crops were attached and were placed in charge of the applicant, Kalloo Khan. On the 27th of April 1919 the judgment-debtor, Abdullah Khan, presented an application in Court in which he stated that although he had paid a part of the decretal amount and the Court had ordered the attached crops to be released, those crops had not been delivered back to him. An explanation was called for from the Amin, and on receipt of it the Court instituted certain proceedings and examined witnesses and in the end made an order on the 2nd of June 1919 directing the applicant to hand over certain crops to the judgment-debtor or to pay him Rs.106, their price. There is no authority to justify the action of the Court. If Kalloo Khan had misappropriated the crops, the remedy of the judgment debtor was to sue him for recovery of the crops or their value or to bring a suit for damages against him, but the Court, in proceedings like those set forth above, had no power to make a decree as it purports to have done against Kalloo Khan, the man to whom the crops were entrusted. I accordingly grant the application and set aside the order of the Court below. I make no order as to costs.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 204, 239, 337, 342, 343—Accused person, who is—Accused person in one trial, whether competent witness in another trial—Magistrate, whether has discretion to proceed against accused person—Prejudice.

Applicants were convicted of being concerned in the forgery of an unregistered mortgage bond, upon proceedings started against them on the petition of a Police Inspector, which stated, inter alia, that they together with one S. were members of a gang and had jointly fabricated the bond. J., one of the applicants, had instituted a suit on the bond and the sanction of the Civil Court was necessary to his prosecution. The Police Inspector promised S. a pardon and his evidence was taken on oath by the Civil Court and the prosecution of J. sanctioned. S. was never arrested, nor brought to trial in the Criminal Court, nor were any steps taken to give him a conditional pardon under section 337, Criminal Procedure Code. It was objected that S. should have been placed before the Magistrate as an accused, that his evidence was inadmissible, that the promise of pardon to him, not being in accordance with section 337 of the Code, was illegal and that his evidence was irrelevant under section 24 of the Evidence Act:

Held, that although in view of section 239 of the Criminal Procedure Code, S. could have been tried jointly with the applicants or separately, yet the fact that he was not so tried did not make him a co-accused with the applicants, and his competency as a witness could not be questioned, as he did not answer to the description of an accused person in the trial, although he may have been converted illegally into a witness [p. 450, col. 2]: but,

(2) that inasmuch as in the complaint S. was described as having assisted in the preparation of the fabricated bond, the Magistrate was bound, under section 204 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to issue process against him, and his failure to do so, or to proceed separately against him, seriously prejudiced the applicants, and consequently vitiated the whole proceedings. [p. 454, col. 1; p. 455, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, East Berar Division, Amraoti, dated the 18th November 1918, confirming the conviction and the sentence passed by a Magistrate, First Class, Amraoti, with powers under section 30 of the Criminal Procedure Code, on the 18th September 1918.

Mr. E. Norton and Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Applicants.

The Hon'ble Mr. G. P. Dick and R. B. B. R. Angal, for the Crown.

ORDER.—The five applicants have been convicted of being concerned in the forgery of an unregistered mortgage-bond (Exhibit P 10) and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment by the Magistrate with powers under section 30. On appeal the Sessions Judge has upheld the findings and sentences.

During the course of the investigation ordered by the District Magistrate, Amraoti, the C. I. D. Inspector (P. W. No. 1) discovered a number of cases of forgery at Sirasgaon. As regards the applicant Jainarain, who had instituted a suit based on the mortgage (Exhibit P 10), the sanction of the Civil Court was necessary for his prosecution. Under the orders of District Superintendent of Police, the Inspector promised a pardon to one Sakharam Dinaji. Sakharam's evidence was thereupon taken on oath by the Munsif who held a preliminary inquiry on the Inspector's petition and eventually sanctioned the prosecution of Jainarain. The criminal proceedings were started on a petition of the Inspector, which is described and treated by the first Court as a complaint. The prayer was that five persons, that is the present applicants, are to be tried and dealt with according to law. In the 3rd paragraph of the petition it is stated that all the five accused together with Sakharam Dinaji were members of one gang, and they jointly fabricated the mortgage bond. Sakharam was never arrested nor brought to trial in the Criminal Court, though no steps have ever been taken to give him a conditional pardon under section 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

The main argument before me is that the evidence of Sakharam is inadmissible and the rest of the evidence is insufficient to support the conviction. Some of the points urged can be easily disposed of on the authority of decided cases. But none of the reported decisions touches the argument so far as it is based upon the provisions of sections 170, 204 and 343 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Section 343, to which reference will have to be made, is reproduced below:—

"Except as provided in sections 337 and 338, no influence, by means of any promise or threat or otherwise, shall be need to an accused person to induce him to disclose or withhold any matter within his knowledge."

The argument of the learned Counsel for the applicants may be summarized as follows: The word "accused" is used in the Criminal Procedure Code in two senses; first in the sense of a person against whom an accusation has been made but against whom no process has issued, secondly, a person over whom a Magistrate is exercising jurisdiction. Upon the Police view of the evidence, Sahkaram should have been placed before the Magistrate as an accused person, having regard to the imperative provisions of section 170, and the Magistrate was bound to issue process against him under section 204. Sakharam was thus an accused person in the eye of the law, irrespective of the illegal action of the Police and the Magistrate. He could not, therefore, be sworn, having regard to the provisions of section 342 (4) of the Criminal Procedure Code. Next it is pointed out that section 337, Criminal Procedure Code, contemplates the tender of a pardon to a person who at the time of the tender is one who is "supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in or privy to the offence under inquiry." The section does not use the word "accused" nor does section 338. But section 343 expressly refers to and, therefore, incorporates the provisions of sections 337 and 338 and debars the use of any influence or of any promise or threat to an accused person. It is hence argued that the word "accused" in section 343 includes persons who are not technically accused, persons who are referred to in sections 337 and 338, as well as those who are fully "accused". According to the applicant's contention, the promise of a pardon to Sakharam, not being in accordance with section 337, was illegal, as it contravened the provisions of section 343 and his evidence should, therefore, be rejected as inadmissible. A further contention is that the statement of Sakharam is irrelevant under section 24 of the Evidence Act.

It is now settled law that a person not on his trial is not an accused person within the meaning of section 342. It is only to such a person that no oath can be administered. As held by Plowden, J., in Mal Singh v. Empress (1) "section 342 in its widest interpretation only authorises an objection that the person offered as a witness answers to the description of the accused person in the inquiry or the trial, as the case may be, in which he is presented as a witness." To the same effect is the Bombay case, Queen-Empress v. Mona Puna (2). See also Banu Singh v. Emperor (3). It is, therefore, recognized by the High Courts that a person separately tried is a competent witness against his accomplices. The latest case on the subject is Akkoy Kumar Mukerjee v. Emperor (4). Unless Sakharam is to be regarded as a co-accused with the applicants in the eye of the law, the objection founded on section 342 is untenable.

It is urged that as the Police found Sakharam to be as guilty as the others, they had no option but to proceed against him and the Magistrate was equally bound to issue process. Section 170 or the analogy of it and section 204 were relied on to show that Sakharam could not be converted into a witness. The short answer to this is that as he could, in view of section 239, be tried jointly or separately, the fact that he was not tried separately does not make him a co-accused with the applicants and hence his competency as a witness cannot be questioned, as he does not "answer to the description of an accused person" in this trial. The disability created by section 342 (4) applies only to such a person. In Queen Empress v. Mona Puna (2) a person who ought to have been an accused but was illegally discharged by the Police was held to be a competent witness.

I now proceed to deal with the arguments based on section 343. The Code, as pointed out by Jardine, J., in Queen-Empress v. Mona Puna (2) uses the word "accused" in two senses. In the chapter relating to investigations "accused" can only mean a person against whom there has been an accusation. But the word, as used in the chapters dealing with inquiries and trials, means, I think, "a person over whom the Magistrate or other Court is exercising jurisdiction." This definition, though laid down in the leading Bombay case with reference to the word "accused" as used in section 342, has been accepted by the Calcutta High Court as applicable to section 340 [Jhoja Singh v. Queen-Empress (5)[1], and this has been followed in Sheikh Chand v. Mahomed Hanif (6). Section 343 occurs in Chapter XXIV of the Code entitled "General provisions as to Inquiries and Trials." Although the section must be read with section 337, to which it refers, I am not prepared to accept the contention that the word "accused" in section 343 "includes any person supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in or privy to the offence under inquiry," unless there is an inquiry or trial in respect of that person, including a magisterial inquiry under the Code in relation to an offence before its cognizance has been taken. If a person is placed before the Magistrate for the tender of a pardon under section 337, he is an accused person, though he may not have been arrested or challaned. He is a person over whom the Magistrate is "exercising jurisdiction" under section 337. If he accepts the offer, he becomes a conditionally pardoned accused. If he rejects the offer, he ceases to be an accused unless he is already an accused in the technical sense. Whilst he is an accused person in respect of the proceeding under section 337, no influence other than that authorised by law can be used to induce a disclosure. Proceedings under section 337 may take place before the accused is challaned: Bhallu Singh v. Empress (7). After process has been issued against a person under an accusation, he becomes technically an accused person and necessarily comes under section 343. But the issue of process does not seem to be essential to constitute a person an accused within the meaning of this section.

Section 163 lays down:—

"(1) No Police Officer or person in authority shall offer or make, or cause to be offered or made any such inducement, threat, or promise as is mentioned in the Indian Evidence Act 1872, section 24.

"(2) But no Police Officer or other person shall prevent...any person from making in the course of any investigation under this chapter any statement which he may be disposed to make of his own free will."

A mere suspect appears to be sufficiently protected from harassment by section 163, which lays down in the form of a mandate the underlying principle of section 24 of the Evidence Act. It does not seem necessary to give the word "accused" in section 343, occurring as it does in a chapter relating to inquiries and trials, a wider meaning in order to include a person against whom there has been only an accusation, especially as there is no penalty attached to that section.

One possible effect of section 343 may be noticed. If a conditional pardon is tendered under section 337 in violation of the terms of section 343, the pardon would be an illegal pardon and the question would then arise whether the person so pardoned is a competent witness. If he was being jointly tried, he would not cease to be an accused person within the meaning of section 342 (4).

Another effect of section 343 is that an answer given by an accused person when examined by the Court under section 342, if induced by means prohibited by section 343, must be ruled out both in that trial as well as in a subsequent trial of the same accused, whether the answer so induced is also irrelevant under section 24 of the Evidence Act or not.

But neither section 163 nor section 343 rules out the evidence of Sakharam. There is a distinction between a confession or mere disclosure, as such, and the testimony of a competent witness. A witness does not become an incompetent witness merely because he has been bribed or threatened. Nor is his testimony declared irrelevant by the Evidence Act. The fact that he has been bribed or threatened, no doubt, affects the value of his testimony.

Sakharam was threatened with prosecution. He was offered a pardon by the Police. This was prohibited by section 163. He made a confession or disclosure to the Police. If we assume that the word accused" in section 343 is to be taken in its widest sense, the disclosure was improperly obtained within the meaning of that section. But the prosecution does not seek to tender evidence of that confession or disclosure. They rely solely on his evidence given at the trial duly cross-examined.

To adopt the construction suggested by the accused would be to make the provisions of section 337 and section 494 unworkable in practice. The Legislature must know that all preliminary negotiations are settled by the Police before a person is produced before a Magistrate for the tender of a conditional pardon or before the withdrawal of the prosecution under section 494, where it is intended to convert him into a competent witness. To hold that the word "accused" means any suspect and to rule out not merely the disclosure as such but also the testimony subsequently given in Court would be to frustrate the object of section 337.

Wher, however, the testimony or the confession or disclosure of Sakharam is tendered as evidence in a future trial against him, that testimony as against him would be nothing more than a confession or disclosure improperly obtained and would have to be rejected both under section 24 of the Evidence Act and in view of section 163, if not also of section 343. It is futile to argue in the present trial that Sakharam's testimony is to be excluded from consideration as against the applicants on the ground of section 24 of the Evidence Act.

There is an unreported judgment of the Calcutta High Court from which an extract is given in the judgment of Jardine, J., in Queen-Empress v. Mona Puna (2). The question raised was whether the evidence of one Shwe Wa examined as a witness for the prosecution was admissible. Mr. Jardine, one of the Judges in the Special Court in Burma, held that the witness was illegally pardoned and the pardon amounted to an inducement contrary to sections 163 and 343, and that Shwe Wa was an accused person to whom no oath could be administered. The Recorder considered that "no pardon was necessary, for Shwe Wa was never an accused person, that is, he was never presented in that aspect either before the Committing Magistrate, or before the Court of Sessions." The reference went up to the High Court at Calcutta, where Romesh Chunder Mitter and Field, JJ., ruled as follows:—"Whether the evidence of the witness Shew Wa was admissible? In answering this question it must be borne in mind that the statements of this man are not being considered as affecting himself and his liability to punishment, but only as affecting third persons against whom they are offered in evidence. Under the circumstances as disclosed in the record, and in the statement sent up by the learned Judges below, we are of opinion that the evidence of this witness was admissible, though of course the facts connected with his testimony and the circumstances under which this individual came to appear in the witness box should properly have been pointed out to the Jury, in order to enable them duly to estimate the value of the evidence itself. Under the Evidence Act admissibility is the rule and exclusion the exception, and circumstances which under other systems might operate to exclude are, under the Act, to be taken into consideration only in judging of the value to be allowed to evidence when admitted." Jardine, J., as Judge of the Bombay High Court accepted this view as correct in preference to his former view. The arguments before me are very similar to those overruled by the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court.

Another point of law taken is that the lower Courts were wrong in admitting the recital contained in Exhibit P-79. The mortgage which is alleged to be forged purports to have been executed by Hiraman and Dewaji on the 21st July 1900. Dewaji died in 1904 and Hiraman in 1914. The prosecution case is that the document was forged in 1916 after the death of the alleged mortgagors. On the 1st July 1909 Hiraman executed a registered mortgage deed (Exhibit P 79) in favour of one Umrao Singh (C. W. No. 1). This mortgage contains a recital that the property was unencumbered. The relevant part of the mortgage deed was not against the proprietary interest of the mortgagor, but as held in Ningawa v. Bhurmappa (8), the mortgage deed itself was against the interest of the mortgagor. The statement that there was no prior mortgage was a material part of the deed, the object of which was, to use the words of Fulton, J., to limit the mortgagor's proprietary interest. The statement was not unconnected with the purpose of the deed. As held by Coush, C. J., and Ainslie, J, in Leelanund Singh v. Musammut Lakhputtee Thakoorain (9), "when a document of this kind is tendered in evidence, it is not to be divided into parts, and the part which is in favour of the person making it rejected, and that which is against his interest accepted."

On the same principle it is laid down in Taylor on Evidence: "accounts are admissible, some items of which charge the declarent, though other connected items discharge him, or even show a balance in his favour: for it is not to be presumed that a man will charge himself falsely for the mere purpose of getting a discharge, and in the latter case, the debt items would still be against his interest, since they diminish the balance in his favour." I agree with the Courts below that the recital, for what it is worth, is relevant under section 32, sub clause 3, Evidence Act, as part of a statement made by a deceased person against his proprietary interest.

I hold that Sakharam, even if illegally converted into a witness, is nonetheless a competent witness. This view, which is in accordance with the plain meaning of section 342 (4), is supported by the authorities and is based on reasons of convenience. It would be highly inconvenient to enter into a preliminary collateral inquiry in the midst of a trial as to what relevant evidence the Police had against a person tendered as a witness. The fact that he is not presented as an accused ought to be sufficient to determine his competency.

The argument that there has been an evasion of section 170 and section 204, though it does not support the applicants' contention that the evidence of Sakharam should be rejected as inadmissible, leads, however, to a conclusion equally fatal to the prosecution. The principle laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Subrahmania Ayyar v. King-Emperor (10) comes into operation with the result that as the trial has been in disobedience to an express provision of the Code, it is bad and the proceedings must be set aside.

The procedure adopted in this case is said to be based upon a circular issued by the Punjab Government. The legality of the circular has, so far as I know, never been questioned in any reported decision of the Punjab Court. The matter is res integra, Though the point might have been raised in some of the reported cases, it was not raised, and it would probably not occur to any one before the recent Privy Counsel decision.

It has been held by the Calcutta High Court that a Local Government in India has no power to tender a conditional pardon: Banu Singh v. Emperor (3). Nor can it grant an unconditional pardon before a sentence is passed. A promise not to prosecute an offender stands on the same footing and cannot, on principle, be distinguished from a pardon. In effect, it tells a Police Officer to disobey his statutory duty of proceeding against such a person.

Section 170 lays down that if upon an investigation under Chapter XIV, it appears to the officer in charge of the Police Station that there is sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify the course, such officer shall forward the accused under custody to a duly empowered Magistrate or shall take security for his appearance before such Magistrate.

The case before me was one of a non-cognizable offence in which an investigation was ordered by the District Magistrate. In such a case the Police have no power to arrest and hence cannot forward under custody or take bail. But that part of section 170 merely provides a machinery for bringing an accused person under the jurisdiction of the Court. The investigation, when duly ordered in a non cognizable case, is an ivestigation under Chapter XIV. The duties of the Police Officer are the same as in a cognizable case. The duty clearly is to move the Court to take proceedings against a person whom the investigation shows to be guilty. An accomplice against whom there is no case apart from his own confession to the Police may lawfully be kept back and tendered as a witness, for even a "reasonable suspicion" cannot be based on what the law declares to be irrelevant. This, however, is not the position taken up here on behalf of the Crown, and in view of the manner in which the case was presented before the Magistrate it would be difficult to maintain it. Paragraph 3 of the "complaint" admits that Sakharam assisted in the preparation of Exhibit P-10, and it is argued before me that the prosecution may, at its discretion, treat him as an accused or as a witness without resort to the provisions of section 337. Under section 204 the Magistrate taking cognizance of the offence was bound to issue process against Sakharam. The terms of sections 170 and 204 are imperative, the word "shall" being used in both sections. It is, however, urged that the words "if in the opinion of the Magistrate there is sufficient ground for proceeding" leave him a discretion in the matter. I do not agree with this. These words in a negative form occur in the preceding section, which enables a Magistrate to dismiss a complaint, "if there is no sufficient ground for proceeding," and this means "if there is no prima facie case." If there is such a case the Magistrate, like the Police, has no option but to proceed.

No doubt having regard to section 239, the Magistrate can proceed jointly or separately. But not to proceed at all, whether jointly or separately, is not within his competence. I was at first inclined to think that the prosecution was at liberty to select its own time. But section 173 requires an investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay and as soon as it is completed, the Police Officer is to send a report setting forth the names of the parties stating whether the accused has been forwarded in custody or not. Under section 204 the process is to be issued, when the Magistrate is taking cognizance of the offence.

Experience shows that it is sometimes necessary to allow a criminal to escape punishment in order to bring home the guilt to his associates in the crime. Except in the case of the Advocate General acting under section 333, the law in India contemplates that the ultimate selection of the person to be allowed to escape rests with the Magistrate or the Court. In the case of an offence exclusively triable by the Court of Session, like the one before me, it is a Magistrate of a certain grade who uses his discretion and tenders a pardon under section 337. Unless he is a Presidency Magistrate, he has to record his reasons for so doing. When a prosecution is withdrawn under section 494 with the intention of converting an accused person into a witness the consent of the Court is essential. I am aware that it was open to the Magistrate in a case like this to nullify the action of the Police if he thought fit, by issuing process against an accomplice named as a witness. A mere passive acquiescence on his part in the course suggested by the prosecution does not afford the same safeguard, as when he is called upon to consent to a withdrawal under section 494 or when he is asked to use his discretion under section 337, where he has to record his reasons.

It is argued that the use of the word "may" in section 337 shows that the procedure laid down in that section is not obligatory. But the word is used with reference to the exercise of a discretion by the Magistrate as to whether a pardon should be tendered to the person proposed. The Magistrate is at liberty not to accept the Police nominee and may select a more suitable person for the tender of the pardon. This is in his discretion. It is true that the prosecution is not bound to have a pardon tendered to a person against whom there is evidence and is at liberty to put him up either for a joint or separate trial. But it is evasion of the law not to adopt any of these courses and tender him as a witness under an unauthorized promise of pardon by pledging public faith not to prosecute him.

Proceedings under section 337, though an inquiry under the Code, form no part of the trial, for the Magistrate who tenders the pardon is incompetent to try the case. But the objection is not merely that no pardon was tendered under section 337, but that a person whom the imperative provisions of the Code require to be tried has not been tried at all with a view to avoid proceedings under section 337, which involve the risk of a possible magisterial disapproval of the course adopted by the Police.

The illegality in this case is in not proceeding against Sakharam at all. If he had been proceeded against separately, he would no doubt have been a competent witness, This procedure was not adopted because it was believed that he would not have assisted the prosecution in that case.

It is thus only by disregarding Statute law that Sakharam's evidence has been made available to the prosecution without magisterial approval. Prima facie he ought to have been jointly tried. The question is whether this is an illegality in the trial or de hors the trial. It may be answered in both ways. But the argument that the illegality consisted merely in not taking separate proceedings appears to be somewhat artificial. Similarly the argument that the illegality is only antecedent to the trial overlooks that it subsisted and has been taken full advantage of during the trial. It seems to me that the proper test to apply in such a case is whether the accused have been prejudiced by the illegality. In my judgment the accused have been seriously prejudiced, for it is conceivable that the Magistrate might have selected one of the accused for the tender of the pardon. Even if the procedure be regarded as only irregular, I doubt whether section 537 would cure the irregularity.

The Privy Council case was one of misjoinder of charges. The rule prohibiting such misjoinder is enacted primarily in the interest of accused persons, though it is also in the public interest that an accused should not be prejudiced by having to meet a multiplicity of charges in one trial. Section 170 and section 204 cannot be said to have been enacted in the interest of an accused's accomplices. But the case, as I understand it, does not proceed upon any such distinction. It lays down that disobedience to an express provision as to a mode of trial is not merely an irregularity but an illegality which vitiates the trial. I do not think that it is an undue extension of the principle laid down in that case to hold that the trial is bad.

The view I have taken is different from that presented on behalf of the accused. To uphold their contention that an accomplice improperly converted into a witness is an incompetent witness, whose evidence is to be rejected as inadmissible, may have the effect of depriving the prosecution of the benefit of this evidence under section 33 of the Evidence Act in a subsequent trial after his death if, for example, in the meanwhile he has been duly pardoned under section 337. The mere fact that a trial is bad practically on a ground similar to that of non-joinder would probably have no such effect.

The first Court expressed an opinion that there was sufficient evidence to convict the applicants without the testimony of Sakharam, an opinion apparently not concurred in by the Sessions Judge and rightly so.

Holding that the trial is bad, I set aside the convictions and sentences, leaving it to the Crown to take such legal steps as it may be advised to take. I direct that the applicants be released from custody so far as they are detained under the present charge.

Conviction set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 297—Trial by Jury—Charge to Jury—Misdirection, what amounts to—Failure to explain law and invite attention to evidence.

Where in a trial by Jury one of the charges against the accused is of abetment, and the Judge omits to direct the Jury as to the evidence of abetment and to explain the law on the subject, his omission amounts to a misdirection. JUDGMENT.

WALMSLEY J.—These two appeals have been heard together as the two appellants were tried and convicted in the same trial.

The facts are as follows. Pramatha Nath Bagchi (appellant in Appeal No. 217) was employed in the post office at Rajbari. He boarded with the family of Hemanta Kumar Pathak (appellant in Appeal No. 216). On the evening of October 11th while the post office staff was still at work, there was a cry of "fire" and smoke was seen coming from the post master's kitchen. There was a rush to the place, and Pramatha was ordered to remain in charge of the office. Shortly afterwards it was discovered that several insured and registered covers were missing. The same evening the missing covers or their contents were found in the shop of Shyama Charan Madak. The two appellants were arrested, and about midnight they made statements to the Sub Deputy Magistrate; the general effect of those statements was that Hemanta went to the office that evening to call Pramatha to his meal, that when the outcry of "fire" was raised Pramatha gave the covers to Hemanta, that Hemanta took them away, and pushed them through a hole in the mat wall of Shyama Charan Madak's shop.

Upon these facts the two appellants were committed for trial to the Court of Session. The charges framed against Pramatha were under section 52 of the Post Office Act, and under section 380 of the Penal Code, while against Hemanta they were under section 52, read with section 70, of the Post Office Act, and under section 380, read with section 114, of the Penal Code. The verdict of the Jury was that Pramatha had committed an offence under section 52 of the Post Office Act, and that Hemanta had abetted him; that Hemanta had committed theft in a building and Pramatha had helped him in doing so.

It is urged on behalf of both the appellants that the charge delivered by the learned Judge is vitiated by numerous misdirections, and these misdirections led the Jury to wrong conclusions.

The first point for criticism is as to the manner in which the Judge laid down the law by which the Jury were to be guided. The Judge has recorded these words in his heads of charge: "The sections of the charge are read and explained. Really there is no great dispute as to sections of the law here; the real question is whether these two people, or either of them, had a hand in dishonestly causing disappearance of the things." So far as the charges against Pramatha are concerned, I think these words show that there was sufficient compliance with the provisions of section 297 of the Criminal Procedure Code But it is very different in the case of Hemanta. He was charged with abetment of the offence, not with receiving stolen property, and on the facts stated the question arises whether he was more than an accessory after the fact. The learned Judge does not appear at any stage to have asked the Jury to consider what evidence there was to warrant the view that Hemanta abetted the offence within the meaning of the Penal Code. Whatever he may have said, the verdict shows that he did not succeed in making the matter clear to the Jury, for the verdict was to the effect that each of the appellants was principal in regard to one offence and accessory in regard to the other, I think it is clear that the law was not adequately explained to the Jury, at any rate in regard to abetment, and I would invite the attention of the learned Judge to the case of Abbas Peada v. Queen-Empress (1).

The next subject for consideration is the learned Judge's treatment of the statements made by the appellants on the night of the occurrence. In the first place it is urged that he was in error in calling them confessions, and that by the use of that word he led the Jury to attach undue importance to them. On this matter the learned Judge chose a metaphor by which to express his meaning, and I find it very difficult to understand exactly what view he did intend to convey to the Jury. He may have intended to ask the Jury to consider how far the statements amounted to an admission of guilt, but it seems equally possible that he intended to ask the Jury how far they believed the statements to be true. These statements form such a large part in the evidence against the appellants that the uncertainty as to the Judge's meaning is very serious, especially in the case of Hemanta. I think the objection must be sustained, and that we ought to hold that there was a misdirection, that is to say, that the learned Judge ought to have invited the Jury to consider carefully what each of the appellants said in his statement with reference to the charges framed against him.

The second objection affects Pramatha. It is that Hemanta's statement has been used against him, although it was retracted at the trial. In enumerating the points against Pramatha, the learned Judge mentions "Hemanta's confession." He asked the Jury to consider carefully whether the part implicating Pramatha can have been put into Hemanta's mouth, and then he goes on to give reasons for discounting its value, the first being that the utmost use to be made of it is to lend assurance to other evidence, the second that it has been retracted, and the third that Pramatha never had any opportunity of cross-examining Hemanta on it. I find it impossible to understand what advice the learned Judge meant to give the Jury. When he speaks of Hemanta's statement "lending assurance," he appears to be thinking of the provisions of section 30 of the Evidence Act. It is true that he referred to Hemanta's subsequent denial, but he ought to have gone further, and to have pointed out the attitude to be taken towards a retracted confession as evidence against a co accused. His attention is invited to the case of Yasin v. King-Emperor (2). This omission is a most serious defect in the charge as affecting Pramatha.

Other criticisms of the charge were made, but these appear to me to be the most important. The defects noticed are grave: the material on which the question of the appellants' guilt is to be decided was not properly placed before the Jury, and the appellants are entitled to ask that the verdict should be set aside. For both of them it is urged that the case should not be retried, but I do not think we ought to take that view.

The conviction and sentence passed on each of the appellants are set aside, and it is ordered that the case be re-tried.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—I agree.

Circumstantial evidence, how to be recorded—Capita case—Admissions of Counsel, whether should be taken—Facts to be proved.

In a case of circumstantial evidence where the failure of one link destroys the chain, it is of the utmost importance to get on to the record every piece of evidence which makes the chain; otherwise there is danger of an Appellate Court not understanding how a particular conclusion has been reached and of miscarriage of justice resulting. [p. 458, cols. 1 & 2.]

It is better in a capital case not to take admissions from the Counsel for the defence at all. Every fact ought to be strictly proved on the record. [p. 458, col. 2.]

Criminal appeal against the decision of the Sessions Judge, Cawnpore, dated the 26th of February 1920.

Messrs. Peare Lal Banerji and Uma Shankar, for the Appellant.

Mr. Lalit Mohan Banerji (Government Pleader), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX, J.—Two men were placed before the Additional Sessions Judge of Cawnpore charged with an offence under section 302 of the Indian Penal Code. They were Sheo Narain Singh and Abdulla. The charge against them was that they had murdered one Karim Bakhsh Pleader near the village of Andoli on or about the 14th of October 1919. Both the accused pleaded not guilty. There is no question about the fact that Karim Bakhsh was murdered. The medical evidence establishes that beyond dispute, but the question remains to be considered who was or were the murderers. Abdulla has been acquitted and Sheo Narain Singh has been convicted. The learned Additional Sessions Judge has convicted Sheo Narain Singh, according to his judgment, because he believed the evidence for the prosecution. In the same judgment he says that "as against Sheo Narain Singh, accused, there is no eye witness but there is so strong circumstantial evidence, tantamount to eye-witness, that I have no hesitation in holding that he beat Karim Bakhsh with lathi intending to kill him, and this caused his death." It is rather difficult to understand what is the circumstantial evidence which weighed so strongly with the learned Sessions Judge and which he considered equivalent to the evidence of eye witnesses. There were three witnesses, Sankta Brahman, Makhna Lodh and Bhikari Chamar, who, according to their own statements, happened to be near the spot where the murder was committed, more or less by chance, and being there by chance on the day and about the time when the murder is supposed to have been committed, they say that they heard the voice of Karim Bakhsh, the murdered man, saying "Gotam, do not kill me or you would be punished by God," or words more or less equivalent to that. The learned Additional Sessions Judge is a new man at criminal work and he may have attached some importance to this. When he gets more experience, he will find that this evidence is some of the most deceptive evidence that can be put before a Sessions Court. The remainder of the evidence is taken up with the evidence to the effect that Karim Bakhsh did not return home as usual, that search was made for him, that first the mare which he was riding returned home without the rider and later on that his corpse was found near a high road. This is practically all the evidence in the case. There is also some evidence as to a quarrel having taken place between the deceased and a Zemindar of the village about the cutting of grass which was in dispute between the two. This evidence is very far from establishing any offence against Sheo Narain Singh. I would allow the appeal, set aside the conviction and sentence of Sheo Narain Singh, and direct his immediate acquittal.

WALSH, J.—I entirely agree. I only want, in the hope that it may assist the learned Judge on other occasions, to point out what I consider a very important duty in recording the evidence, specially in cases of circumstantial evidence, which duty is some times overlooked because the thing itself which has been dealt with seems so obvious at the moment. In a case of circumstantial evidence where the failure of one link destroys the chain, it is of the utmost importance to get on to the record every piece of evidence which makes the chain, otherwise there is danger of an Appellate Court, for example, not understanding how a particular conclusion has been reached and of miscarriage of justice resulting. There is an excellent example in this case. Bhikaria, P. W. 14, says that he saw the accused on the road two hours before sunset on the day in question and had conversation about his movements when he, Bhikaria, was watching his juar crop. The only relevance of that evidence was to bring the accused into proximity with the scene of the assault. It may well be that his juar crop was close to the scene of the assault and that it was so obvious that it was close to the scene of the assault that nobody was concerned to dispute it. As has been often said, you frequently omit to note or to state facts which are so obvious that nobody is concerned to dispute them, but the result is that in this case there is upon the record not a single piece of evidence which places the juar crop of Bhikaria and the incident to which he speaks within any distance at all of the scene of the crime, except that it was on a road which led to Fatehpur. It might have been 10, 20, or 30 miles away for anything that appears on the record. The explanation may be that the defence did not dispute the fact, but if that is so it ought to appear on the record. And the learned Judge has in another instance taken the trouble to record a fact which was not disputed. He says that the quarrel between the deceased and the accused was admitted, and if the same thing had been done with regard to the geography of the juar field it would have been better. It is better in a capital case not take admissions from the Counsel for the defence at all. The more prudent course is to have every fact strictly proved on the record.

BY THE COURT.—The appeal is allowed, the conviction and the sentence passed upon Sheo Narain Singh are set aside and the direction is that Sheo Narain Singh be released from custody forthwith.

Appeal allowed.

PATNA HIGH COURT.

CRIMINAL REFERENCE No 19 OF 1920.

February 26, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Jawala Prasad.

EMPEROR—PROSECUTOR

HEMAN GOPE AND OTHERS—ACCUSED.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 200, 537—Failure to examine complainant, whether irregularity or illegality—Practice—Single Judge differing from decision of Division Bench—Procedure.

The procedure laid down in section 200 of the Criminal Procedure Code ought to be strictly complied with. It is a very valuable safeguard which the Legislature has provided and must be scrupulously observed and insisted upon. [p. 462, col. 1.]

Non-compliance with the provisions of section 200, however, does not by itself vitiate a trial unless it has occasioned a failure of justice or has prejudiced the accused in his defence. [p. 461, col. 2; p. 462, col. 1.]

The only course open to a single Judge, if he doubts the correctness of a decision of a Division Bench of the High Court, is to refer the matter for decision to a larger Bench. [p. 460, col. 1.]

Criminal reference, under section 438, Criminal Procedure Code, made by the Sessions Judge, Muzaffarpur.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The Sessions Judge of Muzaffarpur has referred this case to this Court under section 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, recommending that the conviction of the accused under section 76 of the Embankment Act (II of 1882) by the Sub Divisional Officer of Muzaffarpur may be set aside and a re-trial ordered.

The case originated in a report of the District Engineer to the Collector, who passed thereon an order to the Court-Inspector to prosecute all the offenders named in the report. The prosecuting Inspector then, in a letter to the Sub-Divisional Officer, Sadder, Muzaffarpur, forwarded the report of the District Engineer with the order of the Collector thereor, and asked that the accused might be prosecuted under section 76 of the Embankment Act. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate on receipt of this report and without examining the complainant summoned the accused and himself tried and convicted them. The learned Sessions Judge recommends the conviction to be set aside and a re-rtial ordered, on the ground that the Magistrate did not comply with the provisions of section 200 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

It has not been suggested that the accused have, in any way, been prejudiced by the failure of the Magistrate to examine the complainant on oath under section 200 of the Code. The trial commenced on the 11th December. The witnesses for the prosecution were examined and cross-examined at great length and their evidence was concluded on the 23rd December. A number of witnesses were tendered on behalf of the accused. The examination of witnesses for the defence finished on the 9th of January and the judgment of the Magistrate was delivered on the 10th of January. Throughout the trial in the Court of the Magistrate the accused did not make any grievance that they were prejudiced on account of the failure of the Magistrate to examine the complainant on oath under section 200 before summoning the accused, although several petitions of different nature appear to have been filed on their behalf during the trial. The District Engineer, on whose report the prosecution was started, was also examined as a witness on behalf of the prosecution during the course of the trial and was fully cross-examined on behalf of the accused. As a matter of fact the learned Sessions Judge himself does not rest his recommendation upon the ground of prejudice to the accused on account of the omission to examine the complainant under section 200 of the Code, before issuing processes against the accused. Apparently the Sessions Judge thinks that such an omission was an illegality, which vitiated the whole trial and affected the jurisdiction of the Magistrate to summon and try the accused. In this he is, no doubt, supported by the judgment of Das, J., sitting singly, in the case of Mangu Koeri v. Emperor (1) (May 2nd, 1919), relied upon by the Sessions Judge in his letter of reference.

However, in a case similar to the present one [Phagu Sahu v. Emperor (2)] Chamier, C. J., and Sharfuddin, J., presiding over a Division Bench of this Court in November 1916, only a few months after its establishment, observed that an omission to examine the complainant under section 200 of the Code was "no doubt a serious irregularity in the proceedings of the Magistrate, but inasmuch as the accused were not in any way prejudiced by that irregularity it would, we think, be wrong to set aside the conviction on that ground. In our opinion the case clearly comes under section 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure." This ruling was quoted before Mr. Justice Das, but he declined to follow it on the ground that the authorities placed before him were not probably shown to the learned Judges who decided that case. But this is no ground at all for disregarding the decision of a Division Bench of this Court by a Judge sitting singly. The only course open to Mr. Justice Das, if he doubted the correctness of the aforesaid decision of the Division Bench, was to have referred the matter for decision to a larger Bench.

Apart from any other ground, the present case should be governed by the aforesaid decision of the Division Bench, and not by that of Mr. Justice Das sitting singly. Besides, the view taken by the Division Bench appears to be correct and in agreement with the view taken by almost all the High Courts in India, as shown by me in the case of Saheb Tewari v. Emperor (3) long before the decision by Mr. Justice Das. Mr. Justice Das, while referring to my judgment, doubted if this was the view of the other High Courts, apparently because the decisions of the other High Courts were not placed before him. I referred to only a few leading cases on the subject, as the later cases simply followed them, and I did not consider it necessary to refer to them.

With more deference to the opinion of Mr. Justice Das, I would now deal with the authorities.

The leading case is that of Queen-Empress v. Monu (4). There a yadast of a Revenue Officer, as the report of the District Engineer in the present case, was held to be a complaint under section 4 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The accused was summoned and tried without the complainant having been examined under section 200. It was held there that the omission to examine the Tahsildar under section 200 was only an error of procedure under section 537 of the Code and, as the accused were not prejudiced by the irregularity, the High Court of Madras declined to interfere in revision with the conviction of the accused. Mr. Justice Das disposed of this Madras ruling on the ground that it did not appear to have been "followed in any other case in Madras." But that does not in any way shake its authority, for the procedure in Madras must have been set at rest by this authority, as is clear from the more recent case of Velu Nathan, In re (5).

The Punjab Chief Court followed it in the case of Uttam Chand v. Empress (6) and Girdhari Lal v. Emperor (7), and the Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court in the case of Muso v. Emperor (8).

The Bombay High Court took a similar view in Aparao Jhaverilal, In re (9) and followed the Madras case.

In Allahabad, there was at first a conflict of opinion on the point. In 1887, in the case of Queen-Empress v. Murphy (10), Mahmud, J., held that the "omission to examine (the complainant under section 203 of the Code of 1882, corresponding to section 200 of the present Code) amounded to only an irregularity of such a character as would be covered by the somewhat extensive provision of section 537." No doubt, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Das, in the case of Kesri v. Muhammad Bakhsh (11), Knox and Blair, JJ., did not subscribe to the view taken by Mahmud, J. In that case the accused was acquitted without the complainant having been examined on oath and without taking the evidence produced in support of the prosecution, and it was in the circumstances of the case very rightly observed that the Magistrate was bound to hear the complainant and take all the evidence that he wanted to produce in support of the prosecution." The point raised in the present case did not arise there, namely, whether after the conviction, the mere omission to examine the complainant under section 200, without any prejudice to the accused and without their having taken any objection at an earlier stage, would vitiate the trial. The point expressly arose in the recent case of Emperor v. Bateshar (12), where Richards, C. J., and Piggott, J., declined to interefere in revision with the conviction of the accused on the ground that the omission to examine the complainant was a mere irregularity, though they pointed out that the provisions of the Code as to procedure ought to be strictly complied with. This latest authority of the Allahabad High Court was apparently not quoted before Mr. Justice Das.

In the Calcutta High Court, no doubt, in the cases of Satya Charan Ghose v. Chairman of the Utterparah Municipality (13) and Lokenath Patra v. Sanyasi Charan Manna (14) the complaints were dismissed under section 203 without the complainants having been examined on oath; and upon the motion of the complainants it was rightly held that the complaints were not properly disposed of and that it was the duty of the Magistrate, as directed by section 200 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to examine the complainants on oath and that unless this was done, it was not competent for him to have dismissed the complaints. This is not the case here. With great respect to Mr. Justice Das, these cases relied on by him, to my mind, have no bearing on the present case. The direct authority of the Calcutta High Court is the case of Bhagaban Chandra Karmakar v. Crown (15). There, Chitty and Carnduff, JJ., following the case of Queen-Empress v. Monu (4), declined to interfere with the conviction, where upon the report of the Excise Sub-Inspector the accused was summoned without the Sub Inspector having been examined on oath on the ground, as in the present case, that he as complainant was subsequently examined at the trial. They held that the omission to examine the complainant was only an error of procedure.

The two most recent decisions of the Calcutta High Court in 1919: Harihar Roy v. Emperor (16) and Bhairab Chandra Barua v. Emperor (17), have reviewed the authorities of all the cases and have upheld the view taken in the leading case of the Madras High Court, namely, Queen-Empress v. Monu (4). This Court has already held that in matters of procedure it would follow the decisions of the Calcutta High Court.

Mr. Justice Das, however, preferred to follow the decision in another case of this Court in Jhuna Lal Sahu v. Emperor (18) (Sharfuddin and Roe, JJ). In that case the objection was taken at the earliest possible opportunity just after the accused was summoned. There, upon the complaint of one Mahamaya Prasad regarding the fabrication of a document, the Magistrate without examining the complainant on oath referred the matter to the Criminal Investigation Department for enquiry and on the result of that enquiry the Magistrate summoned the accused. It was pointed out that the Magistrate should have, under section 200, examined the complainant on oath immediately when the complaint was filed and that, if he wanted to proceed further, he ought to have called either upon the complainant to file a fresh complaint, or the Police Officer who conducted the investigation to do so, and then examine the complainant on oath. That case, therefore, cannot apply to the present case or to the facts of the case decided by Das, J.

The whole question is, at what stage the objection is taken? If it is taken at an early stage, surely action should be taken to set right the defect and to proceed with the case after examining the complainant on oath under section 200, but certainly, if the objection is taken after the trial is over and the accused is convicted, it cannot in itself vitiate the trial unless it has occasioned a failure of justice or has prejudiced the accused in his defence. All the High Courts agree in this view, and there is no case, as observed by Chamier, C. J., and Sharfuddin, J., in the case of Phagu Sahu v. Emperor (2), already referred to, "in which a Court has in similar circumstances set aside a conviction on account of failure of the Magistrate to examine the complainant when the complaint was made."

I must, however, repeat what I said in my earlier decision in the case of Sabib Tewari v. Emperor (3), that the procedure laid down in section 200 of the Code ought to be strictly complied with. It is a very valuable safeguard which the Legislature has provided and must be scrupulously observed and insisted upon. As pointed out in the case of Emperor v. Batesher (12), the non-compliance with this provision of the Code leads to much confusion and waste of public time, not to speak of involving the parties to unnecessary expense. It is regretable that at this distance of time the express provision in the Code and the repeated pronouncements of the High Courts should be ever violated by Magistrates. The attention of the Magistrate concerned should be expressly drawn to it that his disregard of the primary procedure in the Code has led to so much waste of time of the Sessions Judge and of this Court and harassment to the parties.

No doubt, in the circumstances of this case I must decline to accept the recommendation of the Sessions Judge and to interfere with the conviction of the accused, on the ground that the accused were not prejudiced in any way, and that the District Engineer, at whose report the prosecution was started, was subsequently examined at the trial and was fully cross examined, though he was not examined on oath before issuing processes against the accused.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

APPELLATE CIVIL JURISDICTION.

November 10, 1919.

Present:—Sir Norman Macleod, KT., Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Heaton.

In re KALIDAS J. JHAVERI—RESPONDENT.

Contempt of Court—Publication of document forming part of record of case, before hearing—Practice.

All proceedings in cases pending before a Court of Justice are privileged and they must not be published until the case comes on for hearing before the Court. [p. 463, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—Mr. Jhaveri, a Pleader practising at Ahmedbad, was one of the respondents against whom notices were recently issued in consequence of a letter which was addressed to the Registrar of the High Court by Mr. Kennedy, the District Judge of Ahmedabad. After the notices had been served, the respondents asked for inspection of Mr. Kennedy's letter and they were allowed to receive copies of that letter. I should have thought that any Pleader ought to have known that it was contrary to the rules of the profession, and contrary to the duty which he owed to this Court, to show that letter to any outsider, or give copies of that letter to any outsider. The respondent, Mr. Jhaveri, obtained a copy of this letter, which, I may remark, was a private letter written by the District Judge to the Registrar, and, therefore, the private property of the Court until the proceedings had become public. Mr. Jhaveri handed a copy of that letter to Mr. Gandhi, who he knew was the editor of "Young India." Mr. Gandhi published that letter in his paper, and also commented on it. It is quite true than Mr. Jhaveri had nothing to do with that. But he must have known that when he handed the letter to a journalist, that journalist would make such use as he thought proper of that letter, subject to the rules which he considered governed the publication of such matters by journalists. In his letter of explanation to the Court, Mr. Jhaveri writes that he saw no impropriety in handing the letter to Mr. Gandhi. He neither brought about its publication, nor did he prevent it. After what has passed to-day between Mr. Jhaveri and the Court, we trust that he will now see that it was most improper on his part to have handed that letter to Mr. Gandhi. He might have shown it to Mr. Gandhi as a leader of the Satyagraha movement in order to take his advice. But if he did so, he ought to have especially stipulated that it was shown to Mr. Gandhi as his private adviser, and not as a journalist, and he should have specially prohibited Mr. Gandhi from making any use of that letter as a journalist. It is certainly strange that the respondent should not have seen the impropriety of his action. He has told us that it is not unusual in the Mofussil for papers placed on the file in certain proceedings to be published before the proceedings are made public in Court. If that is the practice in the Mofussil, the sooner it is stopped the better. All proceedings in cases pending before a Court of Justice are privileged, and they must not be published until the case comes on for hearing before the Court. It is certainly desirable that Pleaders who go out to practise in the Districts should feel that they continue to be under the restraining influence of the leading members of the profession practising in Bombay. I am quite sure that nothing of this sort would ever have occurred in Bombay, and Mr. Jhaveri, if he consults any of the learned Pleaders who are sitting in Court, will be told that he had no business whatever to have given a copy of this letter to a person in Mr. Gandhi's position, unless he took precautions that it should not be published until the notices were heard in Court. Such conduct was particularly disgraceful in this matter, because the proceedings were between Mr. Jhaveri and the Court itself in which the Court was dealing with his sanad which might have been suspended or taken away from him, and, therefore, he should have been all the more careful not to do anything in the course of the proceedings which might give the Court further cause for dealing with his sanad. However, we think now that this expression of opinion on our part should be a lesson to Mr. Jhaveri in the future, and ought to be notice to other practitioners in the Mofussil of what we consider is the proper course to follow in such cases, and, therefore, we content ourselves in this case with severely reprimanding Mr. Jhaveri. As I said at the commencement, I am very glad that he has had the courage to confess that he was the respondent who committed this breach of privilege. He has thereby saved the other respondents the trouble of coming to Bombay, as they would have had to do, if he had not written to the Registrar, for it was necessary that what we thought about this matter should be said in open Court.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.
CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 1148 OF 1919.
January 29, 1920.
Present :—Mr. Justice Piggott and Mr. Justice Walsh.

RAMA SINGH alias RAMAN SINGH —ACCUSED—APPELLANT
EMPEROR—OPPOSITE-PARTY.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 302, 304, 325—Death caused by blows—Intention to cause death absence of—Offence.

Where death results from blows struck in a scuffle, not as a direct result of such blows, but owing to disease having supervened, and it is found that, when the blows were struck, there was no intention of causing death nor an intention of causing such bodily injury as the assailant knew to be likely to cause death, a conviction should be recorded in the alternative under section 304 or 325 of the Penal Code, a conviction under section 302 would in such a case not be appropriate, as the case could not be brought within the definition of murder. [p. 464, col. 2.]

Criminal appeal against the order of the Sessions Judge, Ghazipur, dated the 17th September 1919.

Mr. S. N. Mukerji (with him Mr. A. S. Osborne), for the Appellant.

The Assistent Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The facts established by the evidence in this case are as follows. The appellant Rama Singh had a dispute with his neighbour and caste fellow, Ghura Singh, about the boundaries of their fields. The dispute led to a scuffle and finally Rama Singh, having armed himself with a lathi, assaulted Ghura Singh. It would seem that he struck him three blows, one of which fractured the bones of the left forearm, another fractured a bone in the right hand while the third fractured both bones of the left leg. This last must have been the third blow struck, because the evidence is that Ghura Singh fell down after receiving the blows struck by the appellant and was not again hit after he had fallen to the ground. Ghura Singh was carried to hospital. He made a report at the Police Station and his dying declaration was recorded twice, once by a Magistrate at Bansdih while he was under treatment in the local dispensary and afterwards by a Magistrate at Ballia. The first of these declarations has rightly been described by the learned Sessions Judge as the most important piece of evidence in the case. There are, however also statements by eye-witnesses of the assault which fully establish the facts above set forth. The question which has been really argued before us is the nature of the offence thereby committed by Rama Singh. The learned Sessions Judge says that he must, by some presumption of law, be considered to have known that in inflicting these injuries he was likely thereby to cause death. That finding, as it stands, might suffice for the definition of culpable homicide in section 299 of the Indian Penal Code, but it is not quite sufficient for the more stringent definition of murder contained in the fourth clause of section 300. As a matter of fact Ghura Singh died because gangrene supervened in consequence of the injury to the left leg. We have no doubt that his death was caused by Rama Singh. We also agree with the learned Sessions Judge in holding that there is no warrant in the evidence for a finding that Rama Singh, when he struck Ghura Singh, intended to cause his death, or intended to cause such bodily injury as he knew to be likely to cause death. The most serious points in the case against the appellant are the facts that after the first dispute he went away to his house to fetch the lathi with which he committed the assault, and secondly the fact that Ghura Singh was an old man apparently of feeble constitution. On the other hand, the evidence does show that Ghura Singh carried a bamboo lathi of some sort and that he defended himself with it. As a matter of fact, although none of the witnesses says in so many words that Ghura Singh also struck Rama Singh, the learned Sessions Judge has noted in his judgment that there was evidence of some slight injuries to Rama Singh's person, presumably suffered in the course of the encounter. On the whole we think that the learned Sessions Judge has gone a little too far in bringing the case within the definition of murder. It is certainly one of those cases in which a Jury in England would unhesitatingly convict of manslaughter.

We think it a very arguable point whether the conviction should be recorded as one of culpable homicide not amounting to murder under section 304, Indian Penal Code, or simply as one of causing grievous hurt under section 325 of the same Code. The law allows us to record a conviction in the alternative, and we think it well to do so as we desire to mark our sense of the gravity of the case by passing the maximum sentence provided for the lesser of the two offences above referred to. Our order, therefore, is that we set aside the conviction under section 302, Indian Penal Code, and the sentence of transportation for life passed by the Sessions Court. We record a conviction in the alternative under section 304 or section 325 of the Indian Penal Code and we sentence Rama Singh to rigorous imprisonment for seven years, the sentence to take effect from the date of his conviction in the Sessions Court.

WOLF & SONS v. DADIBA KHIMJI & CO.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

ORIGINAL CIVIL JURISDICTION APPEAL No. 14 OF 1918.

July 31, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Heaton and Mr. Justice Marten.

WOLF & SONS (IN LIQUIDATION)—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

DADIBA KHIMJI & COMPANY—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 21, 65, 72—Enemy Trading Act (X of 1916), s. 12—Contracts with enemy firm—Cross-contracts after outbreak of war, validity of—Agreement by Liquidator of enemy firm, legality of—Payments made under valid contracts, whether can be recovered.

Plaintiff, a German firm trading in Bombay, engaged the defendants as guarantee brokers and Muccadums, the latter depositing, by way of guarantee, Rs. 50,000, with the branch of the firm at Bombay. Between the 15th and 23rd July 1914, the firm contracted to purchase from defendants certain bales of cotton for forward delivery. The political atmosphere in Europe at that time having created uneasiness in the market, the defendants on the 3rd August 1914 demanded repayment of their security deposit, and on the same day the sum of Rs. 40,000 was paid to them, and as regards the balance, they were informed that it was impossible to draw money from Europe. War broke out at 11 P. M. on the 4th August between Great Britain and Germany. On the 5th August the plaintiffs, through their manager at Bombay, entered into an agreement with the defendants recording the pledge of 797 bales of cotton blankets as security for the balance of the deposit and the differences on the forward cotton contracts. On the 27th August certain cotton bales were pledged to defendants as further security, and on the 3rd September the forward cotton contracts were closed by cross-contracts. The manager of the firm was interned on the 5th September and the affairs of the firm at Bombay placed in charge of a Liquidator, who, in 1915, entered into an agreement with the defendants for the sale of the cotton blankets and of the cotton, the terms of which were that defendants were to sell the blankets and repay themselves out of the sale-proceeds, and that the Liquidator was to sell the cotton and give the defendants a first charge on the sale-proceeds for any balance remaining due to them after taking credit for the sale-proceeds of the blankets. Both sales were effected, but as the sale-proceeds of the blankets were insufficient to satisfy the amount due to the defendants, they in February-March 1916 made a demand on the Liquidator for payment of the balance out of the sale-proceeds of the cotton. In April 1916, the Liquidator repudiated this agreement, demanded the sale-proceeds of the blankets, less Rs. 10,000 and certain other charges, and declined to pay anything out of the sale-proceeds of the cotton. After some further correspondence between the parties the Liquidator, on the 6th August 1917, brought the present suit to recover from the defendants the sale-proceeds of the blankets, less Rs. 10,000, shop rent and wages, on the grounds—

(1) that the pledge, being a transaction for the benefit of an enemy, was void; and

(2) that the contracts for the purchase of cotton became void on the outbreak of war, and the subsequent pledge and setting off of forward contracts were of no legal effect.

The defendants counter-claimed to recover from the sale-proceeds of the cotton the amount of the balance due to them. The trial Court dismissed the plaintiffs' suit and decreed the counter-claim. On appeal by the plaintiffs:

Held, that the plaintiffs' suit had been rightly dismissed and the defendants' counter-claim rightly decreed; that the agreements entered into by the Liquidator with the defendants were "contracts" within the meaning of the Contract Act and could not be avoided under section 21 of that Act as being made under any mistake of law, and payments made to the defendants were payments under these binding contracts and could not be recovered under section 72 of the Act. [p. 480, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from the following judgment, dated the 12th December 1918, of Mr. Justice Macleod, in Original Civil Jurisdiction Suit No. 827 of 1917.

"The plaintiffs are a hostile firm carrying on business in Germany and have filed this suit, through Mr. P. S. Mellor, the Liquidator appointed by a Government Notification of the 20th September 1916.

The plaintiffs had a branch office in Bombay, the manager of which was one F. Zoller, and at that branch an extensive business in cotton, cotton waste and cotton blankets was being carried on.

The defendants were employed as guarantee brokers and Muccadums by the Bombay branch, having deposited Rs. 50,000 with Zoller by way of guarantee.

During the first half of 1914 there were discussions between Zoller and the defendants regarding the return of the deposits for reasons which it is not necessary now to go into. Between the 15th and 23rd July Zoller contracted to purchase from the defendants 2,800 bales of cotton January and March delivery.

On the 1st August when the situation in Europe had become critical, the defendants wrote to Zoller again asking for the return of the deposit.

On the 3rd August defendants wrote again asking for the return of the deposit or if the money could not be paid, for security. They also mentioned that owing to the fall of the market there was already a large difference on the forward contracts.

The same day Zoller repaid the defendants Rs. 40,000. On the 4th August Zoller wrote referring to the payment and said he could not pay the balance as it was impossible for him to draw money from Europe. He continued. "We do not mind, however, handing you our stock of 797 bales of blankets lying at the Jeewanji Press, Bombay, as a security for any sum which might be found due to you against forward transactions and we are prepared to enter into an agreement with you to that effect." The defendants replied on the same day: "We are very much thankful to you for returning us Rs. 40,000 and interest. We shall be much obliged if you will make convenient to return us the balance in a few days. As you want to keep the forward, transactions open we can do so provided you give us sufficient margin. The difference at to-day's rate amounts very nearly to Rs. 65,000. So if your goodselves give us your cotton blankets bales as security, we shall keep the Sodas open. The future looks so gloomy and uncertain that one has to keep himself on guard. Please do not think that we are suspicious and impatient. We very well know that your firm is a sound one, but the circumstances compel us to look to our safety:" and Zoller also handed over to the defendants the keys of the godowns containing the blankets It may be noted that the defendants occupied a room on the same building in which were the plaintiffs' offices.

War broke out between Great Britain and Germany at 11 P. M. on the 4th August. On the 5th August an agreement was signed by Zoller on behalf of the plaintiffs and the defendants recording the pledge of the 797 bales of blankets as security for the balance of the deposit and the differences on the forward contracts. The blankets were to be sold by defendants in consultation with Zoller at the best possible market rate against spot cash in Bombay.

On the 10th August the Royal Proclamation of the 5th August setting forth the law and policy with regard to trading with the enemy was published in the Bombay Government Gazette.

Briefly that was a warning to all persons resident, carrying on business or being in the British Dominions not to have any commercial intercourse with any person resident, carrying on business or being in the German Empire, otherwise they would be liable to such penalties as the law provided. Any transactions with or for the benefit of any person resident; carrying on business or being in the German Empire which were not reasonable and were not for the time being expressly prohibited and which but for the existence of the state of war would be lawful were permitted.

But it was provided that the proclamation should not apply to the trading or commercial intercourse carried on by any person who had an interest in houses or branches of business in some other country as well as in the Dominions, solely from or by such houses or branches of business in such other country.

An official explanatory announcement was issued on the 22nd August. It was pointed out that it was important to consider where the foreign trader resided and carried on business, and not his nationality.

Consequently there was no objection in British firms trading with German or Austrian firms established in neutral or British territory. If a firm with headquarters in hostile territory had a branch in British or neutral territory, trade with the branch was, apart from prohibitions in special cases, permissible as long as the trade was bona fide and no transaction with the head office was involved.

Commercial contracts entered into before war broke out with firms established in hostile territory could not be performed during the war and payments under them should not be made to such firms during the war, but there was no objection to payments being made for goods already delivered or for services already rendered. Whether contracts entered into before the war were suspended or terminated was a question of law which might depend on circumstances.

On the 28th August the Government of Bombay issued a Press Note giving the effect of this announcement.

It may be gathered that there was in August 1914 a certain amount of doubt in the minds of the authorities as to what was the common law with regard to trading with the enemy on the outbreak of hostilities.

In early days all intercourse with the King's enemies was forbidden. Subjects of the hostile power were alien enemies and at common law had no rights. The King's prerogative probably extended to seizing enemy property on land as well as at sea. As to property on land this prerogative has long fallen into disuse. Subject to any legislation to the contrary or anything contrary to the treaty of peace, enemy property in this country will be restored to the owners after the war just as property in enemy countries belonging to His Majesty's subjects will or ought to be restored to them after the war [per Lord Parker in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (1)]. Certain personal rights of enemy subjects living under the King's protection were also recognised [see Wells v. Williams (2)], and the doctrine of commercial domicil was established which was observed by the Courts which interpreted the Law of Nations with regard to what was lawful prize by capture at sea. "The test of a person being an alien enemy is not his nationality but the place in which he resides or carries on business." Porter v. Freudenberg (3). Still the King's prerogative to deal with enemy subjects residing within his territories and under his protection has not been diminished. They can either be interned or deported, but in the absence of any specific prohibition trading with enemy subjects who are living under the King's protection would not be trading with the enemy.

On the 17th August Zoller wrote to the defendants asking them to insure the blankets in their own name. On the 25th August defendants wrote asking for further security owing to the further fall in the price of cotton and suggested that certain cotton bales belonging to the plaintiffs should be handed over, the blankets to be sold first.

On the 27th August Zoller replied, agreeing to this demand and stating that the key of their godown at Colaba had already been handed over.

On the 3rd September the contracts of July were closed by cross-contracts being entered into for re-sale of the cotton to the defendants at the rates then prevailing.

On or about the 5th September Zoller was interned and one Tombroff was put in charge of the affairs of the Bombay branch of plaintiffs' business as Liquidator.

Previous to his internment Zoller had requested the defendants to open a shop for the sale of the blankets in small quantities, and they did so, but very few were sold.

Then on the 9th September was issued a further Royal Proclamation relating to trading with the enemy.

It was stated in the preamble that it was desirable to restate and extend the prohibitions in the Proclamation of the 5th August and for that purpose to revoke that Proclamation.

By clause 1 the Proclamation of the 5th August was revoked together with any public announcement officially issued in explanation thereof. By clause 3 the expression enemy was defined as any person or body of persons of whatever nationality resident or carrying on business in the enemy country.

Clause 5 restated and extended the prohibition regarding trading with the enemy and, inter alia, payment of any sum to or for the benefit of any enemy was prohibited.

Clause 6 provided that where an enemy had a branch locally situated in British, allied or neutral territory not being neutral territory in Europe, transactions by or with such branch should not be treated as transactions by or with any enemy.

It has been decided in England that transactions in clause 6 refer only to new transactions and do not include transactions before the war.

On the 5th June 1915 Tombroff wrote to the Controller of Hostile Trading Concerns, stating that certain stocks of cotton and cotton blankets were left with him which he proposed selling by auction in small lots. The blankets were in possession of the defendants as security against differences due to them on cotton. Upto that time a very small quantity of blankets had been sold.

On the 11th June the Controller replied agreeing to this proposal.

WOLF & SONS v. DALIBA KHIRJI & CO.

On the 1st July Tombroff wrote to the Controller that he would arrange with the defendants for the sale of blankets, the proceeds to be retained by them against their claim, and enclosed a letter from Messrs. Payne and Co., in which they had advised him that he was not entitled to claim delivery of the blankets without paying the moneys due to the defendants. The Controller merely acknowledged the receipt of the letter.

By the end of the year 1915 the blankets had been sold, some by auction, some to the defendants under an arrangement with the Controller, and there is no dispute now with regard to the amount they realised. According to the defendants' account there was still left a balance of over Rs. 47,000 due to them after giving credit for this amount.

Though nothing was said about the cotton in the correspondence, Dadiba Hormusji, a partner in the defendant firm, has sworn that the cotton was sold by Tombroff under the following arrangement. Defendants gave delivery to his purchasers, while the sale-proceeds were credited to a separate account and if anything remained due to the defendants after the sale of the blankets that would be paid from the sale proceeds.

On the 13th November Tombroff wrote to the Controller that owing to the decision of the Court in the case of Textile Manufacturing Co, Ltd v. Solomon Brothers (4), he would have to claim from the defendants whatever stock of blankets might be left unsold in their hands.

On the 12th February 1916, defendants sent to Messrs. Ferguson and Co., who had been appointed Liquidators in the place of Tombroff, a statement of account for blankets, scales and tarpaulins showing the sale-proceeds to be Rs. 79,467-9 4.

On the 10th March the defendants sent a final statement of account showing Rs. 47,194-6 5 to their credit and asked for a cheque in settlement.

On the 12th April the Liquidators' Attorneys wrote as follows:

"Our clients Messrs. A. F. Ferguson and Company, Liquidators of Messrs. W. Wolf & Sons, have placed in our hands your letter to them of the 10th ultimo with instructions to say that the pledge of cotton blankets made on 5th August 1914 by Mr. Zoller on behalf of Messrs. W. Wolf & Sons was clearly a transaction for the benefit of an enemy and was prohibited by common law and fell within the Royal Proclamation of the 5th August 1914 as to trading with the enemy. The contract of pledge, therefore, was absolutely void and our clients, therefore, are entitled to the sale-proceeds in your hands as pledges. Our clients will give you credit for Rs. 10,000, being the balance of the deposit due to you by Messrs. Wolf & Sons. As to the accounts furnished to our clients our clients deny that you are entitled to shop rent and servants' wages incurred before the appointment of our clients as Liquidators. Without prejudice to our clients' contentions as to the correctness of the accounts we are instructed to demand from you the amount of sale-proceeds of 797 bales of blankets in your hands and to give you notice, which we hereby do, that if you fail to pay the same within 24 hours from the receipt hereof by you, our clients will without further intimation or delay file a suit against you to recover the sale-proceeds of the said bales holding you responsible for all costs, charges and expenses of and incidental to the same."

Further correspondence followed which closed on the 14th June 1916.

Thereafter Mr. Mellor was appointed Liquidator but it was not until the 6th August 1917 that this suit was filed. In the plaint as originally drawn, no reference was made to the contracts of July nor to the cross contracts of the 3rd September, though it was stated that the consideration for the pledge of the 5th August was the amount due to defendants for deposit and differences in cotton purchased. However, the plaint was afterwards amended, and both sets of contracts were referred to.

As the plaint now stands the plaintiffs contend: 1. That the transaction of the pledge was a transaction for the benefit of the enemy and was trading with the enemy and void under the Proclamation of the 5th August and the common law. But it was not discovered to be void until after the sale of the blankets.

2. That upon outbreak of war the contracts for purchase of cotton became void and consequently the subsequent pledge and settling of the forward contracts by way of cross contracts were of no legal effect.

(4) 33 Ind. Cas. 353; 40 B. 570; 18 Bom. L. R. 105.

Accordingly they prayed that the defendants should be ordered to hand over the sale-proceeds of the cotton blankets less the Rs. 10,000, shop rent and wages.

In their written statement the defendants said that the pledge of the blankets was effected on the 4th August and the evidence supports this. They denied that the transaction of pledge was for the benefit of the enemy or was trading with the enemy. Therefore they were entitled to retain the sale-proceeds of the blankets.

They then set out the pledge of cotton bales by Zoller on or about the 26th August and the subsequent agreement with Tombroff regarding the sale of the cotton.

On the evidence the pledge of the cotton has been established as well as the agreement to pay out of the sale-proceeds of the cotton any balance due to the defendants after the sale of the blankets.

The defendants then counter-claimed for Rs. 47,194-6-8 and further interest as due to them on the balance of account.

After the plaint was amended, the defendants put in a further written statement denying that the contracts of July became void or that the pledge and cross-contracts were of no legal effect.

They said that the parties were under the belief that the contracts of July continued to be effectual and their mistake, if they were mistaken, was a mistake as to the law in force in British India. That in any view the settlement of the contract by cross-contract was a valid settlement and gave rise to a legal liability on the part of the plaintiffs to pay the difference at the due dates.

Amongst the issue raised only Nos. 8, 9 and 10 were issues of fact and it is not now disputed that these must be found in favour of the defendants. It does not seem to make much difference in equity, considering the circumstances, whether Tombroff agreed that the defendants should have a first charge on the sale-proceeds of the cotton or whether he agreed to pay them the balance due after the sale of the blankets out of those sale proceeds. Mr. Dadiba said Tombroff agreed to the latter. Then on these facts as found, very interesting questions of law arise which have been very fully argued before me. On the 4th August the position was as follows:—Plaintiffs had contracted to purchase 2,500 bales of cotton from the defendants January and March delivery. In addition they owed the defendants Rs. 10,000. Owing to the fall in the price of cotton defendants had demanded security for the due fulfilment of the forward contract and the payment of the Rs. 10,000, and they were in possession as pledgees of 797 bales of blankets belonging to the plaintiffs.

It cannot now be contended after the decision of the House of Lords in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (1) that the July contracts were not avoided by the outbreak of war.

Lord Dunedin said: "There is indeed no such general proposition as that a state of war avoids all contracts between subjects and enemies. Accrued rights are not affected, though the right of suing in respect thereof is suspended. Further there are certain contracts, particularly those which are really the concomitants of rights of property, which even so far as they are executory are not abrogated. In other words, the executory contract which is abrogated must either involve intercourse, or its continued existence must be in some other way against public policy as that has been laid down in decided cases." Therefore, if nothing further had been done the defendants were after the outbreak of war bound to restore the advantage they had received, and the blankets would only remain as security for the repayment of the balance of the deposit.

The renewal of the agreement for security on the 5th August stands, however, on a different footing. It was made under a mistaken belief that the contracts were still legally binding and that was a mistake of law. The contract was not, therefore, voidable under section 21 of the Contract Act. Was it then illegal and therefore, void at common law as being a new contract with an enemy, which came within the prohibition in the Proclamation of the 5th August? So far as Zoller was acting by procuration for the German principals it was a contract with the enemy, but it was also an act of trading with the Bombay branch which according to the official explanation was permissible, provided it was bona fide and no transaction with the head office was involved.

I do not think, therefore, it can be said that the agreement by itself was illegal at common law. But the giving of security for money purporting to be payable under an agreement whose purpose was unlawful is itself an unlawful object, even though it was not stipulated for by the original agreement. Fisher v. Bridges (5) and Geere v. Mare (6).

The defendants were taking security for the performance of a contract which had become unlawful and, therefore, the agreement was unlawful.

It has also been argued by Mr. Campbell that on the outbreak of war the contract of agency between the plaintiff and Zoller was dissolved and, therefore, Zoller had no longer any authority to give his principals' goods as security, so that now they can repudiate his action. That contract was made in Germany and I should, therefore, have to consider whether according to German Law it would be dissolved on the outbreak of war. There is no evidence as to what is the German Law on the point, but no authority has been cited for the analogous proposition that a contract of agency between an English firm with the English manager of a branch established in Germany would be dissolved on the outbreak of war. No doubt that manager would come within the definition of 'enemy' and any intercourse with him would be prohibited, but it seems to me going too far to say that the contract of agency would be terminated, so that the principals could repudiate any transactions entered into by their agent in the ordinary course of his agency which were not prohibited by the lex loci. But apart from that, since trading with the branch of a hostile firm was permissible, it would never have been considered that all contracts of agency between enemy principals and the managers of their branch firms in allied territories became abrogated on the outbreak of war.

Some light on the question was thrown by the decision of the House of Lords in Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre & Rubber Co. (7).

The Company was registered in England but all the share holders except one, the Secretary, were Germans and the Directors were in Germany. A writ was issued in the name of the Company by the Secretary and it was contented that he had no authority from the Directors to file suits. It was sought to be established that the Directors by resolution had given him such authority, but no trace of any such resolution could be found in the minute books. Their Lordships were unanimous in the opinion that for want of authority on the part of the agent the suit could not proceed. But it was further contended that the Company was an enemy Company and Lord Parker, while expressing the opinion of the majority of their Lordships, said: "A Company incorporated in the United Kingdom is a legal entity, a creation of law with the status and capacity which the law confers....Such a Company... may assume an enemy character. This will be the case if its agents or the persons in de facto control of its affairs, whether authorised or not, are resident in an enemy country....A person knowingly dealing with the Company in such a case is trading with the enemy." The Directors resident in Germany were incapable of authorizing the institution of this action. The contention that the Secretary of the Company could authorise such institution is untenable. The resolution by which he was appointed Secretary would confer on him such powers only as were incident to the performance of his secretarial duties. It is true that the Directors of the Company might by a proper resolution in that behalf have conferred on him a power to authorise the institution of proceedings on the Company's name but they did not do so.

I think it may be inferred from this judgment that the Secretary's contract of agency was not terminated by the outbreak of war and that if he had been duly authorised to file suits on behalf of the Company, the only question to be decided would have been whether a Company whose affairs were being managed by Directors in Germany was entitled to sue in the Courts in England.

I do not think, therefore, that the plaintiffs could have repudiated the acts of Zoller in giving a pledge of the blankets and cotton to the defendants on the ground that the agency had terminated.

Then as to the transactions of the 3rd September. On the face of them they constituted a purchase by the defendants of cotton from the plaintiffs' firm. Whether such a transaction could have been legal it is not necessary to consider, for in reality the transactions of the 3rd September amounted to this. Defendants agreed with plaintiffs' branch manager, Zoller, to treat the contracts of July as broken on a condition that Zoller agreed to pay the differences calculated at the then rates of the day on the various due dates.

That, as far as I can see, was a perfectly legitimate transaction, not only according to the Proclamation of the 5th August but also that of the 9th September. It did nothing more than fix the damages for breach of certain contracts which both parties were under the mistaken belief could be legally enforced at the due dates. The legality or illegality of the contract to give security was in no way affected.

I think that when Tombroff took charge of the assets of the Bombay branch of the plaintiff firm, he could still have recovered the security after allowing for repayment of Rs. 10,000.

But when Tombroff with the approval of the Controller allowed the defendants to sell the blankets and set off the amount realised against the amount due on the cotton contracts as well as the Rs. 10,000, that amounted to a payment, and the question whether the plaintiffs can now recover it depends on an entirely different set of circumstances to the question whether the agreement to give security was a lawful contract.

The plaintiffs cannot seek to recover it by the aid of section 65 of the Contract Act as an advantage received by the defendants under contracts which became void, as the advantage must be received before the contract becomes void. Nor do I think it can be said in this case that the plaintiffs can recover the money as paid under contracts which have been discovered to be void, as those words cannot be applied to these contracts. If the money had been paid in part payment for the cotton, it might have been recovered on the general principle that money paid in consideration of an executory contract which is illegal may be recovered back upon the repudiation of the transaction as upon failure of consideration. But that again is not the case here. The money was paid as damages for breach of contract, which as a matter of fact had become void and the performance of which had become unlawful, at a time when both parties thought the contracts were lawful and legally enforceable. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiffs can only recover by the aid of section 72 of the Contract Act.

It has been argued that money paid under mistake can be recovered whether the mistake be one of law or of fact. It is unfortunate that the wording of section 72 is sufficiently ambiguous to lead to a difficulty in considering it. On the face of it 'mistake' includes mistake of law.

But it is said that under section 21 a contract is not voidable on the ground that the parties contracted under a mistaken belief of the law existing in British India, and the effect of that section would be neutralised if a party to such a contract could recover what he had paid by means of section 72, though under section 21 the contract remained legally enforceable.

This seems to be the argument of Messrs. Pollock & Mulla at page 308 and as far as I can see, it is sound.

In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiffs cannot recover from the defendants what they realised by the sale of the blankets. In any event it is admitted that the defendants could retain sufficient to recoup themselves the balance of their deposit.

The next question is whether the defendants can succeed on their counter-claim. That depends on the question whether in the events which have happened it can be said that though the sale proceeds of the cotton are in the hands of the Liquidator, they must be treated on equitable principles as if they had been actually received by the defendants.

If the cotton had been still in possession of the defendants, I think the Liquidator could have recovered on the ground, as I have already stated that the agreement to give security on the 26th or 27th August was bad. But the defendants gave possession of the cotton to Tombroff's purchasers on the understanding that if the blankets did not realise sufficient to satisfy their claim for damages, the balance would be paid out of the sale-proceeds of the cotton. That arrangement was for the benefit of the Liquidator, who was anxious to realise the cotton in order to save expenses, as the cotton could be sold at once while there was considerable difficulty in selling the blankets. As long as no steps were taken to set aside the agreement of pledge or even to dispute its validity, the defendants could have sold the cotton after due notice had been given to the Liquidator. It is difficult to see how the defendants can be put in worse position than they would have been if they had themselves sold sufficient cotton to satisfy their claim. It is not as if there had been a mere promise by the Liquidator to pay the defendants' claim out of the general cash balance in his hands.

This then is the case of a Liquidator of a hostile firm who had admitted the liability of the firm to the defendants, who has actually paid them a portion of their claim and for the balance holds a sum of money under an arrangement which amounted to an admission that he held it on behalf of the defendants. The state of pledge no longer existed, the money was earmarked for the defendants. No doubt if the parties had been aware of the true legal position when war broke out, the defendants would only have been able to retain their security for the balance of their deposit, but it is impossible now, in the view I take of the law, that the present Liquidator can repudiate the action of his predecessor.

I find on the issues:—

1. (a) The pledge of the blankets on 4th was an advantage which the defendants would have been bound to restore under section 65 of the Contract Act on the outbreak of war except to the extent of Rs. 10,000.

(b) The pledge of the 5th August was void except to the extent of Rs. 10,000.

2. The contracts by the plaintiffs for the purchase of cotton from the defendants became void on the outbreak of war.

3. The settlement of the contracts of purchase by cross-contracts of sale was a legitimate transaction as merely fixing the damages for the breach of the contracts of purchase which both parties mistakenly believed could still be legally enforced.

JUDGMENT.

MARTEN, J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Macleod of the 12th December 1918 dismissing the plaintiffs' claim in this suit and allowing the defendants' counter-claim. On the figures since agreed, the amount of the claim is Rs. 69,467-9-0, representing the nett proceeds of sale of certain cotton blankets. The amount of the counter-claim is Rs. 58,440-9 0, representing part of the nett proceeds of sale of certain cotton bales. The aggregate amount in dispute is, therefore, Rs. 1,27,908. This sum represents the amount alleged to have been owing to the defendants on the security of the blankets and bales, which were pledged to them for differences on certain cotton contracts. The plaintiffs say these pledges and contracts became or were illegal and void, having regard to the outbreak of war at 11 P. M. on 4th August 1914, and that they are entitled to recover the sale proceeds of the blankets which were sold by the defendants in and prior to 1915, and to retain the sale-proceeds of the bales which were by arrangement sold by the then Liquidator of the plaintiffs in the same year. Counsel for the appellants stated that apart from the sums in dispute, the realised Indian assets of the plaintiffs are insufficient to meet their Indian liabilities, but there is no evidence before us to that effect.

It is common ground that both the cotton blankets and the cotton bales were, prior to the war, the property of the plaintiffs, Wolf & Sons, a German firm with its head office in Germany and a branch office at Bombay, which was managed by a German named F. Zoller, who was interned on the 5th September 1914. Paragraph 2 of the plaint describes the plaintiff firm as being "incorporated;" but there is no evidence of this, and they have been treated in these proceedings as an ordinary partnership firm. From the report in Wolf & Sons v. Carr, Parker & Co. (8) this appears to be their correct status. The plaintiff firm now sues by Mr. P. S. Mellor, the present Controller of Hostile Trading Concerns, Bombay, who was appointed Liquidator of this hostile firm by the Bombay Government order of the 20th September 1916, Exhibit A to the plaint. The defendants Dadiba Khimji & Co. are an Indian firm carrying on business in Bombay, and were the guaranteed brokers and Muccadums of the plaintiffs prior to the war.

It is also common ground that between the 4th August and the 3rd September 1914 (inclusive) the blankets and bales were handed over to the defendants by Zoller on behalf of the plaintiffs as security for (a) the cotton differences, and (b) Rs. 10,000, the balance of a deposit of Rs. 50,000 by the defendants. No dispute arises about the Rs. 10,000. That is admitted to have been since repaid, and properly repaid, to the defendants out of the proceeds of sale of the blankets. But a dispute does arise about the cotton differences. These arose out of certain pre-war cotton contracts between the plaintiffs and the defendants for January to March 1915 delivery, which were closed or purported to be closed by Zoller on behalf of the plaintiffs on the 3rd September 1914, and showed a heavy balance payable to the defendants on the due dates. To secure the sum ultimately payable by the plaintiffs on these pre war contracts, Zoller pledged the cotton blankets on the 4th or 5th August 1914, and by way of further security the cotton bales on or about the 26th or 27th August. There is no evidence of any further express pledge on the 3rd September.

What happened to the business after Zoller was interned was this. One Tombroff was appointed Liquidator by Government, and, in the course of his duties, he appears to have taken directions from time to time from Mr. G. S. Hardy, I C. S., the then Controller of Hostile Trading Concerns. At the trial, the order appointing Tombroff was called for by the defendants. It was not produced, but Counsel for the plaintiffs stated: "We don't dispute that he" (Tombroff) "had power to deal with the assets of Wolf & Co." The trial accordingly proceeded on that footing.

In the course of managing or winding-up the business in 1915, Tombroff had to deal with the cotton blankets and bales and also with the pledges which the defendants claimed thereon for the amount of the cotton differences. Having regard to the approaching monsoon, Tombroff thought it desirable, if not imperative, to sell these goods, and he accordingly approached the Controller and the defendants on the subject. As regards the blankets we have a correspondence which is very material. Writing to the Controller on the 5th June 1915, the Liquidator says:—

"I have the honour to inform you that there are now the following stocks left with me which I would propose selling by auction in small lots...799 bales of cotton blankets in the godown of Dadiba Khimji & Co. The blankets are in possession of Dadiba Khimji & Co. as security against differences due to them on cotton, but I trust there would be no objection on their part to have these goods sold. Their claims have been duly taken note of...As for the blankets it is imperative they should be sold now."

To this proposal for sale, the Controller agreed in a letter of the 11th June 1915.

Then the Liquidator after taking the advice of his Solicitors wrote to the Controller on the 1st July as follows:—

(8) (1915) W. N. (Eng.) 195; 31 T. L. R. 407.

WOLF & SONS v. DADIBA KHIMJI.

"Re 797 bales of cotton blankets.

"I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of 11th instant referring among other lots to the 797 bales mentioned above.

"These bales were given in charge of Dadiba Khimji & Co., Mucadums of this firm, under an agreement dated 5th August 1914, and with the view of obtaining possession of the same I consulted Messrs. Payne & Co. for opinion, and received their reply as per their letter enclosed. Under the circumstances, I shall arrange with Dadiba Khimji & Co. for selling these goods by public auction and the proceeds realised to be retained by Dadiba Khimji & Co. against their claim on this firm."

It will be noted that this letter to the Controller tells him that the agreement relied on by the defendants is dated the 5th August 1914, which is after the outbreak of war.

The enclosed opinion of the Solicitors Messrs. Payne & Co., which is dated 16th June 1915, was as follows :—

"Dadiba Khimji & Co. and Wolf & Sons.

Referring to your letter of date Dadiba Khimji & Co. have got the blankets in question as security for payment of the moneys due to them, and you are, therefore, not entitled to claim delivery of the blankets without paying the moneys due to them. You may, therefore, allow Dadiba Khimji & Co. to sell the blankets after consultation with you as to the price for which they are to be sold. We return the papers sent to us herewith."

The letter of instructions to the Solicitors which they refer to is not in evidence : nor are we told what were the papers they returned.

On the 2nd July the Controller acknowledged the receipt of the Liquidator's letter of the 1st July and its enclosure. Thereupon the Liquidator appears to have carried out the arrangement contemplated, that is to say, he agreed with the defendants that they should sell the blankets and apply the sale proceeds in or towards payment of their debt for the cotton differences.

The defendants accordingly proceeded to sell the blankets by auction, but as appears from their letter of the 7th of October 1915 to the Liquidator, only 180 bales were sold. This letter is material and I may quote portions of it.

"Re Blankets accounts. W. Wolf & Sons.

"We have to bring to your notice the following and shall thank you to let us know your decision after due consideration.

"Out of 737 bales of blankets which are mortgaged to us by W. Wolf & Sons we have sold so far with your consent by auction the following quantities at the rates mentioned below :—

"180 bales fetched Rs. 17,695.

"Out of the amount we have paid Rs. 442-8-0 as to Messrs. Menessee & Co. auctioneers their commission at 2½ per cent.

"We have to say that the way these blankets are sold by auction, they are not fetching their real value because people will not pay their prices in auction and as this is prejudicial both to W. Wolf & Sons' interest and to ours, we would propose to allot the balance of about 500 bales to us against our outstanding claim with W. Wolf & Sons, and we are prepared to pay Rs. 10 per bale more than the average price obtained in the three auction sales.

"The assuring is, of course, not possible for you to do because you have to sell quickly and close the liquidation. Please remember that the running expenses per month are about Rs. 750; we have to pay Rs. 450 in shape of godown rent and there is insurance and shop rent and wages, etc., which expenses will be saved to you, besides the auctioneers' commission at 2½ per cent. if the goods are sold by auction."

The Liquidator consulted the Controller on this proposal and wrote to him on the 22nd October 1915 as follows:—

"With reference to the interview I had with you this afternoon in connection with the sale of blankets of this firm mortgaged to Dadiba Khimji & Co., I have the honour to inform you that I have duly intimated to them that their offer is accepted at the prices realised in the auction sale held on the 18th instant. There are some bales absolutely damaged which I believe can be only sold by auction, and in the interest of the firm I would suggest this procedure."

It appears from a note on this letter that a verbal reply was given by the Controller on 23rd October 1915.

Then on 28th October Tombroff wrote to the defendants as follows:—

'With reference to my letter dated 8th instant I have referred to the Controller... your offer for purchase of sound bales out of the lot of the blankets mortgaged to you by this firm.

"Please note that the Controller has accepted your offer to buy at the prices realised in the auction sale of Messrs. Crawford & Co. held on the 18th instant. As there is very short time for the termination of the liquidation, I should ask you to submit to this office a complete statement of account of all bales so far sold including those purchased by you with amounts realised and your bills for godown rent and insurance charges, etc..."

The defendants acknowledged this letter on the 29th October and agreed to pay a certain sum for some scales and tarpaulins mentioned in the Liquidator's letter of 28th October.

On the 12th February 1916 the defendants sent to the then Liquidators, Ferguson & Co., their statement of account for the blankets, scales and tarpaulins, and on the 10th March 1916 their final account showing a balance of Rs. 47,194 still due to them and which according to them had been agreed by Tombroff to be paid out of the sale-proceeds of the cotton bales in his hands.

Now as regards the cotton bales we have no correspondence as to the arrangement arrived at. There was, however, no cross examintion of the defendants' witnesses on the point: nor have the plaintiffs put in any defence to the defendant's counter-claim or denied in any pleading the agreement set up in paragraph 13 of the written statement, or called Tambroff or Mr. Hardy as witnesses. I am, accordingly, satisfied that the agreement was made between Tombroff and the defendants, and that in effect it was as follows:—

Tombroff was to sell the cotton and the defendants were to give delivery to Tombroff's purchasers and allow Tombroff to receive the purchase money, but on this express condition that the balance of the defendants' claim remaining after the realisation of the blankets was to be paid out of the proceeds of sale of the cotton. I think one may also infer that Tombroff acted here with the approval of the Controller, as he undoubtedly did as regards the blankets.

The precise date of this agreement about the sale of the cotton bales does not appear, but I think it clear that the sales took place somewhere in 1915. The reason no doubt why the evidence is rather meagre is that at the trial there was really no dispute as to the facts. The only witness called by the plaintiffs was Zoller, and he could not depose to the arrangement with the Liquidator, for he was interned at the time, and it does not appear that he was consulted in any way. Counsel tells us, too, that he could not be questioned much, owing to his strange manner in the witness-box, and that he committed suicide the same evening.

It is common ground, however, that the arrangement in question was carried out so far as the defendants were concerned. They gave delivery to Tombroff's purchasers and allowed him to get possession of the sale-proceeds. The plaintiffs, however, now repudiate the condition on which these bales were given up by the defendants, and the sale-proceeds obtained by Tombroff and claim that they are under no obligation to pay what was agreed to be paid to the defendants.

As I have already said, the defendants' final accounts were sent to the then Liquidators on the 12th February and 10th March 1916, and it was not till the 12th April 1916 that the defendants had any intimation that the plaintiffs repudiated the transaction. This letter of the 12th April 1916, which was written to the defendants by the attorneys of the then Liquidators, alleged that the original pledge of the blankets on the 5th August 1914 was illegal and void: that the Liquidators were entitled to the sale proceeds in the hands of the defendants as pledgees: that the Liquidators would, however, give credit for the Rs. 10,000 deposit but demanded payment of the balance of the sale proceeds of the blankets within twenty-four hours, in default of which they would without further intimation or delay file a suit to recover the sale-proceeds. The demand for payment within twenty-four hours was utterly unreasonable, if not silly, but it is almost a common form among Bombay Solicitors and will probably take time to eradicate. It is quite in keeping with this sort of demand that no proceedings to enforce it were taken for over one year and one-quarter, viz., till the present suit was instituted on the 6th August 1917, and that after a further thirteen months the plaint was amended materially.

To complete the main facts, I should state that on the 13th November 1915 Tombroff wrote to the Controller drawing his attention to a decree of Macleod, J, of the previous day in Textile Manufacturing Co. Ltd v. Salomon Brothers (4) (since reported), whereby according to Tombroff "all contracts entered into with alien firms are held as cancelled by virtue of the Royal Proclamation." The writer proceeded, "I have also to point out that this firm held a stock of blankets which the manager had handed over to Dadiba Khimji & Co. as security against their claim for differences on cotton contracts, and after consulting my solicitors I shall have to claim (since the question of contracts is settled as above) to obtain possession of whatever stock there may be still unsold in the hands of Dadiba Khimji & Co. to be included in the liquidation." It does not, however, appear that the Controller took any steps on this letter or made any communication to the defendants. The first hostile communication to them was the solicitors' letter of the 12th April 1916. The appellants rely on this letter of the 13th November 1915 as establishing the date when they first discovered the pre-war contracts to be illegal and void.

The arguments presented to us on this appeal were centred round two main points, viz. (1) the effect of the war on the transactions in question and on the legal position of the Bombay branch of the enemy firm, and (2) the provisions of the Indian Contract Act with reference to the recovery of money.

On the first branch of the case, it was urged by the appellants that the pre-war contracts of 16th to 23rd July 1914 and the pre-war pledge (if any) of 4th August 1914 became ipso facto void on the outbreak of war, that the further pledges given on the 5th August and on the 26th or 27th August were similarly void, and that the cross contracts of the 3rd of September were so tainted with the illegality of the pre-war contracts as to be themselves void, or alternatively only amounted to the settlement of a nullity. It was further urged by the appellants that Zoller's agency terminated ipso facto on the outbreak of war, and that, therefore, he had no power to enter into any of the subsequent transactions.

In the view I take of this case, it is not necessary for me to decide whether these propositions are well founded. I think that for the purposes of this case one may assume in favour of the appellants, but without deciding the point, that all their contentions on this head are correct. But while making this assumption, I am of opinion that at any rate up to November 1915, the legal position of an Indian branch of any enemy firm was sufficiently doubtful as to afford some justification for the view that the transactions in question were valid. For that purpose and that purpose only I will refer to certain Proclamations and Orders then in force in India.

The Royal Proclamation No. 1 of the 5th August 1914 (see English Manual of Emergency Legislation, 1914, page 375) has a somewhat obscure clause at the end which probably standing by itself would not validate trade with a branch like that we have to deal with. But the official announcement of the 22nd August 1914 issued by the treasury in explanation of the Proclamation No. 1 (see English Manual, page 377) stated in paragraph 3:

"If a firm with headquarters in hostile territory has a branch in neutral or British territory, trade with the branch is (apart from prohibitions in special cases) permissible, as long as the trade is bona fide with the branch, and no transaction with the head office is involved."

And paragraph 4 stated:

"Commercial contracts entered into before war broke out with firms established in hostile territory cannot be performed during the war, and payments under them ought not to be made to such firms during the war. Where, however, nothing remains to be done save to pay for goods already delivered, or for services already rendered, there is no objection to making the payment."

This was followed by the Royal Proclamation No. 2 of the 9th September 1914 (see Indian Manual of Legislation and Orders relating to the War, 6th Edition, 1918, page 77). This declared that as from the date thereof, Proclamation No. 1 together with any public announcement officially issued in explanation thereof was revoked and the present Proclamation substituted therefor. This obviously referred to the announcement of the 22nd of August, and to that extent recognised its former validity. Then in paragraph 3 it defined "enemy." This definition would clearly include the plaintiffs' head office in Germany, but perhaps not Zoller himself, as he was neither "resident nor carrying on business in Germany." Paragraph 6 dealt with branches as follows:—

"Provided always that where an enemy has a branch locally situated in British, allied, or neutral territory, not being neutral territory in Europe, transactions by or with such branch shall not be treated as transactions by or with an enemy."

Then in paragraph 7:

'Nothing in this Proclamation shall be deemed to prohibit payments by or on account of enemies to persons resident, carrying on business or being in our Dominions, if such payments arise out of transactions entered into before the outbreak of war or otherwise permitted."

In addition to these Proclamations, there was in India on the 8th August 1914 a Notification (see Indian Manual, page 184) putting in force the Foreigners Act III of 1864. By virtue of section 9 of that Act no foreigner was to travel in or pass through any part of British India without a license. This was followed on the 20th of August by a Foreigners Ordinance No. III of 1914 (see Indian Manual, page 47) giving powers to the Governor-General in Council by order to restrict the egress of foreigners and to prohibit or restrict their trade or business. Then on the 22nd August there was a Notification (see Indian Manual, page 358) prohibiting foreigners from leaving the country. On the 28th August two Press Notes were issued in Bombay by the Political Department, the one on the lines of the Treasury Explanation of 22nd August, and the other stating certain arrangements permitting the clearance and disposal by German subjects of imported and other goods, and permitting the delivery to British subjects of goods, from German firms, and to "have commercial dealings with them in respect of existing stocks only." These Press Notes are referred to in Textile Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. Salomon Brothers (4) and are set out in full in Campbell's "Trading with the Enemy" at pages 408-409. On the 14th November 1914 the Hostile Foreigners (Trading) Order (see Indian Manual, page 373) was passed, rendering it necessary for all hostile firms to obtain within one month licenses to trade. This provided in paragraph 5 (2) that "An application on behalf of a hostile foreigner or hostile firm not resident or located in British India shall be signed by a manager or other agent resident in British India."

As regards the plaintiffs themselves it appears that by a Notification of the 4th March 1915 (see Indian Manual, page 379) their licenses to trade were to "remain in force" until the 14th of August 1915; and it appears that by a subsequent Notification this period was extended to 14th November 1915. (See Note (2) on page 380 of the Indian Manual.) As the Notification of the 4th March says that the licenses are "to remain in force," I should infer that Wolf & Sons had previously obtained the necessary license to trade.

Now if one looks at the Proclamations and in particular at paragraphs 6 and 7 of the Proclamation No. 2, I think a business man—or for the matter of that a lawyer—might not unnaturally infer that you could deal with what I will call an enemy branch in India, provided such dealing involved no intercourse with the head office in Germany [see Ingle Limited v. Mannheim Continental Insurance Company (9)]. And further that where, as here, the transaction merely involved payment by the enemy branch, namely, in respect of the cotton differences, one might fairly urge that it was an authorised payment within paragraph 7, as being a payment to a British subject arising out of a transaction entered into before the outbreak of war. [See same case page 232* and Halsey v. Lowenfeld (10).] And that if such a payment was authorised, it was also legitimate to do something short of payment, viz, to give security to a British subject for such payment.

Or, again, if one looked at Hall's International Law, 6th Edition, page 338 which was cited with approval by Mr. Justice Sargant in Thurn and Taxis v. Moffitt (11), it might be said that at any rate until his internment Zoller was not disabled by the war from entering into the transaction in question. The passage I refer to is as follows:—

"When persons are allowed to remain, either for a specified time after the commencement of war, or during good behaviour, they are exonerated from the disabilities of enemies for such time as they in fact stay, and they are placed in the same position as other foreigners, except that they cannot carry on a direct trade in their own or other enemy vessels with the enemy country."

Now, here, Zoller was prohibited by the Notification of the 8th, or, at any rate of the 22nd August from leaving the country—a fact which was relied on by Mr. Justice Sargant. The actual decision in that case, viz., that the princess, though of enemy nationality, was entitled to sue in the English Courts for an injunction to restrain the publication of libels on her was approved by the Court of Appeal in Porter v. Freudenberg (3) and in Schaffenius v. Goldberg (12), the latter of which cases decides that the right to sue is not lost by internment.

Further, if it be urged that the transactions in question must be judged in the light of the Proclamations actually in force at the date of the transaction and that the official explanation of the 22nd August and the two Press Notes of 28th August had no legal authority, it may be urged in answer that this is taking a somewhat narrow view of the subject, and that it would not be unreasonable for the Controller or the Liquidator acting under his directions to abide by the spirit of the later Proclamation, viz., No. 2 of the 9th September 1914, and which remained in force during 1915.

As was said by Mr. Justice Macleod in Textile Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. Salomon Brothers (4), speaking of affairs in Bombay during the latter half of 1914:

"It is not to be wondered at that confronted with this bewildering array of Proclamations, Ordinances, Orders and official communications, abounding in conflicting provisions, the members of the mercantile community in Bombay, whether British subjects, foreigners or enemies, remained paralysed—unable to form any opinion as to what they could do or what they could not do."

In the present case, however, we have to deal with the Controller, a Government Official, who presumably had special facilities for ascertaining the policy and intentions of Government, and if necessary of obtaining the highest legal advice.

Further, in the present case, Mr. Justice Macleod, while holding that the pre-war contracts became invalid and that the pledges were invalid, thought that the September settlement by cross-contracts was in itself valid, as was also the contract of 25th August (apart from the actual pledge) and that Zoller's agency was not terminated by the war. The learned Judge left open the question whether the defendants could in any event claim to rank as unsecured creditors.

I think I have now stated enough to show that in 1914-15, the true legal position was open to doubt, at any rate in some particulars. As I have already said, I need not and I do not decide what that position was. I merely assume for the purposes of this case that the appellants are correct on this first branch of the case.

I come accordingly to the second branch which appears to me to be the crux of the case, viz., on what legal grounds can the plaintiffs claim to recover the sale-proceeds of the blankets. One may clear the ground by saying that their claim is based solely on section 72, or alternatively, on section 65, of the Indian Contract Act. They admitted that no claim based on the English Law apart from that Act could succeed. The relief given in Gulabchand v. Fulbai (13) (where the illegal purpose had not been carried out) was, therefore, inapplicable. In view of such cases as Kearley v. Thomson (14) this admission was, I think, properly made, having regard to the appellants' contentions that all the transactions were illegal. Nor need I consider whether if this Court was administering some fund, the mistake could be rectified [see

Robinson, In re, McLaren v. Robinson (15) and Ainsworth, In re, Finch v. Smith (16)], nor whether if the payment had been made to its own officer by a mistake of law the payment would be refunded [see Simmonds, Ex parte, Carnac, In re (17), Opera Limited, In re (18)].

Before us, section 72 was relied on first in argument. It was said that this was a case of "money paid by mistake," viz., a mistake of law, all parties thinking the contracts and pledges were valid and the debt due. When asked whether the appellants relied on any mistake of the then Liquidator, Counsel at first said no, but at a later stage withdrew that answer and said yes. I am not surprised at Counsel's first answer. There is not a word in the pleadings about the Liquidator or Controller being under any mistake; no issue was raised about it: and neither of them went into the witness-box to say he had made any mistake. The amended plaint is, I think, based on a different section altogether, viz., section 65, as will be seen from looking at paragraphs 9, 9A and 14 and in particular to the allegation in paragraph 9 as to the agreement being "discovered to be viod."

We were referred by the appellants to paragraph 4 of the defendants' supplemental written statement of 12th October 1918, but this only dealt with the cross contracts of 3rd September 1914 and was in answer to the amended paragraphs 9A and 10 of the plaint. So, too, Issues Nos. 5 and 5A refer to a mistake at the time of the settlement mentioned in issue No. 4, viz., the settlement by cross-contracts on 3rd September 1914. It has nothing to do with any subsequent mistake by the Liquidator.

It seems to me, therefore, that on the pleadings, this point under section 72 is not open to the appellants and that in any event there is not sufficient evidence of any payment "by mistake." In the view I take, therefore, it is really unnecessary to consider whether section 72 applies to a mistake of law. But as the learned trial Judge did deal with this point, as it may be urged that an implied amendment of the pleadings was thereby made, and the case argued on the assumption that there was some evidence of a mistake in law, I will deal with the matter on this footing.

The next difficulty in the way of applying section 72 is section 21, which says that "A contract is not voidable because it was caused by a mistake as to any law in force in British India." Consequently, if section 72 applies to mistakes of law, a man might recover payments under section 72, although he could not avoid the contract under section 21. I am thinking, of course, of a case where the same mistake is made at the inception of the contract as on the payment thereunder. Counsel for the appellants admitted that in such a case section 72 would not apply. The payment in such a case, he said, would be made under the contract (which ex hypothesi could not be rescinded under section 21), and consequently the payment would not be by mistake.

The appellants contended, however, that section 21 did not apply here because there was no "contract" as defined by section 2 (h), viz., "an agreement enforceable by law." There was at most an "agreement not enforceable by law" and, therefore, void under section 2 (g). This contention is, I think erroneous on the facts. In my judgment the Liquidator entered into binding agreements with the defendants for the sale of the blankets and bales and for the application of the proceeds in discharge of the defendants' debt. The disabilities attaching to Zoller did not apply to the Liquidator or the Controller. He, as Counsel admitted at the trial, had power to deal with the assets.

Further the Enemy Trading Act No. X of 1916 (Indian Manual, page 15), which was not cited to us, provides in section 13 that—

"Any act done after the 3rd day of August 1914, by, or under the orders of, any officer of Government in respect of the property, moveable or immoveable, of any hostile foreigner or hostile firm which, if this Act had been in force, could have been validly done in the exercise of the powers conferred thereby, or which could have been conferred thereunder is hereby validated."

Sections 4 and 5 give wide powers for winding up enemy businesses and dealing with their assets in accordance with the rules to be made by the Governor General in Council. This provides in effect that such a winding-up order is to have the same effect as if made by the Court under the Indian Companies Act, 1913, subject to modifications to be specified.

Now one of the ordinary duties of a Liquidator confronted with a person claiming to be a secured creditor is to decide whether he will admit the claim or fight it, and if necessary, he will obtain the directions of the Court. And subject to the control of the Court he can pay creditors or make any compromise or arrangement with creditors or persons claiming to be creditors (see Indian Companies Act, section 234). But under section 3 of the Enemy Trading (Winding-up) Order, 1916 (see Indian Manual, page 284) Government takes the place of the 'Court" in applying the Companies Act to this winding-up; and as appears by the Notification, Exhibit A to plaint, the present Controller can exercise all the powers conferred on Official Liquidators by section 179 of the Indian Companies Act without the sanction or intervention of Government, and I think that the powers under section 234 could also have been conferred on him.

I am, therefore, of opinion that, apart from all other grounds, the acts of Tombroff and Mr. Hardy are validated by section 13 of the Enemy Trading Act, 1916, as being acts which could have been validly done in exercise of powers which could have been conferred under that Act. As I have already pointed out the law at the time was not clear, and I do not think that either of these gentlemen can be blamed for preferring a settlement to a law suit, particularly when they were told by their legal advisers that the defendants were right.

It is not suggested that the wide powers given by section 6 of the Enemy Trading Act, 1916, to the Governor-General in Council of cancelling contracts injurious to the public interest or re-vesting property transferred under them have ever been or could be exercised in the present case.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the agreements entered into by the Liquidator with the defendants were "contracts" within the meaning of the Indian Contract Act and could not be avoided under section 21 as being made under any mistake of law. That being so, I am further of opinion that the payments made to the defendants were payments under this binding contract, and could not be recovered under section 72.

In this view of the case, I need not decide whether section 72 can ever apply to a mistake of law, but as at present advised, the passage referred to by the learned trial Judge in Pollock and Mulla (3rd Edition) at page 308 seems to me good sense: and good sense is generally good law. The passage in question runs:—

"The man who has chosen to judge his own cause upon all the facts and has decided against himself, cannot appeal to the Court against his own judgment, whether it was well-informed or not."

I may also refer to the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Rogers v. Ingham (19) as showing the evils which would result from allowing parties to re open transactions on the ground of some mistake of law having been made by them or their legal advisers.

I may also refer to the Holsworthy Urban Council v. Holsworthy Rural Council (20) where Warrington, J., held that a local authority was bound to continue payments under a compromise founded on an erroneous view of the law, notwithstanding that apart from such compromise the payments would be ultra vires. So, too, payments made under compulsion of legal process, whether in a home or foreign Court of Law, cannot be recovered [see Clydesdale Bank, Limited v. Schroder & Co. (21)]. These four English cases illustrate the general principles adopted in England, and I only cite them by way of analogy.

I should perhaps have added that before us the appellants admitted that the arrangement with Tombroff as to the application of the sale-proceeds of the blankets amounted to a payment. Under these circumstances, I think no real distinction arises between the few blankets sold before June 1915 and those sold afterwards.

I may also add that the defendants, in the alternative, contended that the Liquidator's agreements were a compromise and and in any event valid, and they relied on Callisher v. Bischoffsheim (22) and Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Co. (23). In the view I take, however, it is unnecessary to decide this point.

One other point may be noted, viz., that there is a clerical slip in the printed judgment on page 91 as to the answer of the learned trial Judge to the important issue No. 7. This should clearly be in the negative and not in the affirmative as printed.

The alternative claim of the plaintiffs is based on section 65 which runs:—

"When an agreement is discovered to be void, or when a contract becomes void, any person who has received any advantage under such agreement or contract is bound to restore it, or to make compensation for it, to the person from whom he received it."

Now I have already held that the agreements with the Liquidator were valid. Consequently, in my opinion, section 65 does not apply to the payments in question, as they were made to the defendants under valid agreements and not under void ones.

But supposing for the sake of argument that the payments were made under the contracts and pledges ending 3rd September 1914, and that the Liquidator's agreements were mere machinery for carrying out these contracts and pledges, the appellants have still other difficulties to contend with. The first arises from the words "agreement discovered to be void." I agree with the learned trial Judge that the word "agreement" as used in that section does not apply to the pre war contracts, for they were "contracts" within the meaning of the Indian Contract Act and not "agreements." As regards the subsequent agreements, the parties knew all the material facts and I doubt whether the words "discovered to be void" are really applicable to those agreements [see Gulabchand v. Fulbai (13)]. The decision in Jijibhai v. Nagji (24) can be supported as being based on the validity of a collateral agreement for a refund, quite apart from section 65 (see page 693).

Next, if the other branch of the section is relied on, no "advantange" under the pre-war contracts had been received by the defendants when ex hypothesi they became void on the outbreak of war. The plaintiffs' case is that there was no pledge till the 5th August. It hardly, therefore, lies in their months to contend there was a pre-war pledge and, therefore, an antecedent advantage for which compensation must now be given. In any event the advantage which the plaintiffs are trying to recover is the payment made to the defendants in 1915, and not the pledge in 1914. The appellants argued that under section 65 the advantage need not be received before the contract becomes void or the agreement is discovered to be void. This is not, I think, the true construction of section 65. I think the line is drawn at the time the agreement is discovered to be void or when the contract becomes void

In the result, therefore, I respectfully agree with the learned trial Judge that the payments in question cannot be recovered by the plaintiffs under either section 72 or 65 of the Indian Contract Act and that accordingly their claim fails.

As regards the counter-claim, the position at first sight seems somewhat different, for here it is the defendants who are claiming moneys in the hands of the Liquidator, viz, the part proceeds of the cotton bales. This claim is based solely on the arrangement with Tombroff. They say that by virtue of that agreement the Liquidator holds those moneys as earmarked or upon trust for them: that he can only discharge that obligation or trust by paying them the moneys: that they will then hold those moneys just as if the sale-proceeds had been paid to them in the first instance: and that their ultimate right to retain them will depend on the decision of this Court on the claim.

On this point also I agree with the decision of the learned trial Judge. The defendants have changed their position on the faith of a promise which, in my opinion, was validly made to them by the former Liquidator, and I think that promise is binding on the present Liquidator.

It was next contended by the appellants that the promise only applied to the defendants' "claim" generally and did not admit any specific sum to be due, and that accordingly the whole claim could be repudiated. This, I think, is not the true view. The defendants' account might no doubt be vouched, and details such as godown rent challenged: but no repudiation of the mortgage itself was intended by the parties. That, as the correspondence shows, was regarded as valid at any rate with respect to the blankets. Nor in the view I take is this a case where the assistance of equity is asked towards carrying out an illegal agreement as in Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (25).

In substance, therefore, it seems to me that the defendants' case on the cotton bales stands or falls with their case on the cotton blankets. They have succeeded on the claim. I think they also succeed on the counter-claim.

The appeal, therefore, of the plaintiffs should, in my judgment, be dismissed with costs. It will not, however, be necessary to proceed with the account directed by the decree, as the parties have since agreed on the figures. But this need not, I think, be mentioned in the order we make.

HEATON, J.—I agree that the Liquidator entered into valid agreements with the defendants regarding the sale of the blankets and of the cotton bales and for the disposal of the proceeds. And I think so for the reasons stated by my learned brother. That being so, the plaintiffs' claim must fail, for neither section 72 nor section 65 of the Indian Contract Act can possibly apply to what in this case happened, in fulfilment of those valid agreements.

I, therefore, agree that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

PATNA HIGH COURT.

APPEAL FROM APPELLATE DECREE No. 1376 OF 1917.

Appeal, second—Finding based on evidence legally insufficient and without reasons—High Court, power of interference of.

Where an Appellate Court reaches a finding on evidence legally insufficient to support it, and fails to give any reasons for the finding, the High Court will interfere in second appeal. [p. 484, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Manbhum.

Messrs. K. Hasnain and N. N. Sen, for the Appellants.

Mr. A. B. Mukherji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal has come for final decision by this Court after remand to the District Judge of Manbhum.

The plaintiff on the 15th Kartik 1294 obtained from the predecessor-in-interest of the defendant No. 4, the Zemindar, a Patta which was to the following effect:

"The entire Mauza Penra.....belongs to me by virtue of my khorposh right and I am in possession of the same. In the said Mauza there is a plot of land, known as Kulya Baid, the rent whereof is Rs. 4-8-0. I grant you Jote Patta of the said land fixing the aforesaid Jama from the current year 1294. From the present year, on payment of the said Jama of Rs. 4-8-0 to me you and your sons and grandsons in succession shall possess and enjoy, in great felicity, the said land either cultivating directly or by letting out the same to tenants....."

Then afterwards follow the boundaries, which are:

East—Danga.

West—Jore Nadi and Ghulijan.

North—Soori Rasta.

South—Ghatani (small-hill) and border of the field of Krishna Mahto.

The area of the plot demised was not given in the Patta, the purpose of which was, it seems, to secure the reclamation and cultivation by the plaintiffs of lands which until its date had been waste.

The defendant No. 4 as Malik subsequently brought ejectment suits against two Domes who, he alleged, were in possession as trespassers of certain lands which are claimed by the plaintiff to be part of the Kulya Baid plot leased to the plaintiffs. These suits were decreed ex parte in favour of defendant No. 4 and the latter obtained symbolical possession of them from the Court. When defendant No. 4 attempted to take possession, the plaintiffs instituted/proseedings under section 107 of the Code of Criminal Procedure against him, but these were converted into proseedings under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which eventually resulted in favour of defendant No. 4 Thereupon the plaintiffs instituted the suit out of which this appeal arises and in which they claimed that lands from which the Domes were ejected were part of those demised to them by the Patta of 1294 which included the whole of the Kulya, Baid plot. They also claimed to have obtained title by adverse possession to certain Danga land east of the Kulya Baid plot. Their claim by adverse possession was dropped and does not come into question in this appeal.

The defendant resisted the claim as to the Kulya Baid plot, asserting that the area leased was not 54 bighas 18 cottahs, as alleged by the plaintiffs, but a much smaller plot measuring about 4 bighas 15 dhurs only. The Munsif appointed a Commissioner to visit the lands, hold an investigation and make a map, comparing the boundaries of the lands as shown in the Patta with the boundaries of the land claimed by the plaintiffs.

The map prepared is before the Court and shows the area claimed by the plaintiffs and a much smaller area included therein found by the Commissioner to be the land leased to the plaintiffs according to the boundaries in the Patta.

There is a Jore along the western side of the whole area claimed by the plaintiffs and this is also the western boundary of the plot of the demised lands as found by the Commissioner. Likewise the eastern boundary both of the area claimed and of the plot marked out by the Commissioner is Danga land. The northern and southern boundaries have given rise to the main dispute in the case.

The Patta mentions the Suri Rasta as the northern boundary. The map shows, and it is admitted by the parties, that there are two Suri Rastas; one is far to the north and does not fall within or on the boundary of Mauza Pendra, but runs through Mauza Kaldi, this is the northern boundary of the disputed land as claimed by the plaintiff. Another Suri Rasta, further south, runs through Mauza Pendra, and is the northern boundary found by the Commissioner.

As regards the southern boundary, the Patta mentions a Chatani or hillock. It appears there are two such hillocks, a black Chatani and a white Chatani, the latter is north of the former. The Commissioner found that the black Chatani was meant, because it adjoined the northern boundary of Krishna Mahto's field and was in continuation of it.

The Munsif decided that the boundaries found by the Commissioner tallied with those mentioned in the Patta, while the plaintiff failed to substantiate his case. He gave the plaintiff a decree for the leased area as found by the Commissioner.

On appeal the Additional Subordinate Judge reversed the decree of the Munsif. He relied on the admission by the husband of defendant No. 4 that Kulya Baid extends up to the northern Suri Rasta and on the conclusion he had formed that the ejectment suits against the Domes were collusive.

On appeal to this Court Atkinson, J., found that the Subordinate Judge had failed altogether to apply to the construction of the Patta in question the ordinary legal rules of construction applicable to the Patta and such like written instruments, that he had ignored the description of the eastern and western boundaries and that he had not precisely ascertained what in fact were the boundaries on the four sides. He held that the Subordinate Judge's findings were not conclusive findings of fact and that the Subordinate Judge had not applied his mind to a fair and proper construction of the Patta which he was required to construe. He also held that the Subordinate Judge's finding that the ejectment decrees were collusive was not supported. He remanded the case to the lower Appellate Court with directions to ascertain the eastern and western boundaries and, having found those, to come to a finding what the northern and southern boundaries really were.

The learned Subordinate Judge on remand has found that it is the southern Suri Rasta that is the northern boundary mentioned in the Patta and that the other boundaries are as found by the Commissioner. He thus supports the Munsif's decision.

Before me it is now contended that the Subordinate Judge having decided what th boundaries were, his findings were findings of fact with which this Court could not interfere and that, therefore, I can, and should disregard the order remanding the case to the lower Appellate Court and the reasons given for that remand, and should hold that there is no second appeal against the judgment of the Additional Subordinate Judge. In support of this argument the cases of Bara Estate Ltd. v. Anup Chandra (1) and the East Indian Railway Company v. Changa Khan (2) were relied on.

A mere perusal of the Patta and of the judgment of the Additional Subordinate Judge convinces me that there was good and sufficient reason to set aside the decree in second appeal. I agree with the opinion expressed by Atkinson, J, that the evidence was legally insufficient to show that the ejectment decrees were collusive, and that the Appellate Court failed to give any satisfactory reasons for the finding. I agree, too, that the Additional Subordinate Judge failed properly to construe the Patta.

As to the ejectment suits, though the decrees were passed ex parte, and though the plaintiffs were not parties to the suits, the Appellate Court was not at liberty to find those suits collusive unless it could be shown that there was good evidence of collusion, and we are not shown that there was any. The decrees were valid and subsisting and had not been attacked.

As to the construction of the Patta, it mentioned that the lessor was in possession of Mouza Pendra, that a plot of land called Kulya Baid was in the said Mauza and it gave lease of Kulya Baid in the said Mauza, defining the boundaries. The Appellate Court was not at liberty to include in the area demised any land lying outside Pendra in another village. It may be, as admitted by defendant No. 3, that Kulya Baid extends up to the northern Suri Rasta, but it was only so much of the plot as lies in Pendra that was leased: while the area shown in the map of the Commissioner tallies exactly with the description and boundaries given in the Patta, the area claimed by the plaintiff does not, since he claims a portion of land falling outside Pendra and in another village, if the northern Suri Rasta is taken as the northern boundary.

It is further improbable that an area of 54 bighas would be leased on a rent of Rs. 4-8 0, which is a light rent even for 4 bighas 15 dhurs of land during reclamation.

I accept the findings of the Subordinate Judge on remand, and restore the decree of the Munsif, the decree of the lower Appellate Court being set aside.

The appeal is allowed with costs in both Appellate Courts.

Appeal, second—Finding of fact—Finding that suit contentious, whether can be interfered with—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s 52.

A finding of fact, e. g. that a suit was contentious within the meaning of section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act and that it was actively prosecuted, is binding on the High Court and cannot be interfered with in second appeal. [p. 486, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of Sir George Knox, Kt., Acting Chief Justice, dated the 6th of August 1917, in Second Appeal No. 434 of 1916.

Mr. Saila Nath Mukerji, for the Appellant.

Mr. U. S. Bajpai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of the following facts. The plaintiffs, who are the appellants before us, came into Court alleging that they and the defendants first party were joint owners of a certain fixed rate tenure; that the defendants second party alone were recorded in Government papers as the owners thereof; that on the 30th of June 1906 the defendants 1st party transferred their half share in the property to the defendants 3rd party; that on the 15th of March 1909 the plaintiffs brought a suit for a declaration of their right to a half share in the holding impleading the defendants first party. Two days after the institution of that suit, that is, on the 17th of March 1909, the defendants first party transferred the remaining half of the holding to the predecessor-in-title of the defendants second party. That suit was decided ex parte on the 27th of May 1909. The plaintiffs then attempted, in the Revenue Court, to have their names recorded, but failed. They thereupon brought the present suit for joint possession of the property against all three sets of defendants. The Court of first instance dismissed their suit in respect to half of the property, that is that half that had been sold on the 30th of June 1906, but it gave them a decree for joint possession of the other half of the property. The plaintiffs were satisfied with this decree but the defendants second party appealed. The Appellate Court upheld the decree of the first Court. The defendants second party then came to this Court on second appeal. The learned Judge of this Court first remitted two issues as follows:—first, "whether independently of the decree of 1909 the plaintiffs have proved any title to the land in dispute," secondly, "whether the plaintiffs have proved possession within limitation." These two issues went back and were decided by another Subordinate Judge, who held that independently of the decree of 1909 the plaintiffs had failed to prove any title and had not proved possession within limitation. The learned Judge of this Court, who heard the appeal on the return of these findings, came to the conclusion that the suit of 1909 was not in reality a contentious suit within the meaning of section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act; that, therefore, the plaintiffs having failed to prove title independently of the decree in the former suit, their suit should fail. He allowed the appeal, set aside the decrees of the Courts below and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit in toto.

Before us it is urged and with considerable force that this Court was bound by the findings of fact at which the Court below arrived. It is pointed out that the lower Appellate Court actually framed an issue as to whether or not the previous suit of 1909 was fraudulent and collusive, that it remitted that issue to the Court of first instance, that that Court held that it was a bona fide suit, and that the lower Appellate Court adopted that finding and came to the same conclusion. We think that there is considerable force in this argument. The learned Judge before whom this case was argued remarked in his judgment as follows:—"What the Court had to consider was a suit brought by a plaintiff who had no title to the property in dispute." This was assuming a point against the plaintiffs in this suit which had been decided in their favour in a previous suit. The judgment goes on to say: "It was instituted on the 15th of March and it came to a conclusion, and that conclusion an ex parte one, by the 27th of May 1909, that is within a little more than two months after the institution of the suit. Bearing these facts in mind, I cannot agree with the lower Appellate Court that the suit was in reality a contentious suit. It appears to me that the whole of these proceedings in March 1909 were of a collusive or fraudulent character and although a suit was apparently instituted and the matter terminated into a decree, I am not prepared to hold that the suit was a contentious suit actively prosecuted within the meaning of section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act." In other words, it may be said that the learned Judge went behind a clear finding of fact because he disagreed with it. This, as their Lordships of the Privy Council have remarked, "is contrary to law." The facts pointed out by the learned Judge are not in themselves sufficient to form the basis of a finding that the suit was a collusive suit. It may be perfectly true that the defendants second party were cheated and defrauded by the defendants first party, but there is not a scrap of evidence to show that the plaintiffs were any party to that fraud. In fact both the Courts below have come to the opposite conclusion. There was no onus on the plaintiffs in the present suit to prove their title independently of the decree of 1909. They based their claim upon that decree. They put it in evidence in Court, and the bare fact that they were unable to prove apart from it any title is not sufficient ground for holding that they had colluded with the defendants first party to defraud the defendants second party. In our opinion this Court was bound by the finding of fact at which the lower Appellate Court arrived. That suit being a bona fide suit, it was contentious from the day it was instituted to the day of its decision. It was no fault of the plaintiffs if the defendants first party did not come into Court to defend. The defendants second party purchased the property pending the decision of that suit and section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act clearly applies as the suit was contentious and was actively prosecuted, for it was prosecuted up to a decree in favour of the plaintiffs. In the present suit it is not open to the Court to go behind that decree in these circumstances. The title, therefore, being established in the plaintiffs as against the defendants second party, the plaintiffs were entitled at least to the decree given to them by the Court of first instance and upheld by the lower Appellate Court. We allow this appeal, set aside the decree of this Court and restore the decree of the lower Appellate Court. The plaintiffs will have their costs of both hearings in this Court.

Appeal against a decision of the Judicial Commissioner, Ranchi, dated the 20th July 1917, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Palamau, dated the 28th February 1916.

Mr. Rai Gursaran Prasad, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Kulwant Sahay and Radha Radhesh Narayan Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

ROE, J.—The plaintiff in this case sued to recover from the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur a jagir from which he had been evicted. This jagir was granted to him and to his putra poutradik mai warisan kayem mokamiyan. It was admitted in the pleadings that in grants made by the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur and his family the words putra poutradik standing alone would convey only an estate descending in the male line, but an attempt was made to show by evidence that being aware that such words would convey such an estate only, the grantor deliberately added the words mai warisan kayem mokamiyan in order to make it clear that the grant was not only to the descendants of the grantee in the male line but also to all persons who would inherit under the Mitakshara Law, and also to persons who might acquire an interest by purchase from such descendants. Now the case of Ram Saran Lal v. Ram Narain Singh (1) has been cited as being in the appellant's favour. But their Lordships of the Judicial Committee have lately advised His Majesty in a judgment not yet reported [Ram Narain Singh v. Ram Saran Lal (2)] that the conclusions of the Calcutta High Court are erroneous. Their Lordships say: "There can be no doubt that a jagir must be taken prima facie to be an estate only for life, although it may possibly be granted in such terms as to make it hereditary....But the terms which will make the grant of a jagir a grant of an estate of inheritance must, if they are to be considered alone, be terms which are not ambiguous, and must clearly show whether it was intended by the grantor that the right of inheritance should be general or should be confined to a particular class of heirs." And their Lordships go on further to say that they accepted the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge upon the evidence, oral and documentary, that there is a custom in Raj Ramnagarh that jagirs are resumable on failure of heirs male in the male line of the grantee, and for these reasons decided that the estate in question was an estate resumable on the failure of heirs male.

In this case it was not required that evidence upon the custom should be taken, for the custom was admitted in the pleadings. It follows that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the grantor of this estate intended to confer an estate heritable not only by heirs male but also by all heirs under the Mitakshara Law. The Courts below were of opinion that he had failed to prove this and we see no reason to differ from the finding upon the point.

In my view the words "mai warisan kayem mokamiyan" add nothing to the words "putra poutradik." It has been consistently held that putra poutradik in its ordinary acceptance must be taken to include, in the words of the Judicial Committee in the case of Ekradeshwar Singh v. Janeshwari Babuasin (3), "females as well as male heirs where by law the estate would descend to such heirs." Mai warisan adds nothing to this meaning and kayem mokamiyan adds nothing to it. The whole phrase means no more than the heirs who by law would be entitled to succeed to the estate. The meaning attaching to these words in Bengal cannot be considered in this case. We must consider the phrase from the point of view of the custom of the locality, and the custom of the locality being admitted to be that the words "putra poutradik" mean only heirs male, it follows that the custom of the locality must be that the words "putra poutradik mai warisan kayem mokamiyan" mean equally only heirs male. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Second appeal against the decision of the District Judge, Jhansi, dated the 26th of May 1917.

Mr. J. M. Banerji, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. L. Agarwala, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for redemption of a mortgage made by one Baiju in favour of Jaman, the father of defendants Nos. 1 and 2. Baiju is dead. He left two sons Ram Din and Phunki. Phunki died leaving sons who together with Ram Din have been found to be members of a joint family. Ram Din is the head of that family. He executed a sale-deed of the mortgaged property in favour of the plaintiff, and by virtue of this sale-deed the plaintiff has instituted the present suit for redemption,

The defendants are (1) the sons of the mortgagee and (2) Ram Din, the plaintiff's vendor. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit on the ground that it had not been proved that there was legal necessity for the sale made by Ram Din. This decision has been affirmed by the lower Appellate Court. In our opinion the Courts below have erred in dismissing the suit upon the ground mentioned above. Ram Din is the head of the family and apparently executed the sale-deed in favour of the plaintiff in that capacity. He represents the joint family which has been found to consist of himself and his nephews. No question as to his authority to transfer the property arises in this case as between the mortgagees and the plaintiff. That is a question between him and his co-sharers. He has executed the sale deed in the plaintiff's favour and that is not denied. He being the head of the family was competent to execute the sale, but whether as between him and his nephews the sale would be a valid and binding sale is not a question which arises in the present suit. The defendants mortgagees are not entitled to put it forward as an answer to the claim. In our opinion the suit ought to have been tried upon the merits. The rulings to which the Courts below have referred do not seem to us to have any bearing on the present case. There is no question of non-joinder of parties, as Ram Din is the head of the joint family and represents that family and the members thereof. We allow the appeal, set aside the decrees of the Courts below and remand the case to the Court of first instance with directions to re admit the suit upon its original number in the register and try it on the merits. Costs here and hitherto will be costs in the cause and the costs in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

Buddhist Law, Burmese—Inheritance—Younger brothers and sisters, whether preferred to elder ones—Full blood, whether excludes half blood—Nearer and remote relations, preference between.

It is settled law, among Burmese Buddhists, that as between elder brothers and sisters and younger brothers and sisters, the former are excluded by the latter in matters of inheritance. [p. 489, col. 1.]

The rule that the relations nearer in degree exclude the more remote, is limited in its application to full blood relations, and full blood relations exclude half blood relations, although the latter are nearer in degree. [p. 489, col. 1.]

Mr. May Oung, for the Appellants.

Mr. Sin Hla Aung, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Some lady whose name is not known had three children, (1) Kyun Ma by her first husband, (2) Ma Wa Byu, and (3) Chi Paung by her second husband. Kyun Ma died, so did Chi Paung and Chi Paung's children. Then Wa Byu died leaving no children or other direct heirs. The dispute is as regards Ma Wa Byu's estate and between Mi Ein Tha Pyu, the child of Kyun Ma, and Aung Nyun and San Shwe U, grandchildren of Chi Paung. The lower Courts have given one half to Mi Ein Tha Pyu and one-half to Aung Nyun and San Shwe U. Taung Mro is the husband of Mi Ein Tha Pyu, and has no interest in the estate and should not have been brought on the record at all.

The position is as follows:—Aung Nyun and San Shwe U are related to the deceased as grand nephews through their grandfather who was her full brother. Mi Ein Tha Pyu may be described as a niece of the deceased by her half sister. It has been argued for Ma Ein Tha Pyu that inasmuch as she is the niece, she is nearer in degree of relationship to the deceased than the grand-nephews, that is the latter are one degree remoter than she is, and that she, therefore, excludes them. For the other side it is pointed out that they are full blood relations of the deceased, while Mi Ein Tha Pyu is only half blood. They say that, moreover, their opponent is a child of the elder sister of the deceased and that in order to descend to her, the inheritance will have first to ascend to the elder sister and thus offend the rule against the ascent of inheritance, whereas their grandfather is a younger brother of the deceased. They, therefore, claim that they exclude Mi Ein Tha Pyu but they have not filed any cross-appeal.

There is a surprising absence of texts on the point.

To my mind the first point to be seriously considered is as between Kyun Ma and Chi Paung who would exclude the other, if they were claimants to the estate. I can find no text which deals with such a case. There are texts which deal with the rights of the children of a common father or mother by different wives or husbands in the estate of the father or mother, as the case may be, but they are not useful even by way of analogy. I can find no text which says that a person may share in the estate of his deceased half brother along with the deceased's own or full brother. In my judgment full blood relations exclude half blood relations. It follows that Kyun Ma's descendants cannot claim any share in Ma Wa Byu's estate so long as there are full blood relations living. I also think that there is much force in the contention that the fact that Kyun Ma is the elder sister of Ma Wa Byu is in the way of Ma Ein Tha Pyu. It would be offending the rule against the ascent of inheritance to allow her to come in, as it is settled law that as between elder brothers and sisters and younger brothers and sisters the former are excluded by the latter. Not being a full blood relation of the deceased, I do not think Mi Ein Tha Pyu can claim the benefit of the rule that the nearer in degree excludes the more remote as against the full blood relations. For these reasons I would hold that Mi Ein Tha Pyu is not entitled to any share in the estate of the deceased, and she is fortunate that the opposite parties have not appealed. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Mortgage, suit on—Manager, whether represents other members of family—Mortgage—Charge paid off by mortgagee, whether extinguished—Intention—Procedure—Petition raising question of law made to Court—Duty of Court.

In a mortgage suit the managers of a joint family effectively represent the interests of the members of the family. [p 491, col. 1.]

The ordinary rule is that a man having a right to act in either of two ways shall be assumed to have acted according to his interest. Therefore, the mere fact of a charge having been paid off does not decide the question whether it is extinguished. It depends on the intention of the mortgagee and where it is manifestly to his advantage to keep it alive, equity ought not to destroy it. [p 493, col. 1.]

It is desirable that when petitions raising important questions of fact or of law are presented before a Court, the Court should proceed to deal with such petitions. The failure to do so may, in many cases, involve a remand, which is always undesirable. [p. 491, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

DAS, J.—These analogous appeals come before us from the judgment of the learned Additional Subordinate Judge of Monghyr and arise out of a suit instituted by the plaintiffs-respondents to enforce a mortgage bond against the defendants first party. The plaintiffs brought on the record the subsequent purchasers and mortgagees as defendants third party. The suit was resisted by the defendants first party as well as by Rai Bahadur Baijnath Goenka, who was cited in the action as defendant No. 4, and one of the defendants third party. His contention appears to have been that as regards his mortgage he was entitled to priority over the plaintiffs. The learned Subordinate Judge overruled the contentions advanced on behalf of the defendants first party as well as those advanced on behalf of Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur. First Appeal No. 165 of 1917 is the appeal preferred by Babu Bhagwat Prosad Singh, who was cited as defendant No. 2 in the action and as one of the defendants first party. First Appeal No. 203 of 1917 is the appeal preferred by Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur.

It will be convenient to deal first with the appeal preferred by defendant No. 2. The first point urged on his behalf was that the suit was bad for non-joinder of parties inasmuch as certain necessary parties having an interest in the mortgage security were not joined as plaintiffs in this action. This objection is formulated in the third paragraph of the plaint, and it appears therefrom that plaintiff No. 1 has one son and plaintiff No. 2 two sons who are all joint with the plaintiffs as members of a joint Hindu family. In order to appreciate this point it is necessary to deal with certain antecedent events. It appears that Narsingh Narain Singh father of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 together with one Guja Singh took a thica of the entire 16 annas of Mouza Pinjri from 1306 — 1314 at an annual jama of Rs. 4,685 from Ganga Prasad, the grandfather of the plaintiffs. Rent due in respect of the thica appears to have fallen into arrears, and in 1906 the present plaintiffs brought a suit against the defendants and their father Narsingh Narayan Singh and against certain other persons of whom Guja Singh was one, to recover the amount of such arrears by sale of certain properties which had been hypothecated by the lessees for the due fulfilment of their obligation under the lease. On the 6th of May 1907 the learned Subordinate Judge dealing with that suit passed a decree in favour of the present plaintiffs substantially in terms of the reliefs claimed in that suit. Before the decree was put in execution, there was a settlement between the plaintiffs and the lessees and an adjustment of account took place, and Rs. 21,000 was found due and owing by the lessees to the plaintiffs. Narsingh and his sons, the defendants Nos. 1 and 2, took upon themselves the liability in respect of half the sum found due and owing by the lessees to the plaintiffs, and on the 19th July 1907 they executed an instalment bond in favour of the present plaintiffs binding themselves to pay the sum of Rs. 10,500 to the plaintiffs in the manner following, that is to say, Rs. 10,000 by yearly instalments of Rs. 1,000 from 1315—1324 payable in Bhado each year, and the balance of Rs. 500 by one instalment in Bhado 1325. There was default in the payment of the instalments from the very beginning and this suit was instituted on the 13th of March 1916, in order to enforce the terms of the instalment bond of the 19th July 1907.

It seems to me that the first objection urged on behalf of the appellant is without any substance. The decree for rent was obtained by the present plaintiffs. It was the present plaintiffs who were entitled to execute that decree and realise the monies due on the foot of that decree. The instalment bond was executed in substitution of the liability under the decree and was in favour of the persons who had obtained the decree. It is impossible to say that in these circumstances, any person other than the persons who have brought the present suit is interested in the mortgage security.

But it was argued that the present suit was instituted in order to recover the rents due in respect of the thica: and as the property, which was the subject matter of the lease, belongs to the entire joint family, it is the entire joint family that ought to bring the present suit. With this contention I do not agree This was not a suit for rent, but a suit to enforce the terms of an instalment bond, executed in favour of certain decree holders in substitution of the liability under the decree. It cannot, in my opinion, be suggested that the members of the joint family have a joint interest in the instalment bond, because the instalment bond was executed not in respect of the monies due to the joint family but in respect of monies due to the plaintiffs under a decree of Court.

But even if we concede that the members of the joint family have a joint interest with the plaintiffs in the instalment bond, the objection is still without substance, because there is evidence, unchallenged and uncontradicted, that the present plaintiffs are the kartas of the joint family. It was argued, however, on the authority of Sidheshuri Pershad Narain Singh (Debi Prosad Sahi) v. Dharamjit Narayan Singh (1), that where the karta of a joint Hindu family brings a suit on a mortgage without joining as party one of the members of the family who has a joint interest with him in the mortgage, such a suit is bound to fail. With great respect to the learned Judges who decided that case, I am wholly unable to accept that view. It seems to me that the managers of a joint family effectively represent the interests of the members of the family and, in my view, the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Sheo Shankar Ram v. Jaddo Kunwar (2) must be taken as overruling by implication the decision upon which the learned Vakil for the appellant relied.

It was next argued that the plaintiffs ought to have cited, as defendants in the action, the sons of defendant No. 2 who have an interest in the right of redemption. This objection was not formulated in the written statement of defendant No. 2, as originally filed, but by a petition, dated the 5th April 1917, he brought this matter to the notice of the Court and asked for leave to amend his written statement. It is to be regretted that this application for amendment was never dealt with by the learned Subordinate Judge. The only order which the learned Subordinate Judge passed on this application was, "let the petition be kept with the record." It is desirable that when petitions raising important questions of fact or of law are presented before a Court, the Court should proceed to deal with such petitions. The failure to do so may, in many cases, involves a remand which is always undesirable.

The point is, however, without substance. I will assume that Bhagwat Prosad, defendant No. 2, has three sons but the only result of not bringing them on the record as parties defendants is to leave their interest unaffected by the decree which has been passed by the learned Subordinate Judge. No one can be affected by a decree in a suit in which he is not represented and if the sons of Bhagwat Prosad have not been represented in this action, their interest in the properties covered by the mortgage decree will remain unaffected. If and when the question does arise, and it can only arise at the instance of such persons as are not before the Court in this action, the question will be whether they have been substantially and virtually represented in this action by their father, the defendant No. 2. That question, however, is not before us and all that we can say is that we cannot entertain this objection at the instance of defendant No. 2.

The only other point that was argued by the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellant was that the provision as to interest was penal in its nature. The provision as to interest runs as follows: "We, the executants, do declare that we shall pay the entire amount covered by this bond by instalments as noted below, with interest, and that we shall not default any instalment. In the case of default interest will run on the entire amount due under this bond from the date of default up to the date of realisation, at the rate of Re. 1 per cent. per mensem." It seems to me that this is a perfectly proper provision as to interest. It is clear that the interest is to run on the amount due on default and from the date of the default. The learned Vakil states that interest has been calculated from the date of the bond. If this has been done, there is clearly an error in the decree as drawn up. The first instalment of Rs. 1,000 was payable in Bhado 1315. That was not paid and accordingly the plaintiffs are entitled to calculate interest from the first day of Assin 1316. In preparing the decree the office must calculate interest from the first day of Assin 1316 at Re. 1 per month. Subject to this modification the appeal of defendant No. 2 must stand dismissed with costs. The defendants first party will have three months for redemption from the date of this judgment.

I now come to the appeal presented on behalf of Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur. The mortgage-bond relied on by him is dated the 19th of July 1907, the date on which the instalment bond in favour of the plaintiffs was executed. It was urged, however, on his behalf in the Court below that his bond was earlier in point of time than the plaintiffs' bond. The learned Subordinate Judge, on a careful examination of the evidence in the case, has found that the plaintiffs' bond was earlier in point of time. The learned Vakil on behalf of the appellant has not challenged that finding, but he says that as regards a portion of one of the properties, namely, property No. 1, he is entitled to priority over the plaintiffs. It appears that the defendants first party took a lease of certain properties from Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur and as security for one year's rent they hypothecated certain properties, including 2 annas 8 pies interest in property No. 1, with Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur. The security bond in favour of Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur is dated the 2nd of June 1896. Rai Bahadur Baijnath Goenka has, therefore, a prior mortgage in respect of 2 annas 8 pies interest in respect of property No. 1. He has, however, released 1 anna 4 pies share in that property and claims priority in respect of 1 anna 4 pies interest in that property.

His point is that on the date on which the defendants first party executed a mortgage in favour of the plaintiffs, he had already a mortgage on property No. 1, and that by the transaction which took place between him and the defendants on the 19th July 1907, he intended to keep the security in respect of 1 anna 4 pies interest in the property No. 1 alive.

The learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur could not take advantage of the provision of section 79 of the Transfer of Property Act without proving notice to the plaintiffs. In my view, section 79 of the Transfer of Property Act has nothing whatever to do with this case. The general rule as contained in section 80 of the Transfer of Property Act is that a mortgagee making a subsequent advance to the mortgagor does not acquire any priority in respect of his security for such subsequent advance as against an intermediate mortgagee. Section 79 engrafts an exception on that general rule and provides that the intermediate mortgagee who has notice of the prior mortgage is postponed in respect of all advances subsequently made on the security of that mortgage, provided it expresses the maximum to be secured thereby and that the maximum is not exceeded. If Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur had claimed priority in respect of advances made by him subsequent to the mortgage in favour of the plaintiffs, the question of the applicability of section 79 of the Transfer of Property Act would arise and we would have to determine whether the plaintiffs had notice of the prior mortgage of Rai Baij Nath Goenka Bahadur. But that is not the point here. He claims priority, not in respect of advances made subsequent to the plaintiffs' mortgage, but prior to his mortgage. He says with reference to 2 annas 8 pies share of Mouzas Nasratpur, Ferozepur and Kutal bearing Touzi No. 236, that is to say, property No. 1: "I am the prior mortgagee and you the plaintiffs can only sell such share subject to my prior mortgage." In my view neither section 79 nor the case relied upon by the learned Subordinate Judge has any application to the facts of this case. It has been proved that there was one year's rent due to Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur under the security bond, dated the 2nd of June 1896. As soon as one year's rent under the bond of 2nd June 1896 became due to Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur, equity taking as done that which ought to be done fastened upon the property and the contract to mortgage became a complete mortgage. There was, in my view, on the 19th of July 1907 a subsisting mortgage in favour of Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur in respect of 2 annas 8 pies share of the property mentioned above and unless by his act he has extinguished that security he is entitled to claim priority in respect thereof as against the plaintiffs.

This brings me to the next question which was urged before us, namely, that in taking a mortgage bond on the 19th of July 1907 Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur did not intend to extinguish the security in his favour by virtue of the security bond, dated the 2nd of June 1896. The mortgage bond throws no light on the intention of the mortgagee, but upon the facts found by us there was undoubtedly, at the time when the defendants executed the mortgage in favour of Rai Bahadur Baijnath Goenka on the 19th of July 1907, a mortgage in favour of the plaintiffs. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur knew of the plaintiffs' prior mortgage.

That being so, clearly it was to his advantage to keep his own mortgage alive. If indeed there was no prior mortgage in favour of the plaintiffs at the time when the mortgage was executed in his favour by the defendants on the 19th July 1907, it might be argued on the authority of Mohesh Lal v. Mohant Bawan Das (3) that as there was no reason for keeping the prior security alive, we ought to hold that he intended to extinguish it. The mere fact of a charge having been paid off does not decide the question whether it is extinguished. It depends on the intention of the mortgagee and where it is manifestly to his advantage to keep it alive, equity ought not to destroy it. As the Judicial Committee in the case of Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukhdas (4) said: "The ordinary rule is that a man having a right to act in either of two ways, shall be assumed to have acted according to his interest." It was manifestly to his advantage to keep the prior charge in his favour alive and I must accordingly hold that he did intend to keep it alive. In the result I would allow the appeal of Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur to the extent that as regards 1 anna 4 pies share of the property above mentioned, namely, property No. 1 set out in the schedule annexed to the plaint, he must be considered as the prior mortgagee. The plaintiffs can only sell this interest subject to the prior mortgage in favour of the defendant No. 4. It might be noted that the claim of defendant No. 4 is for Rs. 5,000. The plaintiffs have, of course, the right to sell property No. 1 free from the charge in favour of defendant No. 4 upon payment to him of Rs. 5,000. The parties are entitled to their costs in proportion to their success.

COUTTS, J.—I agree.

The Hon'ble Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar (Advocate General) and Mr. N. Rama Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts are these. Defendants Nos. 1 to 3 are the owners of the property. They created three mortgages on it. The plaintiff is the third mortgagee. Defendants Nos. 4 to 7 purchased the equity of redemption under a decree in a Small Cause suit. In 1913, a suit was brought by the 2nd mortgagee to which the mortgagor and the prior and subsequent mortgagees were parties, and he obtained a decree. It should be mentioned that the 2nd mortgage covered not only the property, but all the crops that may be grown on it until redemption. The 3rd mortgagee sued in 1914 on his mortgage making the mortgagors alone parties and purchased the property. Defendants Nos. 4 to 7 paid a good portion of the decree amount due to the 2nd mortgagee and then assigned their rights to defendants Nos. 9 and 10. These latter paid the balance of that decree. Satisfaction of the decree was entered. In execution of the decree on the 3rd mortgage, the property was brought to sale, and from the sale-proceeds the 1st mortgage was fully discharged. The question now related to the payment of the balance. Defendants Nos. 9 and 10 claim it as they contend that they have been subrogated to the position of the 2nd mortgagee. This is the principal question for decision.

There was an appeal to this Court (Appeal Suit No. 391 of 1915) in the suit of the 3rd mortgagee and this Court declared by the decree that defendants Nos. 4 to 7 whom defendants Nos. 9 and 10 now represent are entitled to pay off the 2nd mortgage and to be subrogated to the position of the 2nd mortgagee. That was a decision inter parties and is binding on the plaintiff. But that direction in the decree can only affect payments made subsequent to the decree. The question, therefore, still has to be decided, whether a purchaser of the equity of redemption discharging an encumbrance on the property is not entitled to the benefit of subrogation. We see no reason why he should not have this right. Under section 55, clause 1 (g) of the Transfer of Property Act a purchaser is bound to pay off existing encumbrances. A Court purchaser is not free from this obligation. Section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act empowers the purchaser of the equity of redemption to redeem existing mortgages. Under section 74 of the Act a subsequent mortgagee redeeming a previous one is entitled to stand in the shoes of the latter. This right is given by section 101 to a purchaser and the section declares that what is beneficial to the purchaser shall be deemed to have been intended by him. Reading all these sections together, we are clear that on principle the purchaser of the equity of redemption is entitled to the right of subrogation.

Turning to the authorities quoted, Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukhdas (1) seems to recognise this principle in clear terms. The Judicial Committee, while expressing unwillingness to extend the principle underlying Toulmin v. Steers (2) to India, point out that, where there is no personal obligation to pay, the payer is entitled to subrogation. That is also the view taken in Udit Narain Misir v. Asharfi Lal (3) and in the earlier portion of the judgment in Sat Narain Tewari v. Chowdhury Sheobaran Singh (4). As regards Bisseswar Prosad v. Lala Sarnam Singh (5) and the earlier case Surjiram Marwari v. Barhamdeo Persad (6), it is enough to say that in both of them, the learned Judges were dealing with agreements in which there were personal covenants on the part of the purchaser. Where there is such an undertaking to extinguish the mortgage, the presumption that the person paying off the mortgage intended to keep alive that mortgage for his protection may be negatived. The observations in Govindaswami Thevan v. Doraisami Pillai (7) should also be confined to cases of personal liability. We think for these reasons that defendants Nos. 9 and 10 are entitled to be subrogated to the position of second mortgagee.

It was next argued that as the second mortgage covered future crops on the property, the payment made by defendants Nos. 4 to 7 to save them from sale should not be deducted out of the money in Court. There is a fallacy underlying this argument. In execution of his decree, the second mortgagee proceeded to sell the crops then on the property. As defendants Nos. 4 to 7 had acquired the equity of redemption and had thereby become entitled to the crops on the land which they themselves had grown, they prevented the sale by paying a portion of the decree obtained by the 2nd mortgagee. This is an involuntary payment towards discharging the mortgage debt, and we can find no ground for refusing to recognise subrogation to the extent of the payment.

The last point relates to the right of the defendants to claim interest while enjoying the profits of the land. Here again, there is a confusion of ideas underlying the contention. At the time that the equity of redemption was purchased, all the three mortgages were outstanding; when the 2nd mortgage was paid off, the first mortgage was still subsisting and there was also the decree on the 3rd mortgage. Consequently the purchasers of the equity of redemption could not and did not become full owners of the property.

In these circumstances, they had two distinct rights, viz., (a) right as owners of the equity of redemption, and (b) right as 2nd mortgagees. By virtue of the 1st right they were entitled to the crops of the land. In their right as mortgagees they were entitled to interest. We are, therefore, unable to agree with Mr. Somasundaram that either of these rights must be made subservient to the other. The position of the decision in Sat Narain Tewari v. Chowdhury Sheobaran Singh (4) which deals with this question supports the appellants' contention. We are unable to follow the reasoning of the learned Judges in this behalf in Muthammal v. Razu Pillai (8). On the facts found, namely, that the sale became infructuous, the question we are considering did not arise for decision. There are certain dicta in that judgment relating to this question, which, with all respect, we are unable to accept. If the observations are confined to purchases, which were held to be invalid, that decision will not be against the view we are taking. Moreover, we are strengthened by Izzatunnissa Begam v. Partab Singh (9) in our view. The Judicial Committe held in that case that a purchaser of the equity of redemption is not a trustee for the mortgagor. In that view, the 3rd mortgagee who can claim the profits only as representing the mortgagor can have no claim against defendants Nos. 4 to 7 and their assignees, defendants Nos. 9 and 10.

The decision of the Subordinate Judge is right and we dismiss the Civil Miscellaneous Appeal with costs.

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Purneah.

Messrs. Fakhruddin and Panchanan Banerji, for the Appellant.

Syed Muhammad Tahir, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for rent from Aghan to Chait 1320 and for 1321 and 1322 F. S. instituted by the respondents against the appellant. The respondents and the appellant are dar-patnidars. One Pirthwi Chand Lal is the superior landlord, and Chhatterpat Singh was the patnidar. It appears that the patni was advertised for sale for rent due by Chhatterpat Singh to Pirthwi Chand Lal. The plaintiffs deposited the rent and under section 13 of the Patni Regulation took possession of the entire patni interest. Under the Regulation itself their position was that of mortgagees in possession. They were bound to pay rent to the superior landlord and were entitled to collect rent from the dar-patnidars.

It appears that the patni was again advertised for sale for non-payment of rent due by the plaintiffs to Pirthwi Chand Lal. It was actually sold and was purchased by Pirthwi Chand Lal. The defendant thereupon instituted a title suit to set aside the sale on the ground of fraud and pending the disposal of the suit applied for stay of delivery of possession to Pirthwi Chand Lal. The Court which heard the application did stay delivery of possession on certain terms and those terms were that the defendant, who was the plaintiff in that action, should pay rent to Pirthwi Chand Lal for the Chait kist of 1320, and for 1321 F. S. It appears that the defendants in fact paid rent to Pirthwi Chand Lal up to Assin 1321. The sale has now been set aside. Now the plaintiffs claim rent from the defendants from Aghan to Chait 1320 and for 1321 and 1322 F. S. The defence is that the defendants have already paid the rent to the superior landlord, and that they ought not to be compelled to pay twice. The learned Subordinate Judge, being of opinion that the proper remedy of the defendants is to apply to the Zemindar, for a refund, has decreed the plaintiffs' suit.

In my view this decision is erroneous. It seems to me that the plaintiffs were bound by law to pay rent to the superior landlord. The defendant was undoubtedly interested in the payment of the money, because if it was not paid his tenure would have been completely wiped out. Therefore, in a suit for rent the defendant is entitled to deduct the amount so paid from the rent payable to his patnidar. The judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge must, therefore, be modified. The plaintiffs, however, will be entitled to rent from Kartik 1321 up to the end of 1322 F. S. with the usual interest.

There will be no order for costs in the appeal. Costs in the Courts below will be in proportion to the success of the parties.

SECOND APPEAL No. 2 OF 1919-20.

There is a general custom by which the tenants of a grove have the right to dispose of the trees, and this right must be presumed to exist in the absence of custom or contract to the contrary. [p. 497, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the order of the Commissioner, Allahabad Division, dated the 11th of November 1919, in the case of ejectment.

JUDGMENT.

HOPKINS, S. M.—(March 26, 1920.)—This suit relates to a guava grove which was planted by one Basawan Lal in his occupancy holding. It has been found that the grove was planted before the Tenancy Act came into force with the acquiescence of the landholder. Basawan Lal died leaving a daughter Musammat Ram Dulari, to whom he had conveyed the grove by a deed of gift in his lifetime and who was attested as an occupancy tenant at Settlement in 1321 F.

The landholder has now sued Musammat Ram Dulari for ejectment. The Commissioner has found that Basawan held under a special contract which would prevent his ejectment from the grove, but held that his right in the grove, could not pass to his daughter inasmuch as she could not succeed to the tenancy under section 22 of the Tenancy Act, while the transfer to her was invalid under section 20.

The Board have ruled in a similar case [Pohap Kachhi v. Sheo Gobind (1)] that the owner of a grove having created a valuable property, has prima facie the right to transfer it unless this right is disallowed by custom or contract.

In a series of decisions the Board have held further that the right of transfer exists independently of any rights or liabilities which the grove-holder may have as a tenant and that the succession to the grove will be determined by the ordinary law and not by section 22 of the Tenancy Act, inasmuch as the land not being held for agricultural purposes is not a 'holding' within the definition given in section 4.

Jagdamba Prasad v. Bihari Lal (2), Beni Rai v. Ram Prasad Rai (3), Payag v. Bijanand (4), Shah Muhammad v. Maharaja of Benares (5), Gajadhar v. Musammat Tija (6), Pargan Singh v. Musammat Umrai (7).

(6) 2 U. D. 416.
(7) 3 U. D. 253.

In Baldeo v. Harnandan (3) the facts were different. There it was found that the tenant had planted trees on his occupancy holding without the consent of his landholder, there being no evidence as to when the trees were planted, and it was held that the tenant planted the trees at his own risk. The landholder relies on the High Court ruling in Daya Kishen v. Mohammad Wazir Ahmad (9), in which it was held that planting a grove by an occupancy tenant on his holding with the permission of the Zamindar does not change the nature of the holding from an occupancy tenancy to grove land. But that ruling was not followed by the High Court in a later case, Ohadami Lal v. Khub Chand (10), also relating to an occupancy holding, in which it was held that when a tenant planted a grove on land expressly given to him for that purpose and there was a condition in the wajib ul-arz that the tenant became the absolute owner of the trees so planted, he had a transferable right in the timber of the grove.

The Board's view is that there is a general custom by which the tenants of a grove have the right to dispose of the trees, and this right must be presumed to exist in the absence of custom or contract to the contrary. In Payag v. Bijan nd 4) cited above, Sir Duncan Baillie relying on the principles laid down in Pandit Badri Prasad v. Bhim Sen (11) said:—"There is in the undisturbed possession of the defendant reason to believe that the usual custom by which rights of a tenant in groves are transferable existed in this case. The transfer of these rights transferred also the right to occupy the land so long as the grove was standing."

In the present case the presumption that the grove was held with a right of transfer is strengthened by the fact that Basawan mortgaged it in 1900 and subsequently redeemed it.

In my opinion Musammat Ram Dulari, whether she be regarded as the transferee or the heir of Basawan, is the proprietor of the grove and has the right to occupy the land on which it stands so long as the grove exists. I would, therefore, accept the appeal with costs and setting aside the order of the Commissioner would restore that of the Assistant Collector dismissing the suit for ejectment.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 1885), ss. 65, 158 —Decree for nagdi and bhaoli rent, whether rent-decree—Holding, whether can be sold in execution of such decree.

Where a holding is held partly on nagdi rent and partly on bhaoli rent and a decree is obtained for arrears of both kinds of rent, the decree is a rent-decree and the holding can be sold in execution thereof. [p. 498, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Darbhanga.

Messrs Kulwant Sahay and B. N. Mitter, for the Appellant.

Mr. Janak Kishore, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought in the Court of the Additional Munsif at Samastipur by a Bharnadar of a portion of a holding, that the decree obtained by the defendants 1st party against the defendants 2nd party is a money decree and not a rent decree. The defendants 2nd party are tenants under the defendants 1st party of a certain holding, part of which is held on nagdi rent and part on bhaoli rent. The plaintiff is the Bharnadar of a portion of that part of the holding which is held on nagdi rent. The defendants 1st party, the maliks, obtained a decree for arrears of rent of the whole holding against the defendants 2nd party, the tenants, and in execution of this rent decree sought to sell the whole holding. The plaintiff in the present suit objected that the decree was only a money decree, but the objection was disallowed and the holding has been sold. The plaintiff has accordingly brought this suit for a declaration that the decree obtained by the defendants 1st party is a money decree and that his encumbrance as Bharnadar is not affected.

The Court of first instance found that the decree obtained by the defendants 1st party against the defendants 2nd party was a rent decree and dismissed the suit. This decision has been upheld by the District Judge on appeal and the plaintiff has preferred this second appeal to this Court.

The contentions before us are the same as they were before the learned District Judge, namely, that only nagdi rent can fall into arrears and that as holdings are only liable to sale for arrears of rent holdings held on produce rent or partly on produce rent and partly on money rent cannot be sold. This is a contention for which there is no authority and which I am unable to accept. It is true that in section 54 (3) there is a provision that "when any instalment or part of an instalment of rent is not duly paid at or before the time when it falls due it shall be deemed an arrear." But there is nothing in this to support the view that because there is this special provision in regard to money rent it, therefore, follows that produce rent cannot fall into arrears. The special provision of section 54 (3) is necessary, because in section 53 it is provided that "Subject to agreement or established usage a money rent payable by a tenant shall be paid in four equal instalments falling due on the last day of each quarter of the agricultural year." Where, then, there is an agreement or an established usage to pay rent otherwise than in four equal instalments, the provision of section 54 (3) would not apply, but it could not be contended that because this is so, the rent of the holding in regard to which there was this agreement or established usage could not fall into arrears. Produce rent is on this footing and I am unable to accept the contention that because it is not paid in instalments it cannot fall into arrears. Moreover, under section 65, holdings do not become liable to sale in execution of decrees for arrears of rent, but "in execution of a decree for the rent of the holding." It is true that the side note to the section and the heading of the section refer to "arrears of rent," but the body of the section does not speak of the liability to sale in execution of decrees for arrears of rent. So far then as section 65 is concerned, if we consider the wording only there seems to be no distinction between a holding which is held on produce rent and a holding held on a money rent.

It is true that section 158 (b) speaks of a tenure or holding which is sold in execution of a decree for "arrears of rent," and it is on this that the contention in this appeal is mainly based, because it is urged that as produce rent cannot fall into arrears there can be no sale in execution of a decree for arrears of rent. As I have already said, I do not agree that produce rent cannot fall into arrears, but even if this were so, section 65 deals with decrees "for rent" and not for "arrears of rent," so that if the argument were to be pushed to its extreme limit, section 158 (b) would not apply to decrees for even money rent provided for in section 65. This is obviously absurd.

The decree in this case is clearly, in my opinion, a rent decree. The suit has been rightly dismissed and I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

AYYA MUDALI. v. VEERAYEE.

An order refusing to implead a person as the legal representative of a deceased plaintiff is an adjudication of that person's claim within the definition in section 2 (2), Civil Procedure Code, and as a decree, such order is appealable. [p. 499, col. 2; p. 500, col. 1.]

Appeal and petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the order of the District Court, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No. 947 of 1917, preferred against the order of the Court of the District Munsif, Pattukota, in Interlocutory Appeal No. 1120 of 1917, in Original Suit No. 683 of 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. K. Rajah Aiyar, for the Appellant:—The lower Appellate Court is wrong in holding that no appeal lay to it from the order refusing the application to be brought on record as legal representative of the plaintiff. The order is an adjudication having the force of a decree. The appellant's right to continue the proceedings has been negatived. The proper course is for the appellant to appeal against that order and not against the order of abatement or dismissal of the suit to which the appellant was not a party. See Gangadhara Ramarao v. Surya Rao (Rajah of Pittapur) (1).

Mr. S. Muthaiya Mudaliar, for the Respondent.—The order for abatement is equivalent to a decree. There is no statutory right of appeal against the present order. Orders under Order XXII, rule 3, are not appealable.

JUDGMENT.

OLDFIELD, J.—This appeal is against the decision of the lower Appellate Court that no appeal lay to it against the District Munsif's order refusing to implead the appellant as legal representative of the deceased plaintiff.

The lower Appellate Court's main ground of decision is that the appeal should be against the order of abatement or dismissal of the suit. It is not possible to understand how appellant could appeal against an order, to which he would not be a party and on this ground, without deciding whether, under the present Code, an order of abatement is in any respect equivalent to or is appealable as a decree dismissing the suit and without expressing any opinion as to the propriety of some portions of the language used in the judgments in Suppa Nayakan v. Perumal Chetty (2), I must reject this ground of decision.

The correct view of the law is, in my opinion, that indicated in Gangadhara Ramarao v. Surya Rao (Rajah of Pittapur) (1). The order appealed against in the lower Appellate Court was a decree because it negatived the appellant's right to the relief, which the original plaintiff has sought in the suit, and was an adjudication on appellant's claim within the definition in section 2 (2) of the Civil Procedure Code; and as a decree, such an order is appealable. Some argument to the contrary was founded on Lakshmi Achi v. Subbarama Ayyar (3) and the dictum on page 493* that the Legislature has given no right of appeal against orders under Order XXII, rule 3. I am content to read this as referring only to the fact that no appeal has been given against those orders as such or except in cases in which they have also the character of decrees. That was sufficient for the decision of the case before the learned Judges, one in which no abatement was in question, the appeal being against a refusal to make the appellant a plaintiff, when one representative of the deceased plaintiff, who could prosecute the litigation in succession to him, was already on the record and the refusal involved only an adjudication between that representative and appellant, not between the appellant and the defendants in the suit.

The order of the lower Appellate Court must be set aside and the appeal remanded for the disposal on its merits. Costs to date in the lower Appellate Court and here will be costs in the case and be provided for in the order to be passed.

The civil revision petition is dismissed. No order as to costs.

pect of the property in suit by the 2nd defendant is not binding on him Defendants Nos 1 and 2 are his illegitimate daughter and son respectively. The plaintiff died pending the suit. The 2nd defendant applied to be brought on the record as the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff. The District Munsif held that the cause of action did not survive to him, his ground being that there was an attack against the 2nd defendant also by the plaintiff. An appeal was taken to the District Court. The learned Judge rejected it on the ground that no appeal lay.

It seems that he is wrong. The order refusing to allow the 2nd defendant to continue the suit, on the ground that the cause of action does not survive to him, finally deprives him of all his rights in the suit and has the effect of putting an end to the litigation altogether. It was suggested that notwithstanding the refusal to permit him to prosecute the suit, the 2nd defendant, if he waited till the expiry of 6 months, might on the abatement of the suit prefer an appeal, making the refusal a ground of complaint. As at present advised, I am unable to agree with this contention. If the Court was right, at this stage of the suit, in holding that the appellant was not the legal representative and that no cause of action survived to him, it would be anomalous to permit him to file an appeal which can only be done by him in his capacity of legal representative of the deceased plaintiff. In Suppu Nayakan v. Perumal Chetty (4) and in Subramania Iyer v. Venkataramier (4) this question did not come up directly for decision. The difference between the old and the new Code of Civil Procedure on the question of abatement makes it doubtful whether some of the observations of the learned Judges in that case are not too broadly expressed. However that may be, both the above decisions recognise that an order refusing to allow the applicant to continue the suit finally determines his right in the suit and as such comes within the definition of decree in section 2 Gangadhara Ramarao v. Surya Rao (Rajah of Pittapur) (1), although it related to the striking off of the name of a defendant from the array of parties, is an authority for the proposition that the addition or deletion of a person as a party to a suit is a final adjudication of the applicant's rights on the cause of action put forward.

I think the principle of that decision governs the present case. Mr. Muthiah Mudaliar relied on Lakshmi Achi v. Subbarama Ayyar (3). In that case, there was no question of the suit abating. One of the two rival claimants was allowed to continue the suit and to obtain the preliminary decree. At this stage, the other claimant applied to be brought on record in the place of the deceased person and for an order that the name of the party, who was brought in, should be deleted. It was held that an order dealing with such a claim was not appealable. In the present case there was no question of any other person being permitted to prosecute the suit. The rejection of the applicant's petition entails the refusal of any relief to any party on the cause of action alleged in the suit. I am, therefore, of opinion that an appeal lay to the District Court. I agree in the order proposed by my learned brother.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s 11, pro: (a)—Occupancy right, acquisition of—Lease for 7 years, executed after July, effect of—Actual date of commencement of tenancy.

Where a tenant is admitted to a holding at the beginning of the agricultural year on the understanding that he will be given a 7 years' lease and the lease is executed later, the lease must be held to cover the period from 1st July, but if the tenant is not actually admitted to the land until some date subsequent to 1st July, the mere recital in the deed of the 1st July, as the date of the commencement of the tenancy would not give the lease a retrospective effect. [p. 501, col. 1.]

VEYINDRAMUTHU PILLAI v. MAYA NADAN.

Second appeal from the order of the Commissioner, Gorakhpur Division, dated the 12th August 1919, in the case of ejectment.

JUDGMENT.

HOPKINS, S M —(March 24, 1920.)—The question in this case is whether the kabuliyat executed by the respondent on the 28th of November 1909 in respect of the years 317 to 1323 F is a seven years' lease which bars the acquisition of a right of occupancy under section 11, proviso (a) of the Tenancy Act. The Commissioner held that it is not on the following grounds:—

"This lease specifies on its face that it is for the years 1317 to 1323 and had it been executed before the commencement of the year or even reasonably near the commencement of the year, it would certainly bar the acquisition of occupancy right. It was, however, not executed until November, when one crop of the year 1317 had not only been sown but in the main part reaped, and I cannot see how the subsequent execution of a lease can convert a tenancy from one held without to one held under a lease."

But the respondent admitted at the time of attestation before the Kanungo that the lease took effect from the beginning of 1317 F. I am referred to the case of Eyre v. Donnithorne (1) cited in Mr. Gour's edition of the Transfer of Property Act as authority for the proposition that a lease may be given from a date which is past. It has also been held by this Board that where a lease is for 7 years the fact that it operates from a date earlier than that of execution is immaterial: Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Wazir (2). It is obvious that in large estates it may be impossible to conclude the preparation and execution of all leases before the 1st July Where a tenant is admitted to a holding at the beginning of the agricultural year on the understanding that he will be given a 7 years lease, and the lease is executed later, the lease must, in my opinion, be held to cover the period from 1st July. But if the tenant is not actually admitted to the land until some date subsequent to the 1st July, the mere recital in the deed of the 1st July as the date of the commencement of the tenancy would not, in my opinion, give the lease retrospective effect. In the present case there is a clear admission by the tenant that the agreement was for the period commencing with the beginning of the agricultural year. The respondent quotes a decision of Mr Harrison, Junior Member, in Gopinath v. Bharat Singh (3) but that was the case of a lease executed on the 6th January, and as a matter of fact it was executed on the 6th January 1901 before the Tenancy Act came into force.

I would follow the previous decision of the Board in Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Wazir (2) and setting aside the order of the Commissioner would restore that of the Assistant Collector, giving the appellant costs in all Courts.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 103, O. XXXIV, r. 1—"Any party" in O. XXI r. 103, meaning of—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), ss. 52, 91 (f)—Money-decree—Mortgage suit, pendency of, at date of money decree—Sale in execution of money-decree before decree on mortgage—Auction-purchaser under mortgage decree, right of, to oust purchaser under money-decree.

The words "any party" in Order XXI, rule 103, of the Civil Procedure Code refer to any party to the petition, and not to the decree under execution. [p. 503, col. 1.]

VAYINDRAMUTHU PILLAI v. MAYA NADAN.

Appellant purchased certain property at a Court sale held in execution of a money decree. After the attachment but before sale, a mortgage suit was filed in respect of that property. Subsequently a decree for sale was passed in the mortgage suit and the respondent purchased the property in execution of that decree. The attaching creditor was not impleaded in the mortgage suit:

Held, that the respondent was entitled to oust the appellant as the latter's purchase was pendente lite. [p. 504, col. 1; p. 505, col. 2.]

Per Oldfield, J.—Neither section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act nor Order XXXIV, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, confers on an attaching creditor any interest in the equity of redemption in the mortgaged property; they are merely statutory provisions for his right to redeem and to be impleaded in proceedings on the mortgage. Independently of these provisions and as an attaching creditor he obtains no interest in the property and nothing to which any equity in his favour founded on the infringement of those provisions could be annexed, or which could pass from him to the purchaser at the sale held at his instance or which he could, after he had purchased himself, rely on as improving his title. [p. 503, col. 2]

Section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act does not invalidate a sale held pendente lite but only subjects the property in the purchaser's hands to the decree in which the pending litigation may end, as though no transfer had taken place. [p. 504, col. 1.]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—The right which an attaching creditor possesses of suing to redeem is not an interest in property. [p. 504, col. 2.]

The principle underlying section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act is applicable to a person who, with knowledge that a suit is pending relating to the property, deliberately ignores such a suit and purchases the property. [p 505, col. 2.]

Appeal against and petitions to revise the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Ramnad at Madura, in Execution Appeal No. 374 of 1918, in Execution Appeal No. 322 of 1918, in Execution Petition No. 369 of 1917, in Original Suit No. 64 of 1916 (on the file of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Ramnad at Madura) in Execution Appeal No. 36 of 1918, in Execution Petition No. 1 of 1918, in Original Suit No. 64 of 1916 (on the file of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Ramnad at Madura) and in Miscellaneous Petition No. 165 of 1918, in Execution Appeal No. 157 of 1918, in Execution Petition No. 269 of 1917, in Original Suit No. 64 of 1916 (on the file of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Ramnad at Madura) respectively.

FACTS.—A was a money decree-holder against B and attached B's property at a time when a suit on a mortgage of such property was pending. A preliminary decree was passed in the mortgage suit. Then A got sold the property in Court auction and purchased it subject to the mortgage. Then the final decree was passed and the property was sold and purchased partly by the mortgagee decree-holder and partly by a stranger. The purchaser under the mortgage-decree was obstructed by A in getting possession and an order was passed against A under Order XXI, rule 100. A appealed to the High Court. Objection being raised that the appeal was incompetent as A was not the representative of a party, the question was referred to the Full Bench who decided that the appeal was competent. The case coming on again before the Division Bench,

Mr. S. T. Srinivasagopalacharia, for the Respondent, urged that what the Full Bench had decided was that the money decree-holder purchaser was the representative of a party, within the meaning of section 47. But see Order XXI, rule 103. It is only the judgment debtor that can come in by way of appeal. The proper procedure for others is by way of suit. See Zipru Talhoo v. Hari Supdushet Vani (1) and C. M. A. No. 118 of 1918 (unreported).

(The contention was disallowed).

Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastri, for the Appellant.—The attachment by the money decree-holder was made pendente lite. But the doctrine of lis pendens cannot apply to him. An attaching decree holder is one who is entitled to redeem under section 91 (c) of the Transfer of Property Act and hence he is a necessary party to the mortgage suit within the meaning of Order XXXIV, rule 1: see Manjeshwara Krishnaya v. Vasudeva Mallya (2), so the mortgage decree is not binding on him.

The omission to make the money decree-holder a party to the mortgage suit saves his rights. See Mulla Vittil Seethi v. Achuthan Nair (3) and Chinnu Pillai v. Venkatasami

Mr. S. T. Srinivasagopalachariar, for the Respondent.—The right to redeem is the only right that can subsist and it may be saved. So that even now it may be exercised. But the doctrine of lis pendens is not evaded in spite of the attachment. See Shananda Chandra Pal v. Sri Nath Roy Chowdhury (8) (a case exactly in point) and Moti Lal v. Karrabuldin (9).

Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, in reply.

[OLDFIELD, J.—What is your position since (a) there is no warranty in Court sales, (b) you are a purchaser pendente lite and (c) attachment by itself creates no interest in or charge upon the property ?]

See Venkataseetharamayya v. Venkataramayya (5). There was an interest which the money decree-holder could have sold and did sell and purchase. And being an attaching decree-holder, lis pendens does not affect him.

JUDGMENT.

OLDFIELD, J.—The opinion of the Full Bench has established that section 47, Civil Procedure Code, is applicable to these proceedings. It is, however, objected further that they are covered also by Order XXI, rule 103, and that in accordance with it in the absence of a suit, the order of the lower Court is conclusive. It is to be observed that the reference to "any party" in the rule is to any party to the petition, not to the decree under execution. This is clear in view of the form of the provisions in the previous Code and the division of the former section 335 into two parts, of which the present rule represents the second. The expression "any party" being interpreted in the manner suggested, there is no reason for holding, as has been held in connection with the similar claim petition procedure, that the rule excludes the application of section 47 to cases, such as the present, between parties or their representatives.

To turn next to the merits, the material facts are that the appellant is or represents the purchaser at a Court sale held in execution of a money decree. After this attachment but before the sale a suit was instituted on a mortgage of the properties sold and was pending at the date of the appellant's purchase. Later a decree for sale was passed and the respondent bought when the sale took place. On his claiming delivery he found the appellants already in possession, and the decisions under appeal depend on the lower Court's conclusion that as they were there in virtue of a purchase pendente lite, the respondent was entitled to oust them; their right, if any, to redeem the mortgage decree and obtain possession being enforceable, if at all, by means of a separate suit, which they were at liberty to bring.

Argument has been based to a great extent on the fact that the attaching creditor, with reference to section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act, should have been made a party to the mortgage suit and that, as he was not, the appellants, purchasing at the sale held under his attachment are in some manner entitled to treat the proceedings in the mortgage suit as not binding on them. But neither section 91 nor Order XXXIV, rule 1, which is also relied on, confers on an attaching creditor any interest in the equity of redemption in the mortgaged property; they are merely statutory provisions for his right to redeem and to be impleaded in proceedings on the mortgage. Independently of these provisions and as an attaching creditor, he obtained no interest in the property and nothing to which any equity in his favour founded on the infringement of those provisions could be annexed or which could pass from him to the purchaser at the sale held at his instance, or which he could, after he had purchased himself (as he has done here), rely on as improving his title. This was the view taken in Shananda Chandra Pal v. Sri Nath Roy Chowdhury (8) and I concur with the learned Judges responsible for that decision in dissenting from Ghulam Husain v. Dina Nath (6) to this extent and for the reasons they give. Reliance also has been placed on Venkataseetharamayya v. Venkataramayya 5 [illegible] Ghulam Husain v. Dina Nath (6) was followed, and on the references in it to the interest of the attaching creditor. But whilst it may be doubted whether those references were an accurate description of the attaching creditor's position, it is material that the question before the Court was whether he was entitled to bring the property to sale, not whether the purchaser at such a sale was entitled to retain possession.

The right of the attaching creditor to bring the property to sale, notwithstanding the pendency of mortgage proceedings, may in fact be conceded without effect on the argument, on which the decision under appeal is founded. That argument is based on section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act; and what it does affect is not the attaching creditor's right to a sale but the extent of the interest which such a sale would pass. For section 52 does not invalidate a sale held pendente lite but only subjects the property in the purchaser's hands to the decree in which the pending litigation may end, as though no transfer has taken place. That is, it makes it liable for the mortgage amount and imposes on the purchaser the same obligation to pay that amount in order to protect it, as would have been imposed by the decree, if no transfer had taken place. In the present case the mortgagor has made no such payment but has allowed the property to be sold and as he would not have been entitled to retain possession against the mortgage decree purchaser, the appellant cannot do so either.

This entails acceptance of the lower Court's conclusion and in accepting it I endorse its refusal to express an opinion as to the appellant's right to redeem by taking separate proceedings. This result entails dismissal of all the appeals. The appellant will pay the respondent's costs in each.

The connected civil revision petitions are dismissed but without costs.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I agree. Notwithstanding the conclusion of the Full Bench that the question should be dealt with under section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code, Mr. Srinivasagopalachariar contended that no appeal lay because of Order XXI, rule 103. There has been a change in the language between the old and the new Codes in this matter and a first reading of rule 103 suggests that unless the resistence is by the judgment-debtor, the only remedy of the resisting party is by way of suit. But this Court has always held with reference to the provisions relating to claims that if the claimant comes under section 47, the fact that a remedy by suit is given to him qua his rights as a claimant would not take away his right under section 47. The definition section includes in the definition of decree "the determination of any question within section 47." Therefore, in my opinion an appeal lies. I respectfully dissent from Zipru Tulhoo v. Hari Supdushet Vani (1)

The main question is whether an auction purchaser under a money decree who has obtained possession can compel a mortgagee or a purchaser under the mortgage decree to leave his possession undisturbed provided he is willing to redeem the mortgage. The only decision in which there are observations in point on this subject is Ghulam Husain v. Dina Nath (6). That has been dissented from in Shananda Chandra Pal v. Sri Nath Roy Chowdhury (8). In these circumstances it is desirable to examine the basis of the contention put forward on behalf of the auction purchaser. Under section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act an attaching decree-holder has got the right to bring a suit to redeem the mortgage. Does this give him an interest in the property? The question is now settled that an attachment confers no interest in the property attached. Reading section 91 (f) with this well-recognised rule the proper construction to be put on the section is that by virtue of his right to bring the equity of redemption to sale he is given the privilege of instituting a suit for redemption and no more. I do not think that any interest in property, as in the case of a puisne mortgagee, can be ascribed to the attaching decree-holder. Mr. Venkatarama Sastriar referred to the language of Order XXXIV rule 1, and asked us to hold that section 91, clause (f) of the Transfer of Property Act, was intended by the Legislature to give an interest in the property to the attaching creditor. Rule 1 of Order XXXIV refers to the substantial right mentioned in section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act and cannot and does not enlarge that right. In my opinion the right which the attaching creditor possesses of suing to redeem is not an interest in property. The learned Vakil for the appellant contended that this conclusion would militate against Venkateswaramayya v. Venkataramayya (5). As I understand that judgment, what the learned Judges had to decide was whether a mortgagee purchaser who failed to implead an attaching creditor can sue for a declaration that the latter is not entitled to pursue his further remedies under the attachment. They held that as he was a necessary party and was not made a defendant, his rights were not affected. What those rights may result in need not be considered now and was not considered then. The decision rests upon the broad proposition recognised by section 85 of the Transfer of Property Act re enacted in Order XXXIV, rule 1, that a person who ought to have been sued is not affected by any decree that may be passed behind his back. He can regard the result of the suit as infructuous so far as his rights are concerned and proceed to enforce them, notwithstanding the decree in the suit. The principle is that a person who ought to have been brought before the Court and was not should be placed in status quo ante. That I understand, is the principle which underlies Mulla Vittil Seethi v. Achuthan Nair (3). That was a case of a puisne mortgagee in possession. It was held that the sale obtained in a suit brought by the first mortgagee without impleading the puisne mortgagee did not affect the latter's possession. The decision in Lakhpat Rai v. Fakhr-ud-din (10) may also be cited as showing that a money decree purchaser cannot claim to retain possession merely because he purchased the property first.

The learned Vakil contended that the true principle applicable to such cases is to hold that the first purchaser is entitled to retain possession against subsequent purchasers. This principle is no doubt well established as regards competing purchasers under-money decrees. It has also been accepted as regards contending mortgage decree purchasers. Is the extension of this doctrine justifiable when the competition is between a purchaser under the money decree and a purchaser under a mortgage decree? Having regard to the fact that no interest is transmitted by the money decree-holder to his auction purchaser, I do not think that such an extension is warranted. Let us see what the result of upholding such a contention would be. The attaching decree-holder who had the right to sue to redeem would have his rights enlarged on account of the failure to include him as a party defendant. On what principle is this addition to his rights to be justified? Mr. Venkatarama Sastri suggested that as, if the money decree-holder had put up the equity of redemtion to sale, the purchaser standing in the shoes of the mortgagor can compel the mortgagee to grant him time to redeem, the fact that he purchased during the pendency of the mortgage suit should not affect this right. This argument necessitates the examination on the theory that the attaching creditor is not affected by lis pendens. It was contended on the authority of Manjeshwara Krishnaya v. Vasudeva Mallya (2) that a person who ought to have been impleaded is not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens. That was a case of the application of the doctrine to co-defendants. The learned Chief Justice applied the analogy of res judicata to that case. I do not think it was intended to lay down that all the rights and infirmities applying to res judicata were attracted by lis pendens. No doubt section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act is not in terms applicable to Court sales, the reason being that where a competent Court having jurisdiction to do so sells property, that sale is not vitiated by the fact that another Court had seisin of a suit relating to the same property. But the principle underlying the section is applicable to a person who, with knowledge that a suit is pending relating to the property, deliberately ignores such a suit and purchases the property. True knowledge is not a factor which affects the applicability of lis pendens. But in estimating the value of the rights acquired by such a purchaser, is it inequitable to say "you knew that a suit was pending and if you purchased with knowledge of such a pending litigation, you cannot claim to supersede the right of the mortgagee in that suit?" I am inclined to the view that the principle of first purchase is not applicable under these circumstances; and where it conflicts with the reason underlying Order XXX V, rule 1, namely, that a failure to implead places the respective claiments only in status quo ante, I am prepared to give precedence to the latter right. The decision in Chinnu Paillai v. Venkatasami Chettiar (4) turned upon the interest in property possessed by a puisne mortgagee and, therefore, is not inconsistent with the view I have taken.

For these reasons, I agree with the conclusions of my learned brother that the civil miscellaneous appeal should be dismissed with costs and also with the order as to civil revision petition.

SIND JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

MISCELLANEOUS APPEAL No. 37 OF 1918.

THE FIRM OF GOBINDRAM SHIVALDAS —APPELLANTS

MESSRS. EWART RYRIE & CO.— RESPONDENTS.

Arbitration Act (IX of 1899), s. 19—Breach of contract, suit arising out of—Reference to arbitration—Stay of suit—Defence alleging custom inconsistent with contract—Arbitrators, power of, to decide as to existence of custom.

In a suit for breach of contract the parties referred the matters in dispute between them to arbitration, and the Court stayed the suit under section 19 of the Arbitration Act. Plaintiff objected to the stay of the suit, on the ground that the main defence to the suit was based on an alleged custom which was inconsistent with the written terms of the contract, and could not be gone into before the arbitrators:

Held, disallowing the objection, that there was no legal objection to the arbitrators going into the question of the existence of the alleged custom, whereby the method of performance of the contract would be legitimately widened. [p. 506, col. 2; p. 507, col 1.]

A mere widening of the method of performance by custom is, though a variance, not a contradiction of the terms of a contract, so as to make the custom inadmissible. [p 506, col. 2.]

Appeal from the order of the Additional Judicial Commissioner, Sind.

Mr. Tolasing Khushalsing, for the Appellants.

Mr. T. G. Elphinston, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The lower Court has, under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, stayed a suit which has been brought by the appellants against Messrs. Ewart Ryrie & Co. and we have to decide whether this order is erroneous, bearing in mind the general rule that a Court of Appeal should be slow to interfere with a discretion judicially exercised by the lower Court.

The main ground relied on by Mr. Tolasing for the appellants is that the contract requires Ewart Ryrie & Co. themselves to import the sugar, which is the subject-matter of the contract, and that the defendants' main defence to the claim against them for breach of contract is based on an alleged custom, which is inconsistent with the written terms of the contract and which cannot, therefore, be gone into before the arbitrators. The law on this subject in England is settled by the House of Lords in the two cases reported under the name of Produce Brokers Company v. Olympia Oil & Cake Co. (1) and Olympia Oil & Cake Co. v. Produce Brokers Co. (2). The head-note of the report in the 1st case runs as follows:—

"Under a clause in a contract referring to arbitration any dispute arising under the contract, it is competent to the arbitrator finally to determine the existence of a custom affecting the rights and obligations of the parties under the contract, where such custom is not inconsistent with the terms of the contract".

The second case, which related to the same contract as that under consideration in the first, confirms the principle, which is laid down in Humfrey v. Dale (3), that mere variance of a written contract is not necessarily repugnancy. The passage in the judgment of Lord Campbell, C. J., in the latter case, which deals with this point, is well known and is reproduced in extenso in Amir Ali's Law of Evidence, 6th Edition, pages 605, 606. It is there laid down that to fall within the exception, therefore, of repugnancy, the incident must be such as, if expressed in the written contract, would make it insensible or inconsistent." And as pointed out by Scrutton, L. J., in Produce Brokers Co v. Olympia Oil & Cake Co. (1) a mere widening of the method of performance by custom is, though a variance, not a contradiction of the terms of a contract, so as to make the custom inadmissble. Having regard to the language used in proviso 5 to section 92 of the Evidence Act, which speaks of a repugnancy to or inconsistency with the express terms of a contract, I think the same may safely be taken to be the law also in India.

Is then the alleged custom inconsistent with the terms of the contract, in the above mentioned sense? In my opinion, the answer is in the negative. In the first palce, there is nothing in the contract which expressly binds Messrs. Ewart Ryrie & Co. to import the sugar themselves and not through another importing firm.

The indent authorises them to instruct their friends in London to purchase and ship the goods, but it does not prohibit them from getting them from Java in another manner. Nor is there anything else in the contract which I can find to imply that it was of the essence of the agreement that the goods should be ordered by Ewart Ryrie & Co. themselves (or rather their London agents), though no doubt the indent contemplates this, being the ordinary method of obtaining the goods for tender to appellants. It is not alleged that the latter are in any way prejudiced by Ewart Ryrie & Co. obtaining the suger by local purchase, and paragraph 3 of the appellants' Pleader's letter of 22nd August 1917 precludes them from making any such allegation. They there say: "We understand that you have on several prior occasions bought locally to fulfil your contracts," and they proceeded actually to offer to sell Ewart Ryrie & Co. the two tons of sugar to enable them to perform their contracts.

In the face of this, it is clear that the objection now under consideration was not then regarded by appellants as a vital one.

For the above reasons I think that there would have been no inconsistency if the indent had expressly provided that Messrs. Ewart Ryrie & Co. might, instead of themselves procuring the sugar by placing an order for it on the London market, obtain it by local purchase in this manner, in which they say they are justified in doing by custom. Lord Campbell's main test is not, therefore, satisfied. And it is a case where (as Scrutton, L. J, points out) the method of performance contemplated by a contract may be legitimately widened by custom. In these circumstances, I think there is no legal objection to the arbitrators going into the question whether such a custom exists and justified the respondents in not having tendered sugar in July or August 1917 in performance of their contract. Accordingly, in my opinion, the appellants' main objection to the stay of the suit falls to the ground.

I may add that the existence or non-existence of the custom in question, and its effect on this contract, are within the submission clause, which covers "any dispute whether arising under this indent which cannot be arranged by mutual agreement," for the reasons which are given by Lord Parker of Waddington in Produce Brockers Co. v. Olympia Oil & Cake Co. (1).

The next objection taken is that there is no sufficient evidence to justify the lower Court in holding that Messrs. Ewart Ryrie & Co. were ready and willing to refer matters to arbitration before the filing of the suit. But the application for stay of the suit, which was verified by the firm's manager, Mr. Murray, avers that "the appellants have always been and are still ready and willing to refer the matters to arbitration." It is a fact that cannot be contested, and is constantly brought to this Court's notice, by proceedings before it, that European firms at Karachi like the respondents, prefer arbitration to having their contract disputes settled by the Courts and, therefore, very slight evidence is sufficient in their case to justify the Court in being satisfied as to the requisite willingness to refer to arbitration. In my opinion the allegation in the application, corroborated by Mr. Murrary's verification and the affidavit of the salesman, Gehimal, suffices (in the absence of any evidence to the contrary) to prove this willingness. Mr. Tolasing relies on the correspondence as evidence to the contrary, but this at most shows respondents did not suggest arbitration prior to the suit. It was not incumbent on them to do so, and the correspondence and these proceedings show beyond doubt that, if they had suggested arbitration, the appellants would not have accepted the suggestion. The mere silence of the respondents does not really go in any way to disprove the respondents' assertion that there were willing to refer to arbitration prior to the suit. It merely shows that they thought the time had not yet come, when recourse should be had to arbitration. If the appellants had asked them to do so and respondents had refused to ignore the request, the case would of course have been different.

It is also contended that the lower Court erred in not allowing the appellants to examine the respondents' manager, Mr. Murray, on the two points discussed above. They were not, however entitled in an interlocutory proceeding of this kind to have evidence taken in Court instead of given in the ordinary mode of affidavits; and there is no reason to think that Mr. Murray's evidence, if taken, would have really helped the appellants on the two points. I hold, therefore, that there is no sufficient ground for our interfering with the lower Court's refusal to have Mr. Murray examined.

The remaining grounds of appeal were not pressed in view of this Court's decision in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 35 of 1918.

I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1205 OF 1918.

Paper Currency Act (II of 1910), s. 26—Hundi drawn payable to bearer on demand, legality of.

A hundi drawn payable to bearer on demand, being in contravention of section 26 of the Paper Currency Act, is illegal, and cannot form the basis of a suit. [p. 508, cols. 1 & 2; p. 509, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Sivaganga, in Appeal Suit No. 6 of 1917 (Appeal Suit No. 576 of 1916 on the file of the District Court, Ramnad), preferred against the decree of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Sivaganga, in Original Suit No. 88 of 1914.

Mr. A. Srinivasa Iyengar, for the Appellant.

Mr. Anantha Krishna Aiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—I think that the hundi sued on is illegal, as contravening section 26 of the Indian Paper Currency Act [Nachimuthu Chetty v. Andiappa Pillai (1) Spenser and Krishnan, JJ.] The Subordinate Judge's view that a loan becomes a deposit with the debtor "after the loan became payable by the expiry of the time provided in the document of loan" and if the debtor happened to be a banker, the proviso to section 26 of the Paper Currency Act will apply, cannot be accepted as sound.

The lower Appellate Court's decree dismissing the suit must, therefore, be confirmed on the above ground which was the ground on which the District Munsif properly dismissed it.

It is unnecessary, under these circumstances, to give a final opinion on the question whether the particular ground on which the lower Appellate Court dismissed the suit, namely, that plaintiff could not sue on the hundi because he had entered the name of Periannan Chetty on it and had not got Periannan Chetty to endorse it back in plaintiff's favour, whether this particular ground is also a good defence to the suit. I shall content myself by saying that my present view is that a plaintiff who is suing only the drawer of a hundi and who is honestly in possession of that hundi which is made payable to bearer (and the presumption is that every holder is an honest holder in due course) is entitled to deal with the endorsements and writings on the back of the hundi in any manner he likes, provided that his so dealing does not subject the defendant (the drawer) to a greater liability than he would be under, if there had been no endorsements at all and the hundi had been left in its original state. This principle had been applied in the Muthar Sahib Maraikayar v. Kadir Sahib Maraikayar (2) in favour of the plaintiff in that case, who was the holder of a hundi and who was also an indorser who got back the hundi, but I do not think that his having been an endorser also in that case has anything to do with the customs and conveniences of Mercantile Law on which the governing principle of that decision rests. If the plaintiff in the case was entitled to score out, and had scored out Periannan Chetty's name, from the back of the hundi, the result would be the same as if Periannan had never been its holder. Periannan could thereafter not sue on it and the plaintiff as bearer would be the only person entitled to sue thereon. Of course, even though the names or endorsements on the back had not been actually dealt with by a plaintiff (including the scoring out names on the back) in the manner favourable to him, before he brought the suit, he could ask the Court to treat the hundi as if he had so dealt with them in any manner he was entitled to deal with them. I have (it will be seen) dealt with a case in which the drawer alone is sought to be made liable. It goes without saying that other considerations might arise, if an individual indorser is sought to be made liable as he will not be bound by alterations which would prejudice his right to proceed against the previous indorsers or the drawer, etc.

(1) 42 Ind Cas 706; 6 L. W. 630; (1917, M. W. N. 778.

(2) 28 M. 514; 15 M. L. J. 384.

In the result the second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

SPENCER, J.—In my opinion the District Munsif was right in holding that the suit was not maintainable on the hundi Exhibit A, on the ground that it contravened section 26 of the Paper Currency Act, and the Subordinate Judge was wrong in thinking that this was an exception to the prohibition contained in that section. The Subordinate Judge gives three reasons for his opinion, and each of them on examination appears to be erroneous. First he says that the words 'on demand' do not appear on Exhibit A: but section 26 does not require that those words should be expressed in the instrument. No time for payment was specified and the hundi was made payable to the person persenting it. It was thus evidently a hundi payable to the bearer on demand. Next the Subordinate Judge refers to the exception in section 1 of the Negotiable Instruments Act in favour of instruments written in an oriental language. This exception only provides against the provisions of that Act that override local usage in respect of instruments written in the vernaculars. It does not prevent the operation of the provisions of the Paper Currency Act, which is quite a different Act. Lastly, the Subordinate Judge tries to bring the case within the proviso to section 26 by saying that though the amount was a loan in the first instance, it became a deposit after the date of payment. It is clear from the evidence of Sathappa Chetty (plaintiff's witness No. 1) that the sum of Rs. ',000 in question represented a debt due to 1st defendant by one Kassim and that no cash was deposited with the witness by 1st defendant.

The proviso to section 26 only applies to deposits of money in the hands of the bankers, shroffs or agents. This is not such a case. The suit hundi, therefore, offends against section 26 of the Paper Currency Act and following Chidambaram Chettiar v. Ayyasaami Thevan (3), Arunachalam Chettiar v. Narayanan Chettiar (4) and Nachimuthu Chetty v. Andiappa Pillai (1) this suit, being based on such a hundi, is not maintainable and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

In this view it becomes unnecessary to decide the rather technical objection that plaintiff could not maintain the suit without first obtaining an indorsement from Periannan Chetty. The plaintiff is the holder of the negotiable instrument which, when drawn, was payable to bearer. He is not an indorser as he did not sign the instrument (see section 15 of the Negotiable Instruments Act) but he wrote an order to pay Periannan Chetty above the signatures of 2 indorsers and thus under section 49 he converted the indorsement which was in blank into an indorsement in full; under section 46 the hundi become negotiable by Periannan Chetty when it was indorsed, and delivered to him. When the instrument returned into the possession of the plaintiff, there was nothing, so far as I can see, to prevent the plaintiff from cancelling the indorsement which he had written in favour of Periannan Chetty and from recovering the amount due thereon.

If this negotiable instrument was not for other reasons bad, I should be inclined to allow the plaintiff to make the necesaary correction and to proceed with this suit. But as he must fail on the other point, it becomes unnecessary to remand the suit for further trial.

Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), s. 53—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLVII—Review of order in land acquisition proceeding—Jurisdiction.

There is nothing in the Land Acquisition Act which forbids the application of Order XLVII of the Code of Civil Procedure to proceedings under the Act. [p. 511, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge of Manbhum, dated the 17th April 1919.

Messrs. Naresh Chandra Sinha and Shishir Kumar Mitter, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Abani Bhusan Mukherjee, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—The petitioners pray for our interference under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. It appears that a Deputy Collector having made certain awards in the district of Manbhum for the acquisition of land, certain tenure-holders asked for a reference to the Civil Court under section 18 of the Land Acquisition Act. The District Judge made an order after hearing the parties apportioning the compensation money between the Zemindar, the tenure-holders and the raiyats. The tenure-holders thereupon made an application to the District Judge, asking for amendment of the decree and also contending that the apportionment had not been correctly made. The learned Judge upon considering the matter found that he had made the order of apportionment under a misapprehension, and had taken as admitted certain facts which were not admitted and about which the parties were in serious dispute. He, thereupon, decided that the decree should be amended but that in order that the amendment might be carried out, it was necessary to hear all the parties interested and to review the judgment. That order was made on the 17th of April 1919 and the Zemindar has come to this Court for our interference in revision.

He contends that the order was without jurisdiction, and the decree being in conformity with the judgment, the District Judge has no authority to review it under section 151 or 152 or any other section of the Civil Procedure Code. Section 152 clearly has no application, and as to section 151 it is contended that the Judge can only exercise his inherent powers when he is properly seized with jurisdiction in the case. In other words, it is contended he cannot call for the record after he has made his final order under the Land Acquisition Act, without any application by the parties, and order a review of his own motion. This contention need not be considered in detail, because on a reference to the application made by the tenure-holders to the District Judge for the amendment of the decree, we find that the judgment itself is attacked and the petition is, in our opinion, in effect a petition for review as well as a petition for amendment of the decree.

It is finally contended that even if the application of the tenure-holders is an application for review, the provisions of order XLVII of the Civil Procedure Code do not apply to a decision by the Civil Court under the Land Acquisition Act, and reliance has been placed upon the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rangoon Botatoung Co., Ld. v. Collector of Rangoon (1). In that case their Lordships held that there was no appeal to the Privy Council from a decree of the High Court in a land acquisition proceeding.

It is contended that the same principle applies here and that the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code not being applicable there can be no review. Now a right of appeal must be conferred by Statute and their Lordships held that as the Land Acquisition Act was self-contained in this matter and had made provision for an appeal only to the High Court, to allow an appeal to the Privy Council would be to contravene the terms of the Statute itself. In making certain observations to the effect that the decision of the Civil Court in a land acquisition matter is in reality of the nature of an award, their Lordships, in my opinion, merely intended to show why the Act had not considered it necessary to provide a further appeal. But these considerations do not apply to the question of a review. The Land Acquisition Act in section 53 enacts that the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code shall apply, save so far as they are inconsistent with anything contained in the Act. We find nothing in the Act which forbids the application of Order XLVII of the Code, and, therefore, in our opinion, the District Judge had power to entertain an application under Order XLVII. The order that we shall make is that the present petitions before us be dismissed and that the record be sent down and that the cases do proceed before the District Judge from the stage which they had reached on the date when his order was made. The petitioners will pay one set of costs for the petitions now before us and one hearing fee, which is fixed at 3 gold mohurs.

Mr. K. K. Malaviya, for the Applicant.

Messrs. J. B. Lal and S. P. Sinha, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application for revision is untenable.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, who is the landlord, granted him a lease of certain land; that he was in possession under the lease; that he had grown crops on the land, and that the defendant wrongfully cut down and misappropriated the crops. He claimed the value of the crops as damages. The suit was clearly cognizable by the Civil Court. The plaintiff did not allege wrongful dispossession and the suit was not a suit for compensation for wrongful dispossession. The plaintiff is in possession and all that he claims is the value of the crops which the defendant forcibly cut down. The suit, not being one for compensation for wrongful dispossession, could not be brought in the Revenue Court under section 79 of the Tenancy Act. I dismiss the application with costs.

junior widows on the one hand and the adopted son on the other, he directed that the junior widow should be given 15 acres of land. In a suit by the junior widow for the 15 acres:

Held, (1) that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, in the absence of an agreement with the adoptive boy's natural father, that the adoption was made subject to the adopted son's liability to give the 15 acres to plaintiff on demand;

(2) that the plaintiff's right to maintenance and residence remained intact.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. C. Sambasiva Row, for the Appellants.—The lower Courts erred in decreeing the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff's husband could not, by Will, dispose of ancestral properties so as to affect the rights of the adopted son, who was adopted under his directions. The adopted son stands in the same position as the testator's posthumous son. See Privy Council decision in Pratapsing Shivsing v. Agarsinghji Raisingh i (1). There is no allegation that there was any necessity for gifting 15 acres. There is no proof either that, at the time of adoption, the natural father of the boy gave him in adoption subjecting the adopted boy to liability to give 15 acres to the plaintiff.

Mr. V. Ramesam, for the Respondent:—The alienation in favour of the plaintiff was good as a family arrangement It should be presumed that at time of adoption, the adopted boy's natural parents were aware of this provision in the Will and that the adoption was made subject to this liability.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff (respondent) is the junior widow of her husband, who executed the Will Exhibit A (September 1913) providing (1) that his senior widow should adopt a suitable boy after his death and (2) that, if after such adoption, disagreement should arise between his junior wife (on the one side) and his senior wife and the adopted son (on the other side), the junior widow (present plaintiff) should be given absolutely 15 acres out of a larger area of land (there are certain other provisions in the Will unnecessary to detail for the decision of the present case).

The senior widow (1st defendant) adopted the 2nd defendant on the next day after her husband's death and according to the dictum of the Privy Council in Pratapsing Shivsing v. Agarsinghji Raisinghji (1), he stands in as good a position as if he was the posthumous son of his father.

It was not alleged or contended in the lower Courts (much less proved) that the senior widow at the time of the adoption caused the 2nd defendant's natural father to agree to the adoption being made subject to a liability on the part of the adopted son to give to the plaintiff the 15 acres whenever she demanded the land, and hence the case in Vedanayaga Mudaliar v. Vedammal (2), does not help the plaintiff.

The status and the rights of the adopted son have been now well settled by the decision of the Privy Council and by the decisions of the High Courts in India.

A Hindu has no such power of alienation over ancestral properties as would affect the rights of his adopted son unless the alienation was made for necessity, even if the alienation was made during the lifetime of the father.

An attempted alienation by Will, to take effect on a certain contingency expected to occur after an adopted son comes into existence subsequent to the death of the testator, stands of course on a much weaker basis.

In the result the decrees of the lower Courts awarding to the plaintiff 15 acres of land according to her prayer in the plaint are set aside and the suit is dismissed without prejudice to the plaintiff's right to sue for maintenance and residence under the general law.

The respondent will pay the appellants' costs in this Court and the parties will, under the circumstances, bear their respective costs in the lower Courts.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145—Possession—Magistrate, duty of, to decide question—Entry of name in Collectorate Register, whether conclusive.

In a proceeding under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code, in which one of the parties claims to hold the property in his own right and not as a servant or manager, the Magistrate is bound to determine which of the parties is in actual physical possession and although a presumption of possession may be legitimately made in favour of a person whose name is recorded as in possession in Register D of the Collectorate, that entry is not conclusive. [p. 515, col. 1.]

Application against the order passed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Motihari, dated the 26th April 1920.

Mr. A. B. Mukherji, for the Petitioner.

Mr. S. A. A. Asghar, Government Advocate, and Mr. Jadubans Sahai, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application against the order of the Sub-Divisional Officer of Motihari, dated the 26th April 1920, passed under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, declaring the 1st party, the Bettiah Raj, to be in possession of the village Ghiwadhar, in dispute.

The 1st party is the proprietor of the village and the name of the present Maharani as such has been registered in Register D of the Land Registration Department under Act VII of 1876 B. C. The estate being under the Court of Wards, the name of the Manager has also been registered. The village was originally acquired by Maharaj Kumar Babu Mahendra Kishore Singh Bahadur, and after his death devolved upon his brother, the late Maharaja Rajendra Kishore Singh Bahadur, Maharaja of Bettiah Raj. The Maharaja, however, made a gift of the village to the widows of Maharaja Mahendra Kishore in order to enable them to maintain a temple, which they had built, during their lifetime and after their death to be attached to the temple for so long as the temple existed. This was done by a deed of gift, dated the 25th November 1881.

After the death of one of the widows, the other widow in the year 1884 85 by a parwana (Exhibit I) appointed one Harangi Misser as its Manager, ancestor of the petitioner, Babu Lal Misser, on the 5th March 1886, entrusting to him and his heirs the collections and expenditure, with direction to file an account of the expenditure to the owner of the Raj, after the death of the widow. By this document, it was stipulated that the arrangement and the management was to belong to Harangi Misser from generation to generation, till the temple existed.

After the death of the widow, who gave this parwana to Harangi Misser, the village reverted to the Raj, and as stated above, its name and that of its Manager were recorded in the Collectorate Register D, but Harangi continued to be in actual possession of the village. After him his son, Janardhan, came to be in possession; after the death of Janardhan, his son Kanhiya Lal succeeded. This happened in the year 1322 F. S. (1915), when apparently the Bettiah Estate took some steps to obtain possession of the village. This led to a dispute between the Raj and Babu Lal Misser, brother of Kanhiya Lal. The latter applied for registration of his name in Register D of the Collector as Manager and shebait of the temple. The Raj objected to it. The Deputy Collector and the Collector allowed the application of the petitioner and recorded him as shebait and Manager in 1917. They held that the village was in possession continuously of the family of the petitioner from the time of Harangi Misser and that the petitioner also continued to be in possession thereof (vide the certified copy of the judgment of the Collector, dated the 16th October 1917, filed by the applicant to-day which also appears to have been filed in the Court below but not exhibited). In this judgment, the Collector says that Kanhiya Lal, brother of the applicant, Babu Lal, filed a petition in the original proceedings admitting the applicant's claim and this leaves the applicant in possession of the fields.

The Bettiah Raj then moved the Commissioner in revision, who set aside the order of the Deputy Collector and the Collector and directed that the previous entry in the register be restored, on the ground that it was not established that by the deed of gift, dated the 25th November 1881, the god had become the proprietor of the village. The order of the Commissioner was upheld by the Board of Revenue by its resolution dated the 3rd May 1918. The present proceeding was started on the application of the Bettiah Raj. The Magistrate has agreed with the view taken by the Commissioner and the Board of Revenue as to the correct interpretation of the documents in question. He has held that upon these documents the petitioner has no locus standi to claim possession of the property of the temple and that his claim to be hereditary servant not removable from office is a question beyond his jurisdiction to determine and that he should go to the Civil Court if he so desires.

Then coming to the question of possession, the Magistrate did not enter into the consideration of the evidence offered by the parties. He declared the 1st party to be in possession simply on the ground that the name of the Manager is recorded in Register D of the Collectorate and as such the tenants are bound to pay rent to him and not to any one else.

As to the evidence of the petitioner with respect to the actual collection of rent from the tenants, the learned Magistrate disposed of it by the remark that "The tenants cannot be allowed to choose their own landlord and set up anyone they like. Therefore, if some of them have paid rent to the 2nd party (petitioner) and the majority of them are willing to pay to him, they do so at their own risk."

The Magistrate, therefore, is apparently of opinion that the registration of the name of the Manager of the Raj concludes the present enquiry under section 145 as to possession. No doubt, the registration of names under Act VII of 1876 (Land Registration Act) proceeds upon possession and hence in a proceeding under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the presumption of possession may be legitimately made in favour of the person whose name is so recorded. I am in full concord with the view expressed in the case of Gobind Chunder Moitra v. Abdul Sayed (1), to the effect that a summary adjudication upon the question of possession by the Land Registration Officer under Act VII of 1876 is entitled to the same respect on the question of possession in a proceeding under section 145 of the Code as a decree of the Civil Court. In the present case, however, there was no adjudication of possession by the Revenue Court in a proceeding under the Land Registration Act. The applicant Babu Lal Misser was refused registration of his name simply upon the view taken by the Commissioner and the Board of Revenue that the deed of gift did not constitute a transfer to a god. The Hon'ble Member of the Board observed as follows:

"Although the petitioner may be in possession of the property, the question is whether he is in such possession and in such capacity as would entitle him to registration under section 52 of Act VII of 1876."

That Act provides for the registration of a particular class of persons, namely, proprietors of estates paying revenue to Government or free of revenue and managers and mortgagees of such estates, and, unless a person occupies any of these positions, his name cannot be registered under the Act although he may be in physical and actual possession of the property. As a matter of fact, the Deputy Collector and the Collector definitely held that the petitioner was in possession of the property from the time of his ancestor, and this finding was not disturbed by the Commissioner or the Hon'ble Member of the Board. The learned Magistrate was apparently thinking of section 78 of the Land Registration Act and section 6J of the Bengal Tenancy Act, when he observes that tenants cannot be allowed to choose their landlord and set up anyone they like. These sections have been specially referred to me by Mr. Asghar, the learned Government Advocate. They apply only to the case of proprietors and managers defined in the Land Registration Act and do not bar the realisation of rents by a person in possession, otherwise than as a proprietor, or a manager under this said Act, such as a lessee or intermediate tenure-holder, etc. The Bettiah Raj was undisputedly the proprietor of the village and has always been registered as such; yet the petitioner and his ancestors were in actual and physical possession of the property by realising rents from the tenants, although their names were never registered under the Registration Act, and hence the aforesaid section 78 of the Land Registration Act and section 60 of the Bengal Tenancy Act did not stand in the way of the realisation of the rent from the tenants by the petitioner.

The petitioner claims to be in possession of the property by right of succession or inheritance from his ancestors, conferred by the parwana (Exhibit A) in question. The Revenue Courts and, for the matter of that, the Criminal Courts under section 145 were certainly not in a position to determine the status of the petitioner, which must be determined by a Civil Court. The Commissioner and the Board of Revenue were, therefore, right in the view that they took. Whatever be the position of the petitioner before, but from 1915 and clearly in the land registration proceedings in 1917, he claimed to hold the property in his own right, and not as a servant or manager of the estate. He, therefore, set up an adverse possession. Whether he has a right in him or not, cannot be determined, as I observed above, in the present criminal proceeding. The Magistrate had only to determine as to which of the parties were in actual and physical possession of the property in dispute. The Register D, as shown above, is not conclusive in this case as to the possession of the 1st party and the judgments of the Commissioner and the Board of Revenue (Exhibits XI and XV), far from being in favour of the 1st party, do not disturb the finding of possession found by the Deputy Collector and the Collector in favour of the petitioner, Babu Lal Misser. This finding of the Revenue Court was in the year 1917. The enquiry of the Magistrate relates to June-July 1913. The proceeding under section 145 has, therefore, been concluded without a fair and definite finding upon the evidence on the record as to the possession of the contending parties. The Magistrate has not considered the evidence of possession on the record. The order of the Magistrate under section 145, declaring the 1st party to be in possession, must be set aside. It was, of course, open to the Magistrate, if he was not satisfied upon the evidence as to the possession of either party, to attach the property under section 146. If the Magistrate be still of opinion that there is danger of a breach of the peace, he will be at liberty to start a fresh proceeding and to dispose of it on legal evidence and in accordance with law.

The order as to costs passed by the Magistrate under section 148 must also be quashed.

Order set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 195—Sanction to prosecute—Court by which sanction can be given—Duty of Court in granting sanction.

Sanction to prosecute for perjury can, under section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code, only be granted by the Court which tried the case in which the alleged perjury was committed. Sanction, therefore, by a Sub-Divisional Magistrate in respect of a statement made in the Court of Session is bad in law. [p. 516, col. 1.]

In granting sanction to prosecute, it is incumbent on the Court to inquire whether the statement made was material to the result of the case, and whether there is a prima facie case and a reasonable prospect of a conviction. The Court should also consider whether a prosecution is desirable in the public interests. [p. 516, col. 2; p. 517, col. 2.]

Application for revision against the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Shahbunder.

Mr. F. J. De Verteuil, for the Applicant.

Mr. Partabrai D. Punwani, 2nd Assistant Public Prosecutor for Sind, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to revise the sanction granted by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Shahbunder, for the prosecution of one Khajumal Parumal under sections 193 and 194, Criminal Procedure Code.

Khajumal was a prosecution witness in a case in which three persons, Hashim, Abdullah and Mahomed, were committed to the Sessions Court on a charge of murder of one Jumo. In another case, in respect of the murder of the same man, one Hafiz was also committed to the Sessions Court and in this case also Khajumal was a witness.

The case against Abdullah, Hashim and Mahomed was withdrawn in the Sessions Court and the case against Hafiz resulted in his conviction under section 326, Indian Penal Code. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate has granted sanction in respect of the three following statements made on oath by Khajumal:

(1) "When we came (to the scene of offence) Hashim was not there. I can't say if Allahdino or Saleh Kotar were there." This statement was made in the Judicial Commissioner's Court, Sessions Division, when Hafiz was on his trial.

(2) "The Sub-Inspector recorded no statements of witnesses in my presence"

(3) "At the Thana outside Gowhar told me that he had further evidence which he offered to the Sub Inspector but he would not take it. I told the Sub Inspector, but he said that he had previously given evidence which was sufficient and he was being unnecessarily informed."

The last two statements were made in the Court of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Shahbunder, on the 13th March 1917 in the case against Hashim, Abdullah and Mahomed.

Now, with regard to the statement made in the Sessions Court, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate was not competent to grant sanction under section 196, clause 6, Criminal Procedure Code. If the statement is false, inasmuch as it was made in a proceeding in the Sessions Court, application for sanction should have been made to the Court before which the offence was committed. It is the Court which tries the case on the merits that is the proper authority to grant the sanction.

With regard to the second statement in respect of which sanction has been granted, it appears to me that though it is not necessary that the false evidence should be material to the case in which it is given yet, considering the fact that one of the essential ingredients in section 193, Indian Penal Code, is that a person must "intentionally give false evidence," it is incumbent on the Court to inquire whether the statement made was material to the result of the case. Assuming that Khajumal gave false evidence when he said that "the Sub-Inspector recorded no statements of witnesses in my presence," I am at a loss to conceive what bearing a statement of this description could have on the point in issue whether Hafiz or Abdullah, Mahomed and Hashim were guilty of the murder of Jumo. It is not a part of a Sub-Inspector's duty to record statements of witnesses in the presence of others, and a denial by Khajumal that any statements were recorded in his presence would not in the remotest degree throw any suspicion on the statements themselves, much less would they have any effect on the determination of the points in issue. Therefore, whether the statements of witnesses were or were not recorded by the Sub-Inspector in the presence of Khajumal seems to me perfectly immaterial Further, in order to convict a person of perjury it must be shown that the statements said to have been false could not but be false. Hira Nand v. King-Emperor (1). Now it may well be that Khajumal was present when the Sub Inspector was recording the statements of witnesses, yet, having paid no attention to what the witnesses were deposing to, nor having been asked to do so, he may well conclude that the statements were not recorded in his presence. The word 'presence' in itself is rather vague. Khajumal may have been in the same room when the statements were being recorded, yet could hardly be said to be present. It would, therefore, be difficult to prove that the statement was necessarily false and in granting a sanction for prosecution the Court must satisfy itself that there is a prima facie case and a reasonable prospect of successful termination of the prosecution to be instituted, Muneyya, In re (2), Kali Charan Lal v. Basudeo Narain Singh (3). I am told by the Assistant Public Prosecutor that the only evidence on the point as to Khajumal's presence is that of the Sub Inspector. The record of the case shows that there has been some unpleasantness in the past between the Sub-Inspector and Khajumal. For all these reasons, I would revoke the sanction granted in respect of this statement.

In respect of the third statement it is alleged that Khajumal committed perjury in stating that outside the Thana, Gowhar told him that he had further evidence which he offered to the Sub-Inspector but he would not take it. I am informed that sanction has been granted for the prosecution of Gowhar for stating in his evidence that he offered further evidence to the Sub-Inspector but that the latter declined to take it. It may be that the evidence of Gowhar that he offered further evidence to the Sub Inspector which he refused to accept is wholly untrue, but the point for consideration is, whether Gowhar told Khajumal of this—Khajumal says he did and Gowhar corroborates him. Probably, Gowhar did tell Khajumal a lie with the view of inducing the latter to remonstrate with the Sub-Inspector, but Khajumal had no reason to believe that what Gowhar told him was an untruth. I, therefore, fail to understand how Khajumal can be convicted of perjury in respect of a false statement made to him by Gowhar. What evidence can there possibly be to prove that Gowhar did not tell Khajumal what the latter says he did, particularly when these two are agreed on the point?

It is next alleged that Khajumal gave false evidence when he said that he told the Sub-Inspector of what Gowhar had told him, but that the Sub-Inspector replied that Gowhar had previously given evidence which was sufficient and that he was "being unnecessarily informed"—apparently, the Sub-Inspector denies that Khajumal ever conveyed to him an intimation that may have been given to him by Gowhar, and it is possible that on account of the strained relationship between Khajumal and the Sub-Inspector, Khajumal may have made a false statement with the view of showing up the remissness of the Sub-Inspector in the case which he was investigating. But I am told by the Assistant Public Prosecutor that the only evidence on this point is the denial by the Sub Inspector that he was told by Khajumal that Gowhar had any further evidence to give. It would be very unsafe to grant sanction for prosecution for perjury when the materials on which a conviction is expected are of so flimsy a character. The probabilities are in favour of Khajumal. If Gowhar did tell him that he had further evidence to give and requested him, as the evidence shows, to communicate this fact to the Sub-Inspector as he would not listen to him, it is likely that Khajumal did inform the Sub-Inspector of what Gowhar had told him. In Kali Charan Lal v. Basudeo Narain Singh (3) the Chief Justice said: "It is a rule of this Court that sanction to prosecute is not usually granted unless there is a very reasonable chance of a conviction following. In this case I think the chance of conviction would be very small."

I am also of opinion that a sanction for prosecution should be granted with great circumspection and care and where there are no reasonable prospects of a conviction it is unsafe to grant it. Before granting sanction the Court must also consider whether a prosecution is desirable in the public interests: Nattava Parankusam, In re (4). Statements Nos. 2 and 3 in respect of which sanction is granted refer exclusively to the Sub-Inspector investigating the murder case and are calculated to reflect upon his action. As I have remarked above, there is some evidence of ill feeling, and it has been admitted, between the Sub Inspector and Khajumal. In my opinion, therefore, if sanction is granted, it may be used not in the interest of justice but for the purposes of oppression. I, therefore, revoke the sanction granted by the Sub Divisional Magistrate, Shahbunder, in respect of all the three statements.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145, proceedings under, when justified—Dispute, whether must be between parties one of whom claims exclusive possession.

In proceedings under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, the dispute must be between parties, each of whom claims exclusive possession of the property in dispute. Where the dispute is between parties, one of whom claims joint possession of the property in dispute, proceedings cannot be taken under section 145.

Mr. Bimala Charan Sinha, for the Petitioners.

Messrs. Reyasat Hussain and B. N. Mittra for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application arising out of proceedings under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code The parties to the proceedings are all co sharer maliks in Tauzi No. 6138. In Tauzi No. 6470, there was a plot No. 135, on which there were some Mahua trees. The petitioners were tenants of Tauzi No. 6470 and claimed to have planted the trees. At the survey, 56 of these trees were recorded in the names of the landlords of Tauzi No. 6470 and 49, which has now been reduced to 45, were recorded in the name of Ram Lal Mahton and others, who are landlords of Tauzi No. 6138 and are mentioned as landlords in Khewat No. 3. None of the parties have any interest in the land of Tauzi No. 6470. The landlords of Tauzi No. 6138 claimed to have joint interest in the 49 Mahua trees and the petitioners allege that the trees have been allotted to them as their raiyati, that they are represented by Ram Lal Mahton in the entry in the Record of Rights, and that the other co-sharers have no interest in those trees.

After the survey, there was a partition of Tauzi No. 6138 and the second party claimed that the trees on plot No. 135 should be partitioned, but the application was rejected as the land belonged to Tauzi No. 6470, which was not the subject of the partition proceedings. There were disputes as to the trees and then proceedings under section 145 were started.

The learned Magistrate, after making an inquiry, decided that all the co-sharer landlords of Tauzi No. 6138 were in possession of the trees. One of the members of the third party to the proceedings declared that he had no interest in the trees and that the petitioners had a right to them; also Mr. Huda, a member of the second party, said he had bought half an interest in the trees from the petitioners, who had the exclusive right to them.

The ground taken up by the petitioners is that as one party claimed joint possession of the trees with the petitioners and the petitioners claimed exclusive possession, the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to take proceedings under section 145.

There is a long series of decisions to the effect that where the dispute is between parties one of which claims joint possession of the property in dispute or where exclusive possession is not claimed by each of the parties, proceedings cannot be taken under section 145; Tarujan Bibee v. Asamuddi Bepari (1), Jogeswar Das v. Emperor (Trilochan Das) (2) and Krista Alhadini Dasi v. Radha Syam Panday (3). On the other side the case of Mon Mohan Ghose v. Rajendra Coomar Ghosh (4) is cited. In that case, however, there was a dispute as to a definite plot of land and the question was whether that plot was included in a piece of land, which was in the exclusive possession, one of the parties of or in another, which was joint property of both parties. That case hardly helps the opposite party. It seems settled that in proceedings under section 145 the dispute must be between parties, each of whom claims exclusive possession of the property in dispute.

On this ground, I am satisfied that this application should be allowed. The order under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code is set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 347—Commitment to Sessions—Magistrate, discretion of—Summons case tacked on to warrant case—Procedure.

A Magistrate committed a case for trial by the Court of Session upon charges against some of the accused persons under sections 302 and 160 of the Penal Code and against others under section 160 of the Code only. On behalf of these latter it was objected that as the case against them was a summons case which was triable by the Magistrate and the accused could be adequately punished by him, their commitment for trial by the Court of Session was illegal:

Held, that under section 347 of the Criminal Procedure Code it being in the discretion of a Magistrate, duly empowered, to commit cases to the Court of Session where a certain case calls for such committal and this discretion not being limited to cases where the Magistrate cannot inflict an adequate sentence, there may be other good reasons which may, in the exercise of a sound and wise discretion, justify committal, and that as the procedure to be followed where, as in this case, the complaint forms the subject of two distinct charges arising out of the same transaction, one of which is a summons case and the other a warrant case, was that prescribed for a warrant case, the commitment was not illegal. [p. 520, col. 2; p. 521, col. 1.]

Application to quash an order of commitment passed by the City Magistrate, Karachi.

Mr. Wadhumal Oodharam, for the Applicant.

Mr. T. G. Elphinston (Public Prosecutor for Sind), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The City Magistrate, Karachi, has committed for trial to this Court in its Sessions Court jurisdiction Wali son of Yakub and his two brothers Hassan and Ghani, the first under sections 302 and 160, Indian Penal Code, and the others under section 160 only. An application has been made to me under section 215, Criminal Procedure Code, to quash the commitment of Hassan and Ghani. Now a commitment under section 215, Criminal Procedure Code, can be quashed only on a point of law, and the question that arises is, whether the commitment is illegal.

In his order of committal, the City Magistrate states that "the reason why the charge under section 160 has been included is that the affray and the murder depend on the same facts." Now section 160, Indian Penal Code, is a section that provides for the punishment of persons guilty of an affray. It is a summons case, triable by the Magistrate, and the maximum punishment under the section is one month's imprisonment and Rs. 100 fine.

I am concerned with the case of Hassan and Ghani only against whom the charge is one under section 160. It does seem extraordinary that a trivial case of this description should be sent to the Sessions Court for trial.

Under section 28, Criminal Procedure Code, any offence under the Indian Penal Code, subject to the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code may be tried by the Court of Session. Chapter XXIV, Criminal Procedure Code, deals with the general provisions as to inquiries and trials, and section 347, which has its place in this Chapter, is as follows: "If in any inquiry before a Magistrate, or in any trial before a Magistrate before signing judgment, it appears to him at any stage of the proceedings that the case is one which ought to be tried by the Court of Session or High Court, and if he is empowered to commit for trial, he shall stop further proceedings and commit the accused under the provisions hereinbefore contained." The bare perusal of the section indicates how wide it is in its terms, and it appears to leave to the discretion of the Magistrate which cases he should commit to the Sessions Court. Of course, this discretion should not be exercised capriciously. "The law, no doubt, gives a discretion to Magistrates empowered to commit cases to the Sessions Court where a certain case calls for such committal, but the discretion being judicial must be exercised with case, and on some proper ground:" Emperor v. Mahamad Khan Rajakhan Pathan (1). Now is the power to commit a case to a Sessions Court restricted to such cases where the Magistrate finds that he is unable to inflict adequate penalty for the offence. This would seem to be the ratio decidendi in Diwanichand v. Emperor (2). In this case Crouch, A. J. C., held that "section 254, Criminal Procedure Code, in mandatory terms, imposes on the Magistrate the duty of trying any warrant-case which he is competent to try and which in his opinion can be adequately punished by him.... If a case is one which a Magistrate is both competent to try and can adequately punish, then apparently he has no discretion to commit it." It is to be noted that in this case no reference is made to the wide powers conferred by section 347, Criminal Procedure Code, on Magistrates with regard to committals to the Sessions. In my opinion the provisions of section 254, Criminal Procedure Code, do not override the provisions of section 347, Criminal Procedure Code. The former section provides for the framing of a charge against the accused person, and then the Chapter in which the section occurs deals with the procedure that is to be followed after the charge has been framed. With due deference to the learned Judge I cannot read into the section any such words as would curtail the wide powers given to Magistrates by section 347, Criminal Procedure Code, or limit the discretion only to such cases as the Magistrate cannot adequately punish. Cases have been committed to the Sessions Court which, although they were triable by the Magistrate and could be adequately punished by him, yet by reason of their connection with other cases pending in the Sessions Court were thought desirable to be tried by the latter Court. Where there were counter-charges of riot one of which resulted in homicide and the Magistrate committed both cases, although the charge under section 143, Indian Penal Code, was purely magisterial, the Allahabad High Court refused to quash the commitment as it was not illegal and the Magistrate's discretion ought not to be lightly interfered with. Cases may arise in which apart from the question of the inadequacy of punishment, it may be desirable to have them tried by a higher tribunal either by reason of their connection with cases which are exclusively triable by the Sessions Court, or by reason of their complicated character or for other good cause. Both in sections 207 and 347, Criminal Procedure Code, there occur the words with regard to the committal of cases to the Sessions Court, "which in the opinion of the Magistrate ought to be tried by such Court." If the powers of the Magistrates were intended to be restricted to cases which they could not adequately punish, then the Legislature would have said so in express terms. And if section 254, Criminal Procedure Code, is to be understood as empowering Magistrates to commit only in such cases as cannot be adequately punished by them, then it is difficult to understand the provisions of section 347, Criminal Procedure Code. It would be reducing it to a nullity, if it is to be overridden by section 254, Criminal Procedure Code. The law on this point has been recently discussed by a Bench of the Madras High Court in the case of the Crown Prosecutor v. Bhagavathi (3). The head-note* reads thus: "It is competent to a Magistrate empowered in that behalf to commit a case to the Court of Session even though he can himself impose the maximum sentence provided by law for the offence, if in his opinion the case is one which for other reasons ought to be tried by a Court of Session." The provisions of sections 254 and 347 have been discussed, particularly with reference to the argument that section 254 is exhaustive and that there is no power in a Magistrate to commit a case for trial where he is competent to try it and it can be adequately punished by him. With the reasoning in this judgment I am in entire concurrence and I am of opinion that a Magistrate's discretion to commit a case to the Sessions Court is not limited to cases where he cannot inflict an adequate penalty but there may be other good reasons which may, in the exercise of a sound and wise discretion, justify committal, and in such cases his discretion ought not be lightly interfered with.

It was argued that as the case under section 160 was a summons case, there was no provision in the Code to justify a committal to the Sessions of such a paltry case. Reference was made to a case decided by a single Judge in the Allahabad High Court in Emperor v. Dharam Singh (4). The head-note reads thus: "When a person was committed for trial to the Court of Session under sections 352 and 447, Indian Penal Code, by the Magistrate, it was held that the commitment should be quashed, first, because there is no warrant for such commitment, it being a summons case, and secondly, because the Magistrate can adequately punish the offender." There is no reference in this judgment to section 347, Criminal Procedure Code. The ground on which the learned Judge proceeded was that Chapter XX, which provides for the procedure to be followed in summons cases has no provision for the framing of a charge against the accused. Apart from the fact that section 347, Criminal Procedure Code, observes no distinction between summons and warrant cases, there is the important difference between the case cited and the present case, that the case under section 160 though a summons case is tacked on to a warrant case, and when a summons and a warrant case are being tried together the procedure to be followed is that prescribed for a warrant case. In the investigation of a complaint which forms the subject of two distinct charges arising out of the same transaction, one of which is a summons case and the other a warrant case, the procedure should be that prescribed for warrant cases: Rajnarain Koonwar v. Lala Tamoli Raut (5). To the same effect is Rallabandi Sobhanadri, In re (6).

Can it now be said that the Magistrate has exercised a wise discretion in this case by committing the two applicants for trial under a charge of section 160 only? According to the evidence on the record the alleged murder was preceded by an affray and it appears that in the course of the affray one man was mortally struck. It was undoubtedly one and the same transaction in which both the offences were committed and the evidence as to the murder will also be the evidence as to the affary. Though, therefore, it appears extraordinary and probably unprecedented that such a trivial case should be committed for trial to the Sessions Court, yet I cannot say that the Magistrate has exercised his discretion unwisely and according to my reading of the law, I cannot say that he has acted illegally. There being no error of law, I cannot quash the commitment.

I may add that in a recent case Fawcett, J. C., directed the committal to the Sessions Court of the two sons of Mahomed Hashim, though the charges against them were triable by the Magistrate, on the ground that it is "the usual rule, followed in cases where persons are jointly charged with committing offences in the same transaction of which one is a major offence exclusively triable by the Sessions Court and the other a minor offence in regard to which the Magistrate can exercise jurisdiction." It is obvious that the learned Judge was not of the opinion that the powers of Magistrates are restricted only to cases where an adequate penalty cannot be inflicted by them.

I dismiss the application.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 342—Examination of accused, absence of, effect of.

Section 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code is mandatory and the non-examination of the accused under this section is not merely an irregularity but an illegality which vitiates the trial. [p. 522, cols. 1 & 2.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Shahabad, dated the 12th April 1920, confirming that of the Sub Divisional Officer, Buxar, dated the 26th March 1920.

Mr. Gour Chandra Pal, for the Petitioners.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This is an application in revision by two persons Suraj Pandey and Basgit Pandey, who were both convicted under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code and were respectively sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 400 and six months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50. There was an appeal to the Additional Sessions Judge who has confirmed the convictions and sentences.

The facts of the prosecution case are shortly as follows:—

One Ram Charitar Tewari lost his wife and wished to re-marry. He spoke of this wish to his relations and other people of the village, among whom Sukhdeo Tewari was one. Suraj and Basgit are brothers and Sukhdeo Tewari is the brother-in law of Suraj Pandey. Sukhdeo Tewari told the complainant Ram Charitar that he had arranged his marriage with a Brahmin girl and that the marriage could be settled if Ram Charitar agreed to pay Rs. 500. Shortly afterwards Sukhdeo came to him with Suraj Pandey, Basgit Pandey and Harsewak Pandey and Suraj told the complainant that they had come to settle the matter. Suraj also said that the girl was Harsewak's sister and negotiations began. Eventually it was settled that Ram Charitar was to pay Rs. 470. Suraj demanded half the amount at once and the complainant agreed to pay the sum specified to Suraj. They then all went away. A day shortly afterwards was fixed for the marriage and the complainant, Sukhdeo, Suraj, Basgit Harsewak and three other persons went to Suraj Pandey's house. Ram Charitar paid the balance of the money and the marriage took place. There was no auspicious day for the consummation of the marriage for about a month; and when eventually Ram Charitar had connection with his wife he had reason to suspect that she was pregnant. He also suspected that she was a widow and questioned her. She confessed that she was pregnant but she denied that she was a widow. He made enquiries, however, and discovered that she was a widow. He then instituted this case, which has resulted in the conviction of the two petitioners.

The first point urged before us is that the trial of Suraj is bad because he was not examined under section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It is quite clear that he was not examined, and it has been recently held by this Court in Criminal Appeal No. 3 of 1920 [Roghu Bhumij v. Emperor (1)] that section 342 is mandatory and that the non-examination of the accused under this section is not merely an irregularity but an illegality which vitiates the trial. This being so, the conviction of Suraj must be set aside.

With regard to the other petitioner, Basgit, the contention is that there is no evidence that he took any part in the transaction beyond being present. That this is so is perfectly clear from the judgments of both the trial Court and the Appellate Court; and why he has been convicted it is impossible to say.

I would accordingly set aside the conviction and sentence of Basgit Pandey. The fine, if paid, must be refunded. I would also set aside the conviction and sentence passed on Suraj Pandey and remand the case so far as he is concerned for re-trial.

ADAMI, J.—I agree.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 234, applicability of—Joint trial of two accused for distinct offences, legality of.

Section 234 of the Criminal Procedure Code only applies to the trial of a single person for separate offences of the same kind, and not to cases in which more persons than one are tried jointly. [p. 523, col. 1.]

Mr. L. Pillay, for the Applicants.

JUDGMENT.—This case has been tried in a slovenly manner. Two trials have been amalgamated quite unjustifiably. San Pa was involved in each but Po Sein was only involved in one.

The offences were entirely distinct transactions.

San Pa was charged with receiving a gratification for the recovery of stolen cattle belonging to different owners on different occasions under section 215.

Po Sein was charged in connection with the second offence under section 215 only.

DIN DAYAL SINGH v. EMPEROR.

Both accused were convicted under section 379, the first of two offences and the second of one, although neither had been charged under section 379.

I am of opinion that on the record the convictions were not justified as neither accused was called upon to answer a charge of theft.

As regards the first transaction there was evidence to justify a conviction under section 215, but as regards the second there was no independent evidence and the conviction is on the merits difficult to justify.

* * * *

Apart from the merits of the case it is clear that the joint trial was illegal. Section 234 only applies to the trial of a single person for separate offences of the same kind and not to cases in which more persons than one are tried jointly.

Budhai Sheik v. Emperor (1) is one of the many authorities for this view.

In this case not only have two accused been tried together but one of them is not concerned with the first offence for which the other has been tried and convicted.

The conviction and sentences are set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 526—Application for transfer—Summons case—Magistrate arresting accused prior to inquiry—Reasonable grounds for suspicion against impartial trial.

A District Magistrate, acting on a verbal statement made to him in his Chambers against the accused, a Sub-Inspector of Police, of having demanded a bribe, forthwith arrested him and directed an inquiry under section 202, Criminal Procedure Code by the Deputy Superintendent of Police. On receipt of the report of the Deputy Superintendent the District Magistrate transferred the case to a Deputy Magistrate for trial under section 161, Penal Code. The accused, having some difficulty in obtaining copies and apprehending that he would not have an impartial trial in the district, applied for transfer of the case to another district:

Held, that the application must succeed; that the offence imputed to the accused being one in which a summons only should issue in the first instance, the District Magistrate had no jurisdiction to arrest him and that the circumstances of the case afforded reasonable ground for the accused entertaining a suspicion that his trial would not be impartial. Application for transfer of the case pending in the Court of the Deputy Magistrate, Monghyr.

Messrs. K. B. Dutt, P. C. Rai and S. N. Rai, for the Petitioner.

Mr. S. A. A. Asghar, Officiating Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for the transfer of a criminal case, pending in the District of Monghyr.

The petitioner is a Sub-Inspector of Thana Lakhisarai in the District of Monghyr. The complainant, Mr. Carroll, is the Circle Officer of the Khaira estate. There has been some trouble with the tenants of that estate for some time. Mr. Carroll went to the District Magistrate in his Chamber on the 1st of May in the morning about 9 A. M. and made certain verbal complaints against the Sub-Inspector of having demanded a bribe from him for settling his dispute with the tenants: in other words, for the purpose of subduing the tenants by such means as the Sub-Inspector thought necessary.

The District Magistrate at once sent for the Sub Inspector, who was then attending a case in his charge in the Court of another Magistrate, Mr. Sheo Nandan Prasad Singh, and then recorded the statement of Mr. Carroll on oath. The District Magistrate then passed the following order:—

"Statement of complainant recorded in presence of the accused. It discloses a prima facie case under section 161, Indian Penal Code, against the accused. I direct full enquiry to be made into the complaint by Deputy Superintendent Police, Mr. Porteous, and a report to be submitted by 15th May 1920. The accused being present is placed under arrest and is released on bail of Rs. 500, in one surety of that amount."

There were some difficulties about the petitioner obtaining copies of the evidence collected and the report submitted by Mr. Porteous. We are not at all now concerned with that portion of the case.

The case was ultimately transferred to the file of Mr. Banke Behary Singh, Deputy Magistrate, who had just then joined the district. The petitioner had some difficulty with that Magistrate also in respect of obtaining copies of the necessary papers. He took time in order to move this Court for the transfer of the case, and has now done so.

The District Magistrate has shown cause, which is supported by the learned Government Advocate. I have no hesitation in accepting the assurance given by the District Magistrate that he treated the petitioner "with scrupulous fairness all through," nor have I to say anything against the Deputy Magistrate, Mr. Bankey Behari Singh, who has now been entrusted with the trial of the petitioner; probably, as observed by the District Magistrate, he, having newly come to the District, has no prepossession about the dispute, which led to the case.

On the other hand, I cannot disregard the circumstances surrounding the case which, to my mind, might raise a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the accused that he will not obtain a fair trial in his case in the District of Monghyr.

The first and the foremost ground is the unwarrantable procedure adopted by the District Magistrate in arresting the accused forthwith upon the statement of Mr. Carroll, when as the District Magistrate himself says, "it was not clear.....whether there was sufficient evidence to justify trial of the accused; enquiry was accordingly ordered under section 202 of the Code of Criminal Procedure." The Magistrate had no jurisdiction to deal with the accused, unless and until he was, upon the enquiry held by Mr. Porteous, satisfied that a process should issue against the accused. So, before the report of Mr. Porteous was received and duly considered by the Magistrate, he had no jurisdiction to arrest the accused. The powers of arrest to a Magistrate are given by sections 64 and 65 of the Code. The former has obviously no application, for the offence was not committed in the persence of the Magistrate. The latter has no application, because the Magistrate at that time was not competent to issue a warrant. As a matter of fact, the Magistrate, even if he was satisfied that the accused should be placed upon trial and that process should issue, was only competent to issue summons against the accused in the first instance. An offence under section 161, Indian Penal Code, of which the accused has been charged, is shown in column 4 of the schedule to be one, in which the Magistrate can issue a summons only in the first instance. Whatever good motive the Magistrate might have in the interest of justice to arrest the accused, he acted without jurisdiction. The fact that the accused was actually before the District Magistrate having been called by him, so that he might know "what charge was being made" against him, nor the fact that the District Magistrate thought that there was a prima facie case against the accused, did give him any right to arrest the accused in contravention of the Code, unless the District Magistrate had actually upon the complaint of Mr. Carroll directed that the accused be put on his trial without any further enquiry: vide sections 200 to 204. As a matter of fact, had the accused not been a Sub-Inspector under the District Magistrate, the District Magistrate would have had no jurisdiction to call the accused, unless the District Magistrate had decided to issue process against him, either upon the complaint of Mr. Carroll, or upon the report of Mr. Porteous. The Sub-Inspector might very well think that an advantage was taken of his subordination to the District Magistrate and that the District Magistrate was prejudiced against him. Again an ordinary man would not have dared to go to the District Magistrate in his Chamber and talk to him of the case, and as a matter of fact Mr. Carroll himself said that he went there only with a view to take the advice of the District Magistrate and to lay a trap for the Sub-Inspector. Ordinarily, a complaint is not lodged before the District Magistrate. The unusual incidents in the case whereby the District Magistrate took cognizance of the offence might have aggravated the accused's suspicion of prejudice being in the mind of the Magistrate against him. The suspicion may or may not be correct, all that is necessary is that there must be reasonable ground for suspicion and the aforesaid grounds are sufficient for the purpose. It has been in several cases held that when an unusual amount of bail is demanded, the accused is entitled to reasonably suspect prejudice against him and to ask for a transfer. The present case is a stronger one.

The grievance of the accused is against the Head of the District. His faith in the Subordinate Magistrate has also, therefore, been shaken.

Therefore, whether the District Magistrate in his mind was fairly inclined towards the accused is immaterial. It is equally immaterial that Mr. Banke Behary Singh, who is now in charge of the case, has no prejudice against the accused.

The third circumstance is that almost all the Magistrates, with a few exceptions, may probably figure in this case as witnesses, either for the prosecution or for the defence. The evidence recorded by Mr. Porteous and the report submitted by him clearly show this. Mr. Mirza, the Sub-Divisional Officer of Jamui, is a necessary witness; so are Mr. Majid and Mr. Sheonandan Prasad Sinha.

The original report of Mr. Porteous, being the result of an enquiry under section 202 of the Code, is not a Police paper and should have been placed on the record. It is, however, reported by the District Magistrate to be missing.

I need not refer to the case of the accused so far as it is disclosed at present. His case is that he has been the victim of a conspiracy among certain persons in the Monghyr District, and he suspects Mr. Carroll on account of the attitude taken by the Police and the accused Sub-Inspector in the cases against the tenants of the Khaira estate. He, therefore, suspects that he will not have a fair trial of his case in the District. If there is any case, in which a transfer is necessitated, this is one. Some of the aforesaid grounds may not be deemed to be good grounds in themselves, but the cumulative effect of them and the circumstances of the case are sufficient to entitle the accused to have his case tried in another district. The report of the Magistrate, the enquiry held by Mr. Porteous and the orders passed on different dates are ample justification for the order, which I now make in the case, that the case be transferred from the District of Monghyr to Patna, as is suggested by the District Magistrate himself in case of the transfer of the case being ordered.

The case is accordingly transferred to the District Magistrate of Patna, who will have it tried by a competent Magistrate under him.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 350 OF 1919.

July 30, 1919.

PO YA—APPELLANT

versus

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 34, 111—Applicability of s. 34—Act committed different from act abetted—Abettor, liability of.

Where a person instigates another to strike a particular person, and an altogether different person who happens to be close by at the time is struck, the instigator cannot be held responsible, and section 34 of the Penal Code would not apply to the case because the act abetted was different from the act done. [p. 527, col. 1.]

Mr. Thein Maung, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.

TWOMEY, C. J.—The appellant Nga Po Ya has been convicted of murder and sentenced to death. He has also been found guilty of an offence under section 326, Indian Penal Code, voluntarily causing grievous hurt with a dangerous weapon, and for that offence he has been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for five years. Between 10 and 11 A. M. on the 27th December last, according to the prosecution case, Maung Lu Pe, headman of Letpan village in Thayetmyo District, was driving a borrowed bullock cart—an open cart—back to Letpan from another village, Yalin, about a mile to the south, when he was held up and assaulted by two men, one armed with a da and the other with a solid bamboo stick about six feet long. The man with the da was in front and he stopped the cart. The man with the stick at a signal from the man in front struck at Lu Pe from behind, but the blow hit him only on the side of the head and the main force of the blow fell on the head of a little boy of eight named Po Myit, son of the owner of the cart, who was sitting beside Lu Pe or behind him on the cart, and the blow fractured Po Myit's skull. Then the man in front, who is alleged to have been the appellant Po Ya, came to the side of the cart and slashed Lu Pe with his da, causing two severe incised wounds on the forehead. Lu Pe was again struck by the other man and fell out of the cart. Then the assailants ran away. Po Myit died about 8 P. M., the cause of death being compression of the brain substance resulting from the fracture. Lu Pe was in hospital for nineteen days. The injuries to his forehead have left permanent scars, which presumbly are sufficient to cause some disfigurement.

Po Ya and Ba Tin, both residents of Lu Pe's village Letpan, were tried jointly for this crime. Ba Tin succeeded in establishing an alibi, and the learned Sessions Judge did not feel sure that Lu Pe had not gone beyond the evidence of his senses in denouncing Ba Tin as the man with a bamboo stick who struck from behind the cart. Ba Tin was, therefore, acquitted. The learned Sessions Judge held, however, that Po Ya's participation in the crime was proved beyond doubt, that the common intention of the two men was to kill the village headman, and therefore, applying sections 34 and 301, Indian Penal Code, he found Po Ya guilty of murder, although he had not actually struck the fatal blow and although the person killed was not the person whom Po Ya's confederate intended to kill.

* * * *

There can be no doubt that Lu Pe was attacked on his way from Yalin to Letpan and I think we must find that he saw at least one of his assailants. If that assailant was a person unkown to him, he had no reason for falsely denouncing Po Ya. Nor, as already noted, is their any reason to believe that he could have mistaken another man for Po Ya, seeing that Po Ya is a man who lives in his own village and is intimately known to him. I would, therefore, accept the Sessions Judge's finding that Po Ya took part in the assault.

We have next to consider what offence he committed. It appears to me that there are no sufficient grounds for rejecting Lu Pe's statements that it was Po Ya who inflicted the wounds on Lu Pe's forehead with a da and that the injury to the child Po Myit's head was caused by a blow with a stick delivered by the other assailant. But I think the learned Sessions Judge has erred in holding that there was a common intention on the part of the two assailants to kill Lu Pe. The reason given for this assumption is that Po Ya, who was well known to the village headman, could not escape punishment without killing the village headman. If this reasoning were correct, it would follow that anyone assaulting another man who knows him should be credited with the intention of causing his death It is hardly necessary to point out that there are several ways of escaping punishment without proceeding to the extremity of killing off the man who is attacked. For example, the assailant may contrive to evade arrest as Po Ya in fact did in this case for a long time, or he may rely on suborning false evidence to prove an alibi. I think it is clear from the injuries actually inflicted by Po Ya that he had no intention of killing Lu Pe and the two assailants cannot be assumed to have had any more heinous intention than that of causing grievous hurt.

But in my opinion section 34, Indian Penal Code, cannot be applied in this case at all in relation to the killing of the boy, Po Myit. When Po Ya's confederate struck the blow which fractured the child's skull Po Ya himself, according to Lu Pe's account, had done nothing beyond instigating his confederate to strike Lu Pe. Thus at this stage Po Ya was only in the position of an abettor and it is as an abettor that we should regard him in considering his responsibility for his confederate's act in killing the boy. There was a subsequent stage in which Po Ya joined in and cut Lu Pe with his da while his confederate struck him again with the stick. The provisions of section 34 would begin to operate then, for it was only then that there was an act or series of acts done by more than one person with a common intention. But as regards the earlier stage, when the boy Po Myit was struck on the head, the case appears to be that contemplated in section 111, Indian Penal Code, where an act is abetted and a different act is done. Po Ya undoubtedly abetted his confederate's attack on Lu Pe but he could be held liable for the injury caused to Po Myit only, if the act which caused the injury was a probable consequence of the abetment. And it is clear that it was not. If I instigate A to strike B, it is by no means a probable consequence that A will strike somebody else who happens to be close by at the time. Po Ya can, therefore, be held liable only for what he and his confederate did to Lu Pe in pursuance of their common intention of causing grievous hurt to him. As a matter of fact Po Ya's confederate did not cause grievous hurt to Lu Pe, but Po Ya himself did.

I would set aside the conviction and sentence for murder and direct the acquittal of appellant on this charge. I would not interfere with the conviction under section 326, Indian Penal Code. The outrage on the village headman was a very serious offence and deserves severe punishment, but as Lu Pe was not dangerously wounded, I think that a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for three years would be sufficient and I would, therefore, reduce the sentence of five years' rigorous imprisonment to one of three years' rigorous imprisonment.

MAUNG KIN, J.— I concur.

Private defence, right of, alternative plea of, whether admissible—Penal Code Act XLV of 1860), s. 97.

It is open to an accused person to plead the right of private defence either specifically, or as an alternative defence. [p. 528, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Sessions Judge, Darbhanga, dated the 25th June 1919, dismissing the appeal of the petitioner from the order, dated the 31st May 1919. of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Madhubani, convicting the petitioner under 326, Indian Penal Code.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of the Sessions Judge of Darbhanga:—

"The whole of the appeal has been argued on the plea that the accused had the right of private defence. This plea is obviously entirely erroneous. The onus of proving that the right of private defence existed lies upon the person making that plea, that is to say, upon the accused, and since the accused deny that they caused the injuries which are the subject of this case, it could hardly be said that they have discharged the onus. In other words, it is now established law that if the right of private defence is to be raised, it must be raised by the accused specifically and not as an alternative defence. They cannot at the same time deny that they caused the injuries and that they were entitled to cause them and when the accused themselves have denied causing the injuries, it is not open to their Pleader to go behind that and plead, even if they did cause them, they had justification. This disposes of all the arguments raised before me and I accordingly dismiss the appeal and uphold the conviction and sentences."

ORDER OF REFERENCE.

DAS, J.—This application raises an interesting point which has not yet been decided by this Court, namely, whether the right of private defence must be raised by the accused specifically. There are decisions of other High Courts both ways. In my opinion this matter ought to be decided by a Bench. I accordingly direct that this application be placed before a Division Bench on re opening of the Court.

Mr. Lakshmi Kant Jha, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Manohar Lal, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has been dismissed by the learned Sessions Judge of Darbhanga on the ground that it is now established law that if the right of private defence is to be raised, it must be raised by the accused specifically and not as an alternative defence. He says: "They cannot at the same time deny that they caused the injuries and that they were entitled to cause them and when the accused themselves have denied causing the injuries, it is not open to their Pleader to go behind that and plead, even if they did cause them, they had justification."

The view of the law taken by the learned Sessions Judge is clearly wrong. The latest decisions on the point are Emperor v. Upendra Nath Das (1), Afiruddi Chakdar v. Emperor (2) and Yusuf Husain v. Emperor (3).

The decision of the Sessions Judge is set aside and the appeal is remanded to him for re-hearing.

Material defect, within the meaning of clause (1) of section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act, includes defect of title and when such a defect is not disclosed to the buyer and it is such that he could not with ordinary care discover it, the vendor will be deemed to be guilty of fraud and the vendee would be entitled to damages in the shape of refund of the purchase-money. [p. 530, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Shahabad, dated the 7th May 1919, modifying the decision of the Munsif, Saseram, dated the 27th February 1918.

Mr. Seo Saran Lal, for the Appellants.

Mr. Kulwant Sahay, for the minor Defendants-Respondents Nos. 5 and 6.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiffs to recover the consideration money of a sale-deed, dated the 28th October 1913, executed by defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and 7 in favour of the plaintiffs and in the alternative for recovery of possession of the property conveyed.

By the sale-deed in question, the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and 7 sold to the plaintiffs 1-anna 4 pies rahan right (an usufructuary mortgage) in Mouza Ram agar Dumaria. The plaintiffs got possession of the property but were subsequently dispossessed in Jaith 1321 F. S. by the defendants.

The rahan stood in the name of Lakshman, who had three brothers. Partap, Ropan and Mohar. The defendants Nos. 1 to 4 are the descendants of Partap; defendants Nos. 5 to 6 are the descendants of Mohar; defendants Nos. 8 to 10 are the descendants of Lakshman and defendants Nos. 11 to 13 are the descendants of Rupan. The rahan was in respect of 4-annas of the milkiyat right in the aforesaid Mouza belonging to Hira Lal, Jawahir Lal and Moti Lal. We are not in this case concerned with the defendants Nos. 8 to 13. The defendant No. 7 is the mother of defendants Nos. 5 and 6

The Courts below have held that defendants Nos. 1 to 4 were separate from defendants Nos. 5 and 6 in every respect and that in the 1-anna 4 pies of the rahan interest sold to the plaintiffs the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 had a moiety and the rest belonged to defendants Nos 5 and 6. In the sale-deed it is not stated in what capacity the defendant No. 7 executed the document, but in the plaint, paragraph 3, it is stated that she purported to join in the sale as guardian of the minor defendants Nos. 5 and 6. This is correct, for she has undoubtedly no interest of her own. The evidence of the defendants also indicates the same thing that the mother became a party to the documents as she was guardian of the defendants Nos. 5 and 6.

The plaintiffs' case is that they purchased the interest of defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and 5 and 6 represented by their mother as guardian. The defendants contested the case of the plaintiffs that the defendants Nos. 5 and 6 were joint with defendants Nos. 1 to 4, or that the mother had any right to convey the property, or that there was any necessity for the sale thereof.

Upon the pleadings issue No. 3 was raised before the Munsif—"Had the mother of the defendants Nos 5 and 6 any authority to execute the sale deed or any (other) deed of transfer?" This issue was answered in the negative against the plaintiffs and it was held that the deed was executed without any authority or any necessity so as to bind the minor defendants Nos. 5 and 6 and was accordingly invalid so far as their interest in the property was concerned. Hence the plaintiffs were held not entitled to recover possession of the shares of the defendants Nos. 5 and 6 and the defendant No. 7 had no interest for her own in the property to convey.

The defendants Nos. 1 to 4 did not contest the right of the plaintiffs to the possession of their 8 pies share in the property. The Munsif accordingly decreed the plaintiffs' suit for recovery of possession of the 8 pies rahan interest of defendants Nos. 1 to 4, and with respect to the other shares the Munsif refused the prayer for possession but awarded refund of the consideration money to the extent of the interest of defendants Nos. 5 and 6, namely, Rs. 300. The decree passed by the Munsif was against all the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and 7 jointly as being the executants of the bond and as having "jointly contracted to sell the entire rahan property without any specification of their shares in it".

The defendants Nos. 1 to 4 appealed and the Subordinate Judge set aside the decree against them so far as it directed the refund of Rs. 300 to the plaintiffs. Against this decree of the Subordinate Judge the plaintiffs have appealed to this Court. The defendant No. 7, the mother of defendants Nos. 5 and 6, has not appealed and the decree against her has become absolute.

Mr. Shiva Saran Lal, on behalf of the appellants, has contended that the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 were liable for the money inasmuch as upon the sale-deed in question they must be deemed to have contracted to convey good title in the property in question to the plaintiffs and as it subsequently transpired that the executants of the bond had no title to the moiety of the property sold, namely, 8 pies of the rahan interest which was within their knowledge and which they were bound to disclose to the plaintiffs, they are liable to refund the consideration money to the plaintiffs. Reliance has been placed upon section 55, clauses (1) (a), (2) and the last clause. There is no dispute as to the principle underlying the aforesaid provisions in the Transfer of Property Act; it is now settled by authorities that 'material defect' in clause (1) of section 55 includes defect of title and when such a defect is not disclosed to the buyer and which he could not with ordinary care discover, the vendor will be deemed to be guilty of fraud and the vendee would be entitled to damages in the shape of refund of the purchase-money. Various authorities have been cited on this point, but as stated above I accept the proposition and there is, therefore, no necessity of entering into any discussion of those cases. Suffice it to say, that all of them have been discussed elaborately in the case of Haji Essa Sulleman v. Dayabhai Parmanandas (1). Reference in that case has been made to a decision of the Madras High Court in the case of Gajapathi v. Alagia (2), which seems to me to illustrate the doctrine precisely and lucidly. The principle appears to be that the vedor is bound to compensate for a fraudulent concealment of a defect in the title or of any incumbrance. This principle is an exception to the doctrine of caveat emptor which charges the vendee with the knowledge of the soundness of the title of the property purchased by him and demands from him an intelligent enquiry and investigation into the defect of the title of the vendor and prevents him from pleading that he was not aware of any defect in the title of his vendor. Consequently, a vendor or his agent suppressing an incumbrance or a defect in the title is guilty of fraud and the purchaser may either bring an action for refund of the purchase-money or other equitable relief.

The question in this case, therefore, is whether the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 concealed from the plaintiffs the defect in title to the property in question. The document clearly states that the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and 7 sold their 1-anna 4-pies share in the property. The vendees must, therefore, have known that all these persons had some interest in the property and the reason of having defendant No. 7 to join in the execution of the document was obviously to include in the sale the shares of her minor sons, defendants No. 5 and 6. There is not a word in the document indicating that the vendors or the minors, defendants Nos. 5 and 6, were joint in mess and property and formed members of a joint Mitakshara family, nor is there any indication that the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 purported to act in the execution of the document as guardian of defendants Nos. 5 and 6. It is not the case of anybody that the defendant No. 7 had any interest in the property of her own. She was made an executant simply because she was the guardian of the defendants Nos. 5 and 6. This has been clearly stated in the plaint. Therefore, the plaintiffs knew that they were purchasing the interest of defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and of 5 and 6 represented by their mother defendant No. 7 and that all these defendants had interest in the property. Their shares have not been specified in the sale-deed. It has, however, been found by the Courts below that defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and 5 and 6 had equal shares in the property. Therefore, there being no specification under section 47 of the Transfer of Property Act, the sale as among the transferors will take effect as to their respective equal shares in the property: in other words, defendants Nos. 1 to 4 would be deemed to have sold half of the property 8 pies and the defendant No. 7 on behalf of defendants Nos. 5 and 6 the other half. Although there is no specification of the shares, the plaintiffs purchased 8 pies of defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and 8 pies of defendants Nos. 5 and 6 from defendant No. 7.

(1) 20 B. 522; Chitty's S. C. C. R. 460; 10 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 913.

(2) 9 M. 89; 9 Ind. Jur. 419; 3 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 459.

There is no dispute that there is no defect in the title of the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 as to their 8 pies in the property. They never conveyed more than that and they are not liable for the refund of the consideration-money. The consideration-money was Rs. 600. Here also there is no specification as to what proportion of it was for the interest of the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 and what for the interest of defendant Nos. 7 or of 5 and 6. Section 46 again will make them entitled to equal shares in the consideration money, that is, the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 will be deemed to have sold their property for Rs. 300 and the defendant No. 7 the other half for the remaining Rs. 300.

The sale as regards the 8 pies share of defendants Nos. 5 and 6 conveyed by defendant No. 7 has failed and consequently the consideration of Rs. 300 with respect to that share has to be refunded. The defendants Nos. 5 and 6 never joined in the document, nor was the sale as held by the Court below, for their benefit. Therefore, defendant No. 7, who executed the sale-deed, is only liable for that amount.

There is no promise by the defendants in the sale-deed itself, as held by the Court below, to repay the consideration money in case of dispossession. The defendants Nos. 1 to 4 cannot, therefore, be made liable under any special covenant in the deed and as shown above they are not liable under any legal or equitable principle. The defendant No. 7 only is liable.

The result is that the view taken by the Court below is correct and the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 are not liable for the claim of the plaintiffs for the refund of Rs. 300. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs to defendants Nos. 1 to 4.

Insolvency—One application for several debtors to be adjudicated insolvents, whether permissible—Procedure.

Where it is sought to obtain an order adjudicating several debtors insolvents, there must be a separate application in respect of each debtor, even though the several debtors are members of a Hindu joint family. [p. 534, col. 2.]

Appeals against the orders of the District Judge, Dacca, dated the 22nd August and the 13th September 1917, respectively.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babus Upendra Lal Roy and Kunja Lal Das, for the Appellant.—This appeal arises out of a suit instituted by the petitioner for adjudging seven persons who were members of a Hindu joint family insolvents, by a single petition. The learned Judge held that seven applications should be made as seven persons were sought to be adjudged insolvents. The first application was made on 4th January 1917, under the order of the learned Judge six more applications were made on 8th September 1917.

The learned Judge was wrong in holding that no joint application could be made. Refers to section 33 sub-clause (4) of the Provincial Insolvency Act. It is a partnership business. What the petitioner asked for was to declare these persons as insolvent. Refers to section 243. These provisions are taken from the Bankruptcy Act. In that Act it has been held that a joint application will lie. Reads Halsbury's Laws of England, volume II, page 12, paragraph 17. A jont application may be made but the adjudication must be made not against the firm but against each member of the firm. Reads William's Bankruptcy Practice at page 187.

[COURT.—What is the Indian Law? Reads section 8 of the Provincial Insolvency Act.]

There the petitions are by different persons but against the joint debtors. A joint application can be made against the members of a family.

[COURT.—Have you consulted the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act?]

No, my Lord.

Relies on section 33 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. Refers to section 6, clause 6 of the Act. Section 33 lays down provision for the payments of the debts of a firm which has been declared insolvent. If the Legislature had intended to exclude from the purview of this Act all firms then separate provisions would have been made. Refers to section 40 of the English Act at page 182. The provisions of section 33 are taken from the English Act. The application made on the 8th September 1917 was in continuation of the application made on the 4th January 1917.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak and Babu Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta, for the Respondents:—After the order of the learned District Judge my learned friend is not competent to raise this objection. Refers to section 11 sub-section (d) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. There is no corresponding section in the Provincial Insolvency Act. Refers to the English Law as stated in section 115 of the English Bankruptcy Act. The English Law nor the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act will help to decide the present point. There is a case reported in Sarada Prasad Ukil v. Ram Sukh Chandra(1). In this case it is not a case against the firm but against certain persons. In the Provincial Insolvency Act there is no provision for proceedings against the firms. But in the English Law as well as in the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act there are provisions for proceedings against a firm. The present application is not competent. The Provincial Insolvency Act is a special Act and the present case must be governed by that Act. Section 33, clause 4, does not deal with a proceeding against the firm. Upon that the appellants filed seven petitions each praying for seven persons to be declared insolvents. No question of partnership was raised before the 8th September. The proceedings were against them as members of a Hindu joint family. Refers to section 107 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. There is a similar provision in the English Law. But there is no such provision in the Provincial Insolvency Act. See section 23 of the English Act. Section 6 of the Provincial Insolvency Act will not be of much assistance to my learned friend. My learned friend argues that the order of the 2nd August is not final. In that he is not correct. The learned Judge held that the applications were incompetent. It is not an application for an amendment. The learned Judge was quite right in this view of the law.

Babu Upendra Lal Roy in reply:—The question whether one application would be sufficient or seven separate applications should have been made was decided by the order of 22nd August 1917. The learned Judge directed that seven separate applications should be made. On the 5th September seven applications were made against all the debtors. He said it was incompetent. Then the question of limitation would not arise. My learned friend has relied upon the Full Bench case reported in Kalimuddin Mollah v. Sahibuddin Mollah (2). The question there was whether section 14 of the Limitation Act was applicable or not and besides that there was the question of registration. But nothing is said about the Insolvency Act. The Madras case is in point and it is a Full Bench case. There is another case reported in Dropadi v. Hira Lal (3). This case takes a contrary view. Refers to Kopparthi Lingayya v. Araveti Chinnarayana (4). The Full Bench case in Kalimud- din Mollah v. Sahibuddin Mollah (2) is not in point.

The Provincial Insolvency Act does prohibit the presentation of one application against joint members. It does not prohibit application against a firm. The application made against the joint members ought to be held valid. My learned friend has relied upon the case in Sarada Prasad Ukil v. Ram Sukh Chandra (1). The Civil Procedure Code is not applicable. The present case should be governed by the Insolvency Act. Section 33, clause 4, applies to the present case. Refers to it. There is no restriction in the Act. Refers also to section 8 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. This section read with section 33, clause 4, allows an application against joint debtors. My learned friend on the opposite side is not correct in saying that according to the Provincial Insolvency Act, the Legislature does not contemplate an application against a firm. An application against a firm is not against the firm but against the individual members of the firm. The English Act is very clear on the point. Reads William's Bankruptcy Act at page 520 rule 264. The debts were contracted for carrying on the business of the firm. Refers to Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume II, page 12, paragraph 17. If your Lordships hold that this is not an application against a firm then it is an application made against certain persons of the joint family.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals arise out of proceedings under the Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907).

The appellants before us applied to the Court below for adjudging seven persons, who were members of Hindu joint family, insolvents by one single petition. The learned District Judge on the 22nd August 1917 held that seven applications must be made as seven different persons were sought to be declared insolvents. In pursuance of that order, on the 8th September 1917, six more applications were made, each praying to have seven persons declared insovlent. The learned District Judge thereupon pointed out that this was bad and that there must be a separate petition regarding each person. On the 12th September 1917, six other petitions were filed. On the next day, 13th September, these six petitions and a petition for amendment of the original application were heard. The learned District Judge was of opinion that a declaration of insolvency could not be asked for in one petition for or against more than one person, and that the objection to a joint application by joint debtors which was pointed out in the case of Sarada Prasad Ukil v. Ram Sukh Chandra (1) applied to an application made against several joint debtors, and pointed out that the creditors of each individual must have notice, and the claim of each creditor against each debtor must be investigated. The learned Judge accordingly held that a single application against seven debtors could not be maintained and he allowed the original application to be amended by striking out six names from it, but as regards the six new applications, he held that they could have effect from the date on which they were filed and not from the date of the original application, the result being that as against the six debtors the petitions were filed too late to give the petitioner the benefit of section 37 of the Act.

The petitioner has appealed to this Court and the first ground taken is that an application can be maintained against several debtors jointly.

We think that the reasons given in the case of Sarada Prasad Ukil v. Ram Sukh Chandra (1) (though that case was decided under Chapter XX of the Civil Procedure Code) apply to an application made against several debtors who are jointly liable.

The next contention is that an application can be made against several partners as a firm, and that, therefore, the original application was valid.

There is, no doubt, provision in the English Bankruptcy Act that any two or more persons being partners or any person carrying on business under a partnership name may take proceedings or be proceeded against under this Act in the name of the firm (section 119 of the English Bankruptcy Act). There is a similar provision in the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (see section 9). There is, however, no such provision in the Provincial Insolvency Act. But it is unnecessary to consider the question in the present case, because even if partners can be proceeded against in the name of the firm under the Provincial Insolvency Act, the respondents were not proceeded against as partners or as a firm. In the application for insolvency, these respondents were described as having inherited a sweetmeat shop from their father and as holding it as a joint family property, and it was prayed that the said debtors might be adjudged insolvents. In the subsequent petition filed on the 8th September 1917, it was stated that "as the debtors are seven brothers and as they contracted the debts and caused insolvency proceedings to be taken while living as members of a Hindu joint family, so all of them are jointly and severally liable to the creditors for their dues". It appears, therefore, that throughout the proceedings these respondents were treated not as partners or as members of a firm but as members of a Hindu joint family. In these circumstances, we think that one joint application against them all could not be maintained.

It is contended that it is a question merely of amendment. But so far as the original application could be amended by striking out the names of six other persons and retaining the name of one, it has been allowed by the learned District Judge. The six other applications were not applications for amendment of the original application but six different applications against each of those persons and we are unable to hold in these circumstances that the District Judge was wrong in taking the view that these six applications could not be treated as having been filed on the 4th January, the date of the original application.

The appeals are accordingly dismissed with costs—two gold mohurs in all to be paid to respondent Hari Mohan Basak. In Miscellaneous Appeal No. 396, we assess the hearing fee at one gold mohur and in the other six cases (Miscellaneous Appeals Nos. 407 to 412) we allow one gold mohur as costs to be equally divided.

Appeals dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit instituted by the plaintiffs for a declaration that they had a right of pre-emption in respect of a residential house and certain mokarrari land sold to defendant No. 1 by the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 under a sale-deed dated the 30th August 1916. The plaintiffs based their claim in respect of these properties on the ground that they have an ancestral house near the homestead and also land contiguous to the mokarrari land. Defendant No. 1 who is the purchaser contested the suit firstly, on the ground that the suit was not maintainable and secondly, that the plaintiff No. 1 did not perform the ceremonies of pre-emption, and thirdly, that the plaintiffs had no right of pre-emption. The trial Court held that the necessary ceremonies were performed and that the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree in accordance with Order XX, rule 14, Code of Civil Procedure. An appeal having been preferred by the defendant No. 1, the purchaser, the Officiating District Judge held that the suit was not maintainable inasmuch as the right of pre-emption did not extend to mokarrari land and to the house which stood on it and that the right arose only where the property sought to be pre-empted was sold, and accordingly decreed the appeal and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. The plaintiffs have, therefore, filed this appeal against the decision of the learned District Judge.

The first ground that has been urged by the learned Vakil for the appellants is that so far as the land was concerned what was sold was in fact the proprietary interest and not the mokarrari interest. He founds this submission on the ground that the rent reserved in the title-deed of the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 was only Re. 1 which was equivalent to the Government demand. This argument is, however, unacceptable. To begin with, this argument is not available to the learned Vakil in the face of the clear statement in paragraph 2 of the plaint that the interest sold was mokarrari interest in the land. Apart from that, the sale-deed itself clearly shows that what was sold by the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 was the mokarrari interest in the property and nothing else. This contention is, therefore, overruled.

The learned Vakil for the appellants has next urged that even if what was vended was the mokarrari lease, the right of pre-emption extends to such leases under the Muhammadan Law. That this objection is untenable has been held in the cases of Mosrooly Rim v. Huree Ram (1), Babu Ram Gulam Singh v. Nursing Sahoy (2) and Dewanutulla v. Kazem Molla (3). The learned Vakil, however, contends that they were cases of pre emption claimed by co partners and so those cases do not apply to the claim of pre emption by neighbours. He further urges that there is nothing in the Muhammadan Law to justify those decisions. This leads me to consider some of the basic principles underlying the right of pre emption under the Muhammadan Law. Hedaya defines pre emption "as the becoming proprietor of lands sold for the price at which the purchaser has bought them although he be not consenting thereunto. The term 'Shuffa' is derived from the root which signifies conjunction and the lands sold are here conjoined to the land of Shufee or person claiming the right of pre emption." Mr. Justice Mahmood in the well-known case of Gobind Dayal v. Inayatullah (4) defines Shuffa as a right which the owner of certain immoveable property possesses as such for the quiet enjoyment of that immoveable property to obtain in substitution for the buyer proprietary possession of certain other immoveable property not his own on such terms as those on which such latter immoveable property is sold to another person." On these authorities it is perfectly clear that unless the proprietary possession is transferred the right of pre-emption does not accrue. The right of Shuffa on the ground of visinage is based on the saying of the Prophet: "The neighbour of a house has a superior right to that house; and the neighbour of lands has a superior right to those lands. A neighbour has a right superior to that of a stranger in the land adjacent to his own." The superiority of a neighbour's right is based upon the ground of convenience and its object, as laid down in Hedaya, page 558, is to prevent vexation arising from a stranger who may be a disagreeable neighbour. That being so, unless the vendor has finally parted with the proprietary possession of the land there is no irremediable danger of vexation arising from a disagreeable neighbour.

Further, the main pedestal on which the right of pre emption stands is reciprocity, i.e. if properties X and Y are so related that if the owner of X can pre-empt on the sale of Y, the owner of Y can also pre-empt on the sale of X and this reciprocity is the factor which distinguishes the right of pre emption from easements, mortgages, leases and other jura in re aliena.

We have now to see if such reciprocity exists between the plaintiffs and the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 so far as the mokarrari lands are concerned. It is well-established on the text as well as on the case-law that the pre emptor must have the milkiyat or ownership in the property on account of which he claims the right of pre-emption. See Baillie, page 473; Sakina Bibi v Amiran (5). If he has not the ownership in the property on account of which he claims the right of pre emption, he cannot succeed. I have already stated that if the plaintiffs could claim the right of pre-emption on the sale of their land by defendants Nos. 2 and 3 the latter could also on the ground of reciprocity claim the right of pre emption if the plaintiffs had sold their property. The milkiyat or ownership of the property being sine qua non for the exercise of the right of pre-emption, it is obvious that defendants Nos. 2 and 3 holding only the mokarrari interest could not pre empt if the plaintiffs had sold their property. So the very principle of mutuality upon which the whole doctrine of pre emption is based is wanting in this case, and so under no circumstances could the plaintiffs claim the right of pre emption when only the mokarrari interest was transferred. The claim so far as the transfer of the mokurrari lands in suit is concerned, therefore, must fail.

The learned Vakil then contends that he is, at any rate, entitled to pre-empt the house. It is found in this case that the plaintiffs have a dwelling house contiguous to the house transferred and it has also been found that the house as it stood with the right of occupation, which the vendor had enjoyed, was transferred.

The law as laid down in Baillie, page 473, is that if a house is sold apart from the land on which it stands with a view to being pulled down no right of pre-emption can be claimed with respect to it. If it is for occupation, then pre emption can be claimed on the ground of vicinage by the owner of the adjoining house. It has never been suggested in this case that the house was sold to be pulled down or that in effect it was a sale only of the materials. The plaintiffs, therefore, are clearly entitled to a decree so far as the house is concerned. The view that I have taken is fully supported by the decision in the case of Zahur v. Nur Ali (6). The result is that the appeal so far as the mokarrari lands are concerned must fail but the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for pre-emption so far as the house is concerned and the appeal is accordingly allowed to that extent. There will be no order as to costs.

COUTTS, J.—I agree.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 182 (5)—Step-in aid of execution Transmission of decree, application for—Oral application made subsequently, whether step-in-aid—Starting point of limitation.

The starting point under Article 182 (5) of Schedule I to the Limitation Act is not the taking of a step-in-aid of execution but the application to take such a step. [p 537, col. 2]

Where an order for the transmission of a decree to another Court for execution is made, but the decree-holder is allowed to postpone filing the necessary papers, the mere fact that when on a subsequent date, in filing the papers, he again applies orally for the transmission, does not constitute a step-in-aid of execution so as to give a fresh starting point for limitation. [p. 538, col. 1.]

Civil Miscellaneous second appeal against the order of the Court of the Additional Temporary Subordinate Judge, Cuddalore, in Appeal Suit No. 80 of 1919, (Appeal Suit No. 82 of 1918 on the file of the District Court of South Arcot, and Appeal Suit No. 185 of 918 on the file of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Cuddalore), preferred against the revised order of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Villupuram, in Miscellaneous Petition No. 514 of 1916, in Original Suit No. 225 of 1907.)

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr T. Rangachariar, (with him Messrs. K. S. Krishnasawami Aiyangar and A. Srirangachariar), for the Appellant:—The lower Appellate Court erred in holding that time was saved under Article 182 (5) of the Limitation Act. Here, there was an application made on which the order for transmission was made. There was no necessity for a subsequent oral application. The mere fact that the decree holder filed some copies required by Order XXI, rule 6, Civil Procedure Code, does not alter the nature of the original order. The subsequent application is in the nature of a reminder, or at any rate a request to Court to expedite the transmision of the decree. The expression 'step in-aid of execution' sgnifies some necessary step. It is not every step taken that will be a step in-aid of execution.

The facts in Viiiaraghavulu Naidu v. Srinivasulu Naidu(1) were different. There the filing of the batta memorandum was necessary for the issue of the sale proclamation. Here the further oral application was superfluous because the only effective application was already presented to Court. See Masilamani Mudaliar v. Sethuswami Aiyar (2).

Mr. Somaya for the Respondent's Vakil:—The oral application was made after some formalities required by law were complied with. It is a 'step in aid of execution.' In Civil Miscellaneous Second Appeal No. 110 of 1918 it was held that the application to take a step must be deemed to have been finally presented when all the necessary papers were filed. An application to Court, therefore, stating that all formalities had been complied with and that the transmission could well be finally ordered is an application to take a step in aid of execution.

JUDGMENT.

OLDFIELD, J.—The facts are that the respondent, decree-holder, filed an application for transfer of his decree and obtained an order for its transmission. He had not filed the copies required by Order XXI, rule 6 and when he filed them on a subsequent date, he also again applied orally for the transmission of the decree. The question is whether this oral application was one to take a step-in aid of execution and time can be calculated from it.

The lower Appellate Court held that it could. But, in my opinion, it misapprehended the circumstances and the authorities relied on. The material fact is that the transmission of the decree had been ordered and that order was not the less the only order, which was necessary, because the decree holder had for his own convenience been allowed to postpone filing the necessary papers. We have not been shown that any further application by him was necessary; in fact for all that appears, on his filing the papers that decree would have been transmitted. In these circumstances, the facts differ from those in Viiiaraghavulu Naidu v. Srinivasalu Naidu (1) where the proclamations would not have been issued, if the batta memorandum then in question had not been filed and resemble rather those in Masilamani Mudaliar v. Sethuswami Aiyar (2) where "a mere repetition of a prior application" was in question, the only difference between the last mentioned and the present case being that in the latter the Court had passed its order. It is material that the starting point under Article 182, Schedule I to the Limitation Act is not the taking of a step-in-aid of execution but the application to take such a step and there was in the present case no such application as the decree-holder can rely on. The lower Appellate Court's decision must, in these circumstances, be set aside, the appeal being allowed and the order of the District Munsif being restored with costs throughout.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I agree with my learned brother; but, however, as a decision to which I was a party has been quoted in support of the respondent's contention, I wish to add a few words. The facts are clear. An application to transmit a decree for execution which is now recognised as a step in aid of execution was made; before the record was completed an order was passed on it directing the transmission. This was on the 27th March 1911. On the 6th of July 1911, a paper which ought to have been filed before the order was passed was presented by the Vakil and he made an oral application to transmit the decree. I regard this merely as a request to expedite the transmission of the decree which was already ordered; Mr. Somaya contended that this was an application to take a step-in-aid. The application for that purpose was operated upon and an order had been passed, subject to the records being completed. The request by the Vakil was not a process which was necessary to effectuate the application. The mere filing of the paper by itself, cannot be a step; because, what the Limitation Act wants is an application to take a step. Therefore, as the remedy was superfluous and as the filing of the paper by itself was of no avail, this case comes within the principle enunciated in Masilamani Mudaliar v. Sethuswami Aiyar (2).

(2) 41 Ind. Cas. 701; 41 M. 251; (1917) M. W. N. 502; 33 M. L. J. 219; 22 M. L. T. 115.

Among the authorities quoted, stress was laid on two cases:—In Civil Miscellaneous Second Appeal No 110 of 1918, it is clear that Mr. Justice Odgers and myself were not dealing with a superfluous request as in this case. In our opinion, the application to take a step-in-aid became complete only on obtaining the recognition of the transferee, and on supplying the necessary materials on which the Court can pass orders. The order had to await the completion of the record and we held that the application to take a step must be deemed to have been finally presented only when all the papers were filed. It is clear that all this was done before the order was passed. I am obliged to add these words by way of comment to that decision lest it should be misunderstood. The other decision relied on was Vijiaraghavulu Naidu v. Srinivasulu Naidu (1). There is one sentence in it which certainly supports the learned Vakil for the respondent. Here, again, as pointed out in Masilamani Mudaliar v. Sethuswami Aiyar (2), the learned Judges seem to lay stress on the fact that the oral application was necessary. I do not wish to say anything more about that decision. It must be conceded that the language employed in some decisions has not erred on the side of perspicacity. It is time to insist upon compliance with the language of the Code therefore. Two things are essential. There must be an application and that application must ask the Court to take a step-in-aid of execution. As the learned Vakil for the appellant argued, the bare fact that a party took some steps will not be enough. There must be an application to which the steps taken can be referred. If that application is already before the Court and has been the subject of a decision or direction, any step taken subsequently will not have the force of an application to take a step; also, if the application is in the nature of a reminder, that will be of no avail, because the Court should not stand in need, legally, of reminders to do its obvious duty. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the application was barred by limitation and I agree with the order proposed by my learned brother.

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Patna, dated the 28th June 1918, reversing a decision of the Munsif, dated the 5th December 1916.

Messrs. Kulwant Sahay, Gangadhar Das, and D. N Sarcar, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. B. Mukherji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against the decision of the District Judge, Patna, dated the 28th June 1918, reversing that of the Munsif, dated 5th December 1916, and dismissing the suit of the plaintiff. The suit was for recovery of possession of 11 cottahs of land with mesne profits. The plaintiffs are proprietors of 8 annas of Mauza Birwaebak. Defendants Nos. 5 and 6 are the proprietors of the remaining 8 annas. These defendants have not appeared in the case. The land in suit is recorded in the last survey as plot No. 983 in khata No. 1118, in the name of Tilak Koeri, defendant No. 3. The plaintiff's case is that he obtained a rent decree on 18th February 1915, (1322 F. S.) Exhibit VII against Tilak in respect of his kasht land including the 11 cottahs in dispute, and in execution thereof advertised the land for sale, whereupon Tilak abandoned the holding and defendants Nos. 1 and 2 wrongfully took possession of the same. Hence the action by the plaintiff for recovery of possession.

Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 claim the land on the basis of an auction-purchase per Exhibit "O" sale certificate dated July 1913 in an execution, commenced by them in 1913, of a mortgage decree, Exhibit Q, dated the 22nd May 1906, against Gobind Mahto defendant No. 4. They allege that the land in suit 11 cottahs was part and parcel of 6 bighas 2 khata 4 dhurs of the ancestral kasht of Gobind Mahto (vide Exhibits H and I dated 1883 and 1884 respectively) which they purchase in execution of their mortgage decree and obtained delivery of possession through Court on July 27th 1913, per Dakhal Dehani Exhibit "C" and that defendant No. 4 Tilak Mahto had no concern with the suit land and that in fact defendant No. 3 did not abandon the land and was still residing in the village. They also impugned the decree obtained by the plaintiffs against Tilak Mahto and the proceeding in execution, whereby the land in suit was advertised for sale, as being collusive. They deposited the decretal amount and averted the sale. They further say that the plaintiffs obtained a rent-decree, Exhibit VI, on February 13th, 1914, in respect of the kasht of Govind Mahton and in execution advertised the kasht for sale, per Exhibit V. These defendants objected to the sale and applied for permission to deposit the decretal amount and ultimately the dispute was settled by means of a compromise petition, Exhibit B dated 19th May 1914, whereby the plaintiffs accepted the decretal amount, released the property from sale and recognised the defendants as tenants in place of Gobind Mahto in respect of 6 bighas, 2 cottahs, 4 dhurs, which included the disputed land and hence the plaintiffs are estopped from questioning the title of the defendants Nos. 1 and 2.

Upon the pleadings of the parties in the Trial Court, the following issues were raised:—

1. Did the plaintiffs and defendants Nos. 5 and 6 recognise defendants Nos. 1 and 2 as tenants of the land in suit, if so are the plaintiffs estopped from questioning the title of defendants Nos. 1 and 2?

2. Was the land in suit the raiyati kasht of defendant No. 4?

3. Is the plaintiff entitled to possession?

Issues Nos. 4 and 5 need not be mentioned.

The Munsif by his judgment, dated 5th December 1916, decided all the issues against the defendants and in favour of plaintiffs. On appeal the District Judge of Patna confirmed the decision of the Munsif by this judgment on 20th July 1917. He held that the land in suit, plot No. 983, was not part of Gobind's holding and was not included in the purchase of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 in execution of their mortgage decree against Gobind, and that it was the kasht of defendant No. 3 and was so recorded in the Survey Record of Rights and the village papers of the plaintiff. He further held that the defendants were not recognised by the landlords as tenants of the land per Exhibit "B" as is contended for by them inasmuch as that document recognised the defendants as tenants of 6 bighas 2 cottahs 4 dhurs, which was advertised for sale and which did not contain the land in suit. On appeal to this Court by the defendants, the case was remanded to the lower Appellate Court for fresh decision.

The appeal after remand was heard by Mr. Chatterji successor of Mr. Ross who had in the first instance heard the appeal, and, agreeing with the Munsif, had decreed the plaintiff's suit. Mr. Chatterji has dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiffs have, therefore, appealed to this Court.

The first contention raised by Mr. Kulwant Sahay, appearing on behalf of the plaintiffs, is that the remand by this Court was illegal and invalid inasmuch as there was the defect in law or in procedure in the previous decision of the District Judge in favour of the plaintiffs dated 20th July 1917, and hence the present decision of the District Judge under appeal, dated 20th June 1919, is illegal and inoperative. He further says that he is entitled to raise this plea now while appealing from the final decree of the District Judge after remand, inasmuch as the order of remand passed by Mr. Justice Das not being under Order XLI, rule 23 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not appealable under the Letters Patent. In support of this contention reliance has been placed upon the decision of a Special Bench of this Court in Bara Estate Limited v. Anup Chandra (1). That case would seem to apply to the facts of the present case. The remand in the present case was certainly not under Order XLI, rules 23 and 25. The former rule does not apply because the case was not disposed by the lower Court on a preliminary point. Rule 25 does not apply because no finding upon any particular issue was called for from the lower Court but the whole case was remanded with direction to try and dispose of the case. The remand was under the inherent power of the Court.

It was said that there was no finding of the Court as to whether the defendant No. 3, Tilak Mahto, had abandoned the land in suit or not and the Court below was consequently directed to come to a conclusion on the point. The Munsif dealing with Issue No. 3 had clearly held that the land was abandoned by Tilak. It does not appear from the judgment of the District Judge dated 20th July 1917 that the point was raised before him. Be that as it may, the last judgment of the District Judge after remand, dated 28th of June 1919, has come to a definite finding upon the point by holding that the defendant had abandoned the land in question sometime before the institution of the suit. This finding is supported by good evidence on the record, and, as stated by the learned Judge, was not rebutted by the defendant. So far as this issue is concerned, it is immaterial for the plaintiffs-appellants whether the order of remand was valid or not.

The question raised by Mr. Kulwant Sahay really applies to the first two issues in the case as to whether the land in suit was included in the holding of Gobind, defendant No. 4, and as to whether defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were recognised by the landlords as tenants thereof.

The concurrent findings of the Courts below before remand were in favour of the appellant. The reason for the remand was stated to be that the lower Appellate Court did not appear "to have taken into consideration the proceeding of the rent suit in 1883 and 1884" and accordingly the direction was to consider the case with reference to those documents which showed that Gobind was in possession of 6 bighas 2 cattahs 4 dhurs. This was apparently a misapprehension for the documents in question were duly considered by the Court below before remand as is obvious from the following passage of the judgment of that Court: "Reliance was placed upon rent decrees of the years 1883 and 1884 which show that in these years his holding was 6 bighas 2 cattas 4 dhurs, and it was contended that this plot of 11 cottahs was genuinely mortgaged in 1895" It is immaterial whether the Court did or did not accept the aforesaid documents to be correct or as good evidence for the facts stated therein. It is sufficient that the documents were duly considered. Another reason for the remand is said to be that the Record of Rights was not on the record. It was the case of both the parties in their respective pleadings that the land in suit was recorded in the name of Tilak and so was also the finding of the Court below. The parties were not at issue as to the entry in the Record of Rights and its absence from the record was, therefore, immaterial. The order of remand in the case comes well within the purview of the decision of the Special Bench of this Court referred to above and was invalid, and consequently the decision of the learned District Judge after remand is also invalid, and cannot displace the former judgment of that Court in favour of the plaintiff. In this view we have only to consider whether the judgment of Mr. Ross, dated the 20th July 1917, can be upheld or not. That judgment to my mind, concurrently with that of the Munsif, has recorded a finding of fact which is not open to challenge in second appeal. Mr. Ross distinctly held that the land in dispute was not part of Gobind's holding which the defendants had purchased in execution of their mortgage-decree, and that they were not recognised by the plaintiffs as tenants of the same. Mr. Ross's judgment was not legally set aside by Mr. Justice Das and must, therefore, stand as a good and valid judgment and must be restored.

If, however, the remand order of this Court validly vacated the judgment of Mr. Ross, we have to consider whether the judgment of Mr. Chatterji dated the 28th June is sustainable on merits. He examined in detail the documents of title produced by the defendants and came practically to the same conclusion that the Munsif and Mr. Ross had previously come to, namely, that they do not necessarily show that the land in dispute was necessarily part of Gobind's holding, or that the plaintiffs in recognising them as purchasers of Gobind's holding had necessarily recognised them as tenants of the same. He held that Gobind's holding, no doubt, consisted of 6 bighas 2 cottahs 4 dhurs as is evident from the decrees of 1883-1884, but that "this alone, however, does not show the suit land was part of that holding". After recording the above finding the learned District Judge concluded his judgment in the following words:—

"Some more definite evidence is necessary for this purpose and this evidence comes in the shape of evidence of possession which is to the effect that in 1885 Govind mortgaged the entire holding including the suit land; that a decree was made on the mortgage in 1906, sale took place in execution of that decree in 1913 and appellants got delivery of possession in July 1913, and since then remained in possession unopposed by any one. This evidence to my mind is sufficient to show that the suit land was included in Gobind's holding and the appellants have been recognised as tenants in respect to the same. I accordingly decide this point in favour of the appellants."

The finding of possession contained in the above passage is based entirely upon the mortgage-bond of 1895 executed by Gobind in favour of the defendant. But this bond has not been produced which as Mr. Ross says is the foundation of the plaintiff's title. It was not an usufructuary mortgage and cannot be any evidence of possession in favour of the defendant who for the first time got delivery of possession in July 1913. Even if the disputed land was included in the defendants' delivery of possession in 1913 that would not give them a statutory claim to resist the suit of the plaintiff filed in 1916 to recover possession of the property. Assuming that the land in suit was included in the mortgage of the defendants, that would not give them any title unless the title of their mortgagor Gobind was proved independently of the mortgage. Apart from the mortgage, the other documents relied upon were distinctly held by the Court below to have failed to establish that the land in suit was part of Gobind's holding. The learned Judge has not referred to any evidence upon which he based his conclusions in the passage quoted above. As to the recognition by petition Exhibit "B" he had definitely held that "as the suit land was not included in the sale proclamation (Exhibit 5) issued at the instance of the plaintiffs it cannot be said the plaintiffs recognised the appellants (defendants) as tenants in respect of this plot though it was included in their purchase unless they show that the suit land was part of Gobind's holding." Yet, in conclusion, he refers to the defendants' mortgage and their purchase as "sufficient evidence" to show that suit land was included in Gobind's holding. The findings of the Court below upon issues Nos. 1 and 2 are not based upon legal evidence and the conclusions drawn by him from the mortgage and purchase of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 for holding that the disputed land was included in Gobind's holding and that the defendants were recognised as tenants in respect of the same are illegal. The learned Judge has simply begged the whole question which he had to decide. The decision in the concluding portion of the judgment of the learned Judge is, therefore, illegal. If I construe his judgment aright, the earlier finding of his is against the defendants that they failed to establish that the suit land was part and parcel of Gobind's holding and this I accept to be the finding of the Court below. The previous judgment of Mr. Ross is based upon legal evidence arrived at by full appreciation of all the evidence produced in the case. He affirmed the decision of the Munsif, who again has supported his finding upon competent boundary witnesses on behalf of the plaintiff and the finally published Record of Rights, the defendants having examined no competent and reliable witness. The learned District Judge has not referred to that evidence, nor to the finding of the Munsif. The Munsif's finding upon the possession of Tilak and of there being no possession of Gobind as a part of his holding remained in tact. Therefore, as between the judgments of the Munsif and of Mr. Chatterji after remand the latter must be vacated in favour of the former. I have already held that the order of remand was invalid and so the judgment of the lower Appellate Court under appeal. I have also shown that even if the judgment under appeal is not affected by the invalidity of the remand order it is unsustainable on merits. Therefore, the result is that the judgment of the Munsif dated 5th December 1916 under appeal as upheld by Mr. Ross is restored and the suit is decreed with costs throughout.

The learned Vakil for the respondents, however, urged that the plaintiff being part proprietor cannot get a decree for khas possession of the land in suit, without the co-sharers having been joined as plaintiffs. Reference was made to the case of Hossain Mahomed v. Fakir Mahomed (2), but that case far from helping the defendants goes directly against them. It is now settled that a co-proprietor under such circumstances is entitled to get possession jointly with the other co sharers, and the prayer in relief (1) of the plaint seeks only joint possession with co-sharers defendants Nos. 5 and 6 and the decree of the Munsif also was in those terms. That decree was maintained by this Court. The contention of the learned Vakil was apparently due to an oversight of the ruling claimed.

The appeal is decreed with costs.

Letters Patent Appeal against the judgment of Justice Sir George Knox, dated the 18th of May 1917.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mukhtar Ahmad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for damages for malicious and false prosecution. The facts as found by the Court below may be briefly stated as follows:—The defendant-respondent Qurban Ahmad preferred a complaint of offences under sections 504 and 506 of the Indian Penal Code, and section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, against the plaintiff-appellant. The complaint was filed in the Court of the Joint Magistrate who transferred it to the Court of a Bench of Honorary Magistrates for trial of the offence under section 504, Indian Penal Code. A date was fixed and summons was issued to the present appellant who was one of several accused. On the date fixed Qurban Ahmad and his witnesses appeared but the latter apparently were unwilling to give evidence on his behalf and he wanted a further adjournment. The Court ordered him to pay the expenses of the witnesses who had appeared within an hour. He failed to do so, and so the complaint was dismissed. There Qurban Ahmad allowed the criminal matter to rest. The plaintiff-appellant then brought the present suit for damages. The lower Appellate Court found on the evidence that the complaint preferred by Qurban Ahmad was false and malicious. It assessed the damages at Rs. 140 and it gave the plaintiff a decree for that amount. The defendant appealed to this Court and the case coming before a learned Judge, the appeal was allowed. The Court placed reliance upon the case of Nalliappa Goundan v. Kailappa Goundan (1) and held that there had been no prosecution; that the lower Appellate Court's finding upon the evidence was a very halting conclusion and that its finding was not sufficiently distinct and certain. It allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit. Before us it is pleaded with considerable force that there clearly had been a prosecution of the plaintiff; that this Court is bound by the finding of the lower Appellate Court on the actual facts that that prosecution was false and malicious. We think that the facts of this case clearly constitute a prosecution, for the accused person was actually summoned into Court and appeared to answer the charge. We do not think the case quoted is at all applicable to the circumstances of the present case and it certainly is not in accord with the case of Bishun Persad v. Phulman Singh (2) or the case of Ahmedbhai v. Framji Edulji (3). It was no fault of the present appellant that the Bench of Honorary Magistrates dismissed the complaint without hearing the evidence. The defendant, Qurban Ahmad, had done all that it was possible for him to do to prosecute the present plaintiff and the latter was actually dragged into Court. We have examined the judgment of the lower Appellate Court and though it has used the expression "I am inclined to think that the criminal complaint was not true," an examination of the judgment as a whole shows that the lower Appellate Court was, on the evidence, convinced that the prosecution was false and malicious. It points to certain strong circumstances and it distinctly says, "Under such circumstances it can be safely inferred that the complaint was false," and ended by saying "I, therefore, decide the second issue against the defendant-respondent." We think that there was a clear finding by the Court below that the prosecution was false and malicious. That finding is binding upon us as there is no certificate to the effect that there is no evidence to support it. We are also bound by the finding as to the extent of damages. We think that the appeal in this Court should have been dismissed. We, therefore, allow this appeal. We set aside the decree of this Court and we restore the decree of the lower Appellate Court. The appellant will have his costs in all Courts.

In order that a tenure of land on which permanent tanks have been made may be protected under section 12, clause (4) of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act from being annulled by a purchaser at a sale held under that Act, it is not necessary to establish that the tanks were made either by the tenure-holders or by their predecessors-in-interest. Letters Patent Appeal against the decree of Mr. Justice Newbould, dated the 14th August 1919, in Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 2239 of 1918 and reported as 58 Ind. Cas. 287.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Sarat Chandra Roy Choudhury (with him Babu Indu Bhusan Roy), for the Appellant.—The plaintiff is the appellant. The appeal arises out of a suit for ejectment. The plaintiff is auction-purchaser of a Noabad Taluk under Act VII of 1868 B. C. The plaintiff's case was that he was entitled to annul encumbrances. The defence was that he was entitled to protection as being occupancy ryot and also for having made improvements. The first Court held that the plaintiff although having title to the lands in dispute was not entitled to eject the defendant, and accordingly dismissed the suit. The lower Appellate Court decreed the suit. On appeal to this Court, Mr. Justice Newbould affirmed the first Court's decision and decreed rent only but not ejectment. My submission is that the learned Judge ought not to have allowed a new ground, urged for the first time in this Court, that the defendant was entitled to protection under section 12 (4) of Act VII of 1868 B. C. or section 37 of Act XI of 1859. The settlement was made with the predecessor of the defendant. The law does not contemplate that the proprietor would not be able to sell such lands as described in clause (4). The protection is given on the principle of improvement. Refers to Ajgur Ali v. Asmut Ali (1). The question is whether the improvement was effected by the lessee or not. Here the tanks were in the possession of the Talukdar whose tank was sold. The Legislature did not intend to protect a man who has succeeded that person who has actually made the tanks, etc., on the land. If the landlord in possession lets out the tank that cannot be treated as an incumbrance. Refers to Asmat Ali v. Hasmat Khan (2).

Babu Chandra Sekhur Sen, for the Respondents was not called upon.

JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—This is an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent from the judgment of Mr. Justice Newbould in a suit for ejectment instituted by a purchaser at a sale held under Act VII of 1868 (B. C.). The Court of first instance refused to decree ejectment, but gave the plaintiff a declaration of his title and of his right to receive rent. On appeal the Subordinate Judge decreed the claim for ejectment. Mr. Justice Newbould has reversed that decision and restored the decree of the Court of first instance. We are of opinion that the decree made by Mr. Justice Newbould is correct, though not for the reasons assigned by him.

The nature of the title of a purchaser of a tenure sold under the provisions of Act VII of 1868 (B. C.) is defined in section 12 which lays down that such a purchaser becomes entitled to avoid and annul all under-tenures and forthwith to eject all under-tenants with certain exceptions. One of these exceptions embodied in clause (4) is "tenures of lands whereon dwelling-houses, manufactories or other permanent buildings have been erected or whereon permanent gardens, plantations, tanks, canals, places of worship or burning or burying grounds have been made." In the present case, the purchaser seeks to avoid and annul a tenure of land on which permanent tanks have been made. His contention is that before his title can be restricted, it must be established that the tanks were made either by the tenure-holders or by their predecessors-in-interest. We are not prepared to accept this construction of the section. If the Legislature had intended to restrict the operation of the clause in the manner suggested, suitable words might have been inserted for the purpose. Reference has been made to the decisions in Ajgur Ali v. Asmut Ali (1) and Asmat Ali v. Hasmat Khan (2), but neither of these cases has a direct bearing upon the question we are called upon to decide.

The result is that this appeal is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This is a second appeal against the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Arrah, setting aside the decree of the Munsif in a suit for declaration of the plaintiffs' title to, and for confirmation of possession of, 3 bighas odd land. The facts of the case are shortly as follows:—

One Tulsi Lohar had an occupancy holding of 9 bighas odd land. In the year 1878 he sold 6 bighas odd to the father of Ramchiz, the defendant No. 14 in this suit. In 1879 he sold the remaining 3 bighas odd to the ancestors of the plaintiffs. Subsequently, the plaintiffs' case is that Tulsi died and his son Harakh Lohar left the village. In 1899, the landlord, who is the defendant No. 1 in the present suit, sued Harakh Lohar, the son of Tulsi, and the purchaser of the 6 bighas odd land for rent. He obtained a decree and in execution thereof purchased the entire holding on the 16th of May 1900. In 1901 he obtained dakhal dahani and in 1910 he settled the entire 9 bighas odd land with the defendants Nos. 2 to 9. At the time of the settlement in 1912 the names of the defendants Nos. 2 to 9 were recorded. In 1913, the present suit was brought by the plaintiffs on the allegation that they had purchased the 3 bighas odd, for which they are suing, in the year 1879 and that they had been recognised by the landlord. The suit was dismissed in the Court of first instance, but on appeal it has been decreed by the learned Subordinate Judge.

The main question in the appeal is whether the plaintiffs were recognised by the landlord. The only evidence of recognition which they are able to produce is a receipt of the year 1900 granted to them by the landlord's Tehsildar. In the case of Wyatt v. Sheo Gobind Sahu (1) it was held that the granting of a rent receipt by a Tahsildar did not amount to recognition of a transfer. In the case of Janki Sahu v. Thakur Run Bahadur Singh (2) this decision was followed and it was held that receipts granted by a Gomasta did not amount to recognition of a transfer. The reason for this decision was that a Gomasta is ordinarily an agent with an authority of a limited kind and a person dealing with such an agent is bound to assure himself that the limits of the agent's authority are not exceeded. The learned Judges in that case relied on the Privy Council decision in the case of Russo-Chinese Bank, v. Li Yau Sam (3), in which Lord Atkinson in delivering judgment stated the rule of the law in the following terms:

"If the agent be held out as having only a limited authority to do on behalf of his principal acts of a particular class, then the principal is not bound by an act done outside that authority, even though it be an act of that particular class, because, the authority being thus represented to be limited, the party prejudiced has notice, and should ascertain whether or not the act is authorised."

The case of Juthan Lal v. Ram Dat Singh (4) as also the cases of Moharani Beni Pershad Koeri v. Goberdhan Koeri (5) and Sri Maharani Beni Pershad Koeri v. Ramdahin Pandey (6) are to the same effect. The latter two cases are the cases of Tahsildars as in the present case and, in my opinion, the view of the law which has been taken in all these cases is correct. It is true that in Srikishun Prasad Panjiar v. Musammat Jeohasi Kuer (7) to which we have been referred, one of the learned Judges was of opinion that the onus was on the landlord to show that his agent had not got authority, but that opinion was expressed in regard to the particular facts of that case and moreover it was not necessary for the decision of the matter which was before the learned Judges. The correct view of the law has, as I have already said, been, in my opinion, expressed in the cases to which I have referred. In the present case it has not been shown that the Tahsildar had authority and the grant of the receipt by him cannot in any way amount to recognition of the transfer.

The next point urged is that there has been abandonment. It does not appear, however, that this is so.

Lastly it has been contended that Harakh Lohar was dead at the time the decree was obtained by the landlord and that consequently it was void as against him. The lower Appellate Court has found that this is so, but in coming to this conclusion the learned Subordinate Judge has obviously made a mistake. He has based his decision on the pleadings and has said that as it was specifically alleged in the plaint that Harakh Lohar was dead before the suit was brought by the landlord and as this allegation has not been traversed, it must be taken as correct. The allegation, however, was distinctly denied in the written statement of defendants Nos. 2 to 8 and as there is no evidence that Harakh was dead at the time of the suit, we must take it that he was alive.

The result then is that the decree appealed against must be set aside. I would accordingly set it aside and decree this appeal with costs.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), Sch. II, Art. 24—Suit to recover money under an award, whether cognizable by Small Cause Court.

A suit to recover money payable under an award is cognizable by a Court of Small Causes.

Civil revision from an order of the Munsif, Mainpuri, dated the 18th December 1918.

The Hon'ble Mr. Narain Prasad Asthana, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application under section 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (Act No. IX of 1887). The question for decision is whether or not the suit was cognisable by a Court of Small Causes. The lower Court held that it was so cognisable. It is contended here in revision that the suit was not entertainable. It seems that an award had been made out of Court between the parties under which a certain sum of money had been declared payable to the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought this suit accordingly to recover the amount so named. Mr. Narain Prasad has referred me to Article 24 of the Second Schedule to the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (Act No. IX of 1887). According to that Article a suit to contest an award is not triable by a Court of Small Causes. The answer to this argument is that the present suit was not a suit to contest an award. On the contrary it was a suit to enforce an award by asking for delivery of the money which was payable under the award.

The learned Counsel has referred me to the decision in Madho Prasad v. Lalta Prasad (1). There the suit was of a nature similar to that of the present suit and the Court held that the suit was not cognisable by the Court of Small Causes. It is apparent, however, that this decision was delivered with reference to the language of the old Small Cause Courts Act (Act No. XI of 1865). A reference to section 6 of this old Act shows that certain suits were declared to be cognisable by Courts of Small Causes and consequently by implication all other suits were excluded from Small Cause Court jurisdiction. It is clear that under the old Act the present suit would not have been entertainable in a Court of Small Causes, but the scheme of the Act has been altered and I am unable to find any provision in the Second Schedule to the present Act (Act No. IX of 1887) which would indicate that a suit for money due under an award is not a suit which is cognisable by a Court of Small Causes. In my opinion it was so cognisable and I think the decision of the Judge of the Court below was correct. I dismiss the application. I make no order as to costs as the proceedings have been ex parte.

Although a lambardar has the right to pay the revenue out of the collections realised, he has no right to charge the whole revenue against the share of the profits of any particular co-sharer.

In a suit for accounts, the co-sharer claiming accounts can be awarded what is due to him either from the lambardar, if he has collected in excess, or from the co-sharer, if any, who may have done so.

Appeal against the decree of the First Additional District Judge, Lucknow, dated the 27th February 1919, modifying that of the Assistant Collector, First Class, Unao, dated the 30th September 1918.

Mr. Raj Bahadur holding brief of Mr. Rajeshwari Prasad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Manohar Lal Tewari, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit by a recorded co-sharer for his share of the profits of a Mahal for Rabi 1321 to Kharif 1323 Fasli. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit. The lower Appellate Court decreed it for Rs. 28-1-8.

Two questions are involved in this appeal. The first question is whether the plaintiff can be charged with revenue due by the proprietors of certain plots. The Lambardar has a right to pay the revenue out of the collections made but has no right to charge the whole revenue against the share of the profits of any particular co sharer. Each co-sharer is entitled to his share of the profits after deducting his share of the liability for revenue.

The next question for consideration is whether the Lambardar can be made responsible for the excess collections made by the heirs of Nadir uz-Zaman. The lower Appellate Court held that he was responsible, but the responsibility is clearly not his. In a suit for accounts, the co-sharer claiming accounts can be awarded what is due to him either from the Lambardar, if he has collected in excess, or from the co sharer, if any, who may have done so. The share of the plaintiff in the profits realized amounted to Rs. 174-11 2. The defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 realized Rs. 28-1-8 in excess of what they were entitled to and omitted to pay their share of the revenue. The Lambardar can make them liable for such portion of the revenue as may be chargeable against them. The revenue payable by the plaintiff amounts to Rs. 37 per year. Deducting the revenue payable by the plaintiff the amount of profits, to which the plaintiff is entitled, would be Rs. 100-11-2, out of which Rs. 28-1-8 should be charged against the defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 and the rest against the defendant-appellant.

The appeal and the cross-objections are, therefore, allowed in so far that the plaintiff will be entitled to a decree for Rs. 28-1-8 with proportionate costs here and below against the defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 and for Rs. 72-9-6 against the defendant-appellant with proportionate costs here and hitherto. The defendant appellant will bear his own costs throughout.

The period of limitation applicable to a suit by a consignor of goods against a Railway Administration for damages for non-delivery is contained in Article 31 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act. [p. 548, col. 2.]

A letter informing a consignor that the goods consigned by him are lying at a particular place and that his instructions are awaited as to their disposal is not an acknowledgment within the meaning of section 19 of the Limitation Act. [p. 548, col. 2.]

An acknowledgment of liability made after expiry of the period of limitation cannot save the operation of the Statute of Limitation. [p. 549, col. 1.]

MUTSADDI LAL v. B. B. AND C. I. RY. CO.

JUDGMENT.—The circumstances out of which this case has arisen are these. On the 16th of January 1913 the plaintiff consigned to the Rohilkhand and Kumaun Railway at Ramnagar Station a bundle of gunny bags to be delivered to the Salt Superintendent, Sambhar, on the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway line. The bundle was not delivered. The plaintiff was subsequently informed that it was lying in the lost property office of the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway and that the plaintiff might take delivery if he liked. No answer seems to have been given to the Railway. Subsequently by a letter of the 17th of March 1916 the Railway offered to pay to the plaintiff Rs. 20 in satisfaction of his claim, but this offer was refused and the present suit was instituted for recovery of Rs. 50 as compensation. This sum of Rs. 50 was comprised of the following items, namely, Rs. 40-3-0 for price of the bags; Rs. 3-13-0, Railway fare, and Rs. 6 for loss arising from the non-delivery of the bags in the sale of salt. The Court below has dismissed the suit, holding that it was time-barred under Article 30 or 31 of Schedule I of the Indian Limitation Act. Article 30, which provides for a suit for compensation against a carrier for losing or injuring goods, seems to be inapplicable to the present case, inasmuch as the defendants by their letters of the 3rd and 13th of February 1914 informed the plaintiff that the bundle containing his goods was not lost but was lying in their lost property office because delivery of it had not been claimed by anyone. Article 31, however, seems to me exactly to cover the present case. That Article provides for a suit against a carrier for compensation for non-delivery of or delay in delivering goods. The present suit is against a carrier and it is a suit for compensation for non-delivery of the bundle which was consigned to the Railway and was to have been delivered by it. The limitation is one year from the date on which the goods were to have been delivered. In the present case the goods were despatched on the 16th of January 1913 and at the outside they ought to have been delivered in about a month. Therefore, the right of the plaintiff to sue for compensation arose about the middle of February 1913. The suit, however, was not instituted until the 7th of January 1919. So that on the face of it the claim was instituted long beyond time. That Article 31 applies to a case of this kind appears from the ruling of this Court in the case of Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Ganpat Rai (1). The same view was taken by the Bombay High Court in the case of Haji Ajam Goolam Hoosein v. Bombay and Persia Steam Navigation Company (2). It has been urged that Article 31 applies to a suit by the consignee and not, as in this case, by the consignor. This contention is, in my opinion, untenable. The Article is wide enough to include a suit brought by the consignor also. It provides for a suit for compensation for non delivery, that is, a suit by a person who by reason of non-delivery has sustained a loss. There may be cases in which it is not the consignee who sustains loss but the consignor. In such cases it would be a suit by the consignor for compensation for non-delivery. In the present case the consignee had nothing to do with the bags. The consignor had purchased salt from the Salt Superintendent at Sambhar and was despatching empty gunny bags for filling them with salt that he had purchased. He was the owner of the bags and the bags were to have come back to him. It is by reason of the non-delivery of the bags that he sustained the loss for which he seeks to be compensated. He sues to recover the value of the bags as also the damages which he alleges he sustained by reason of the salt not being received by him in time.

The next contention on behalf of the applicant is that the letters of the 3rd of February 1914 and the 13th of February 1914 amounted to an acknowledgment of liability. I do not agree with this contention. These letters contain no acknowledgment of any description. They only inform the plaintiff of the fact that the bundle consigned by him was lying at a certain place and his instructions as to its disposal were being awaited. This does not amount to an acknowledgment. The last letter of the 17th of March 1916, if it amounts to an acknowledgment, was a letter written long after the expiry of limitation and cannot save its operation. If Article 31 applies to the present case, as I hold it does, be plaintiff's right to bring his suit arose in February 1913 and he had one year within which to bring his suit. His claim, if brought, would have been time-barred after February 1914. The letter of the 17th of March 1916 was written long after the claim had become time barred. The letter, therefore, would not save the operation of limitation. It is lastly contended that the letter last mentioned amounted to a promise to pay and, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the basis of that promise. In my opinion the letter could not be treated as a letter making a definite promise to pay a certain sum of money to the plaintiff. It was a letter offering to settle the claim at a certain amount. That offer was not accepted. The claim is not based upon any promise to pay and cannot be regarded as such. Section 25 of the Contract Act, to which reference was made, does not seem to me to have any bearing upon the present question. I hold that the Court below was right in its view that the claim is time-barred. I accordingly dismiss the application with costs.

OUDH JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 50 OF 1919.

May 27, 1920.

Present:– Mr. Daniels, A. J. C.

Musammat MASUMAN AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

GULZARI LAL AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 50—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 12—Execution of decree—Attachment—Death of judgment-debtor—Legal representatives not impleaded—Sale, whether void—Suit to set aside sale—Limitation.

Where the property of a judgment-debtor is attached in his lifetime but he dies while the attachment is pending and the property is sold without his legal representatives being properly represented in the proceedings, the sale is merely voidable on proof of prejudice but is not void. [p. 550, col. 2.]

A suit, therefore, to set aside such a sale is governed by Article 12 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act. [p. 551, col. 1.]

First appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Hardoi, dated the 2nd August 1919.

Mr, Bisheshwar Nath Srivastava holding brief of the Hon'ble Mr. Wazir Hasan, for the Appellants.

Mr. A P. Sen, for Respondents Nos. 1 to 5 and 8 and 9.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an application to set aside an auction-sale held as far back as 1909, on the ground that the appellants, who are the widow and the minor son and daughter of the deceased judgment debtor Wazir Khan, were not properly represented in the proceedings. The property had been attached in the lifetime of Wazir Khan in the year 1908. He died while the attachment was pending. An application was made to have his son, the appellant Manzur Husain, brought on the record as his representative under the guardianship of his mother, but there was no formal order appointing her as guardian, nor was her consent obtained. Three main questions have been argued in the appeal:—

(1) Whether it was necessary to bring the legal representatives of Wazir Khan on the record before the sale took place.

(2) Whether they were properly brought on the record.

(3) Whether the suit is barred by limitation, which resolves itself into the question whether the omission to bring the legal representatives on the record, assuming that it was necessary to do so, amounted to a mere irregularity or rendered the sale altogether null and void.

Some other minor points have also been raised, one of which will be noticed below.

On the first question the appellants rely on section 50 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the other hand, there are in favour of the respondents two decisions of the Allahabad High Court, Sheo Prasad v. Hira Lal (1) and Abdur Rahman v. Shankar Dat Dube (2), the first of which is a Full Bench decision. These cases lay down that section 234 of the Code of 1882, which corresponds to section 50 of the present Code, did not apply where the property was already under attachment. The main ground of decision was that in such a case the property was already in the custody of the Court and not in the hands of the legal representatives and that the language of the second clause of the section is not applicable to property under attachment, since it was impossible for such property to be "duly disposed of." Any attempt to dispose of it would be subject to the attachment. The Madras High Court in two cases Ramasami Ayyangar v. Bagirathi Ammal (3) and Groves v. Administrator-General of Madras (4), have taken a diametrically opposite view and held that not only is it necessary to implead the representatives in such a case but the omission to do so renders the sale a nullity. The Bombay High Court in Aba v. Dhondu Bai (5) has taken an intermediate position. It holds that the omission to implead the legal representatives is an irregularity which, if they are prejudiced, may justify their getting the sale set aside but that until set aside, the sale holds good. Similar observations are to be found in at least two Calcutta cases, Net Lall Sahoo v. Kareem Bux (6) and Bepin Behari Bera v. Shashi Bhushan Datta (7).

The matter being res integra as regards this Court, I find difficulty in adopting in its entirety the reasoning of the Judges of the Allahabad High Court.

It is difficult to say that a decree has been fully executed when no property has yet been sold under it, and the slight change which has taken place in the wording of the present Code by substituting the phrase "fully satisfied" for the phrase "fully executed" tells even more strongly against the Allahabad view. It does not follow that the second clause of section 50, which applies to a particular case, is meant to limit the more general wording of the first part of the clause. Further as MR. Justice Ranade points out in the case of Abu v. Dhondu Bai (5), even if section 50 does not apply, there are certain other provisions of the Code which do appear to assume that the judgment-debtor shall have notice of the sale.

At the same time I differ from the view taken in the Madras cases that the sale under such circumstances is an absolute nullity and agree with the view which has found favour alike at Allahabad, Bombay and Calcutta that it is at most an irregularity which would justify the sale being set aside by any person prejudiced thereby. The position is entirely different from that of a decree being passed or a fresh execution taking place against a person who was not a party. Here the property of the deceased judgment-debtor was liable for satisfaction of the decree and that property had already been brought into the custody of the Court for the purpose of satisfying the decree. I respectfully adopt the reasoning of Farran, C. J., whose judgment was upheld by the Privy Council in Malkarjun v. Narhari (8). The observations are to be found at pages 340 and 341 of the report:—

"The property of the dead man is made answerable for the debt of the dead man. If the legal representative objects to this, he can come in and set the sale aside. This affords him full protection. Is he to be allowed, when the estate which has devolved upon him has had the benefit of the sale-proceeds of the property sold, to fold his hands for twelve years and see whether the property will rise in value, and then, if it does, to evict the purchaser? I cannot bring myself to believe that such is the law."

It is pointed out by the appellants that the Privy Council decision in Malkarjun v Narhari (8) has been distinguished, and it is suggested that it has been practically overruled in two later cases, Khiarajmal v. Daim (9) and Raghunath Das v. Sundar Das (10). Neither of those cases, however, are on all fours with the present. In the former a decree was obtained against the minor heir of a deceased person without his being properly represented, and the latter was a case under section 248 of the Code of 1882 corresponding to Order XXI, rule 22 of the present Code. It is common ground between the parties that the question of limitation depends on whether the sale was a nullity or was merely voidable. If it was a nullity the appellants are entitled to disregard it, and to claim possession within twelve years. If it was merely voidable, the suit is governed by Article 12 of the First Schedule of Limitation Act and is long since time-barred. The latter is, in my opinion, the true view.

Before concluding this judgment it is necessary to notice one other argument raised by the appellants. They point out that on 23rd December 1908 an order was passed striking out the execution application then pending as against Wazir Khan's property, on the ground that the judgment-debtors had up to then made no application to bring his legal representatives on the record. It is suggested that this amounts to a withdrawal of the attachment. No doubt it would do so under the present Code, but under the old Code which was then in force as interpreted by the rulings of this Court of which Ram Das v. Ram Tahal Das (11) may be cited as an example, the dismissal of an application for execution, especially when it was dismissed for default, did not amount to the raising of the attachment. This argument, therefore, has no force. It is also suggested that no fresh application for execution was before the Court, but as the whole file was not summoned either here or in the lower Court, it is impossible for the appellant to state this as a fact. It does not appear that these two arguments were ever raised in the Court below, and they cannot be accepted here.

For the reasons already given, I find that the suit is barred by limitation and I accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Section 17 of the Bundelkhand Alienation of Land Act does not apply to a decree obtained on the strength of a mortgage made after the commencement of that Act. [p. 552, col. 1.]

Inasmuch as under section 16 (2) (a) of the Provincial Insolvency Act the property of an insolvent which is exempt from attachment and sale in execution of a decree does not vest in the Receiver, and as under section 16 of the Bundelkhand Alienation of Land Act the property of a member of an agricultural tribe cannot be sold in execution of a decree, consequently, where a member of an agricultural tribe becomes an insolvent, his property does not vest in the Receiver. [p. 552, col. 2.]

Execution second appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Allahabad, dated the 16th July 1918, reversing a decree of the Munsif, Allahabad, dated the 21st of January 1918

Messrs. Jang Bahadur Lal and Shiva Prasad Sinha, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Gulzari Lal and Binoy Kumar Mukerjee, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts which have given rise to this appeal are these. One Harakh Narain, a member of an agricultural tribe to whom the Bundelkhand Land Alienation Act applies, made a mortgage of certain property in favour of one Sheo Tahal on the 17th of February 1911, i.e., after the aforesaid Act had come into operation. Sheo Tahal obtained a decree for sale on the mortgage on the 19th of June 1916 and this decree was made absolute on the 3rd of March 1917. After the making of the decree Harakh Narain was adjudged an insolvent. The decree-holder put the decree into execution and applied for sale of the mortgaged property. Thereupon Harakh Narain preferred an objection before the Court, on the ground that in view of the provisions of section 16 of the Bundelkhand Land Alienation Act the property was not liable to sale and it should not be brought to sale by the Court. This objection was overruled by the Court of first instance, which sold the property. It was purchased by the present appellant. Harakh Narain appealed against the order of the Court of first instance, and the lower Appellate Court held that the property was not liable to sale but directed proceedings to be taken under section 17 of the Bundelkhand Land Alienation Act. We may observe here that section 17 of the Act is wholly inappli cable to the present case, inasmuch as that section provides for the case of a decree passed on a mortgage made before the commencement of the Act. The mortgage in the present case having been made after the commencement of the Act, section 17 has no application to the decree obtained on the strength of such a mortgage. Section 16 of the Act provides that no land belonging to a member of an agricultural tribe shall be sold in execution of any decree or order of any Civil or Revenue Court made after the commencement of this Act. The section clearly prohibits the sale by any Court in execution of any decree or order which may have been made by a Civil or Revenue Court after the commencement of the Act. The decree in the present case was made by a Civil Court after the commencement of the Act and, therefore, the section applies to that decree and forbids the sale of the property of Harakh Narain, who is a member of an agricultural tribe. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that as a decree had already been passed against Harakh Narain for sale of the mortgaged property, it was not competent to him to object that the property was not liable to sale. This contention has, in our opinion, no force. As we have already pointed out, the section positively prohibits the sale of the property of a member of an agricultural tribe in execution of any decree. Therefore, whether Harakh Narain could raise any objection or not, the Court had no power, by reason of the provisions of this section, to sell the property, which is admittedly the property of a member of an agricultural tribe.

It is next urged that Harakh Narain having been adjudged an insolvent, his property vested in the Receiver and the Receiver not being a member of an agricultural tribe, the property in question was liable to sale and section 16 did not apply. This contention also is in our opinion without force. In the first place, the property is to be sold as the property of Harakh Narain, and not as the property of the Receiver. In the next place, this property did not vest in the Receiver, inasmuch as section 16, sub section (2), clause (a) of the Provincial Insolvency Act provides that the property which is exempted by any enactment for the time being in force from liability to attachment and sale in execution of a decree shall not vest in the Receiver. The property in this case was property which by reason of section 16 of the Bundelkhand Land Alienation Act was not liable to sale in execution of a decree and, therefore, this property did not vest in the Receiver. We are, therefore, of opinion that the objection raised, as regards the sale of the property, in the Court of first instance was a valid objection and the property was not liable to sale in execution of the mortgagee's decree. As the order, for sale was an invalid and illegal order the sale which has taken place in pursuance of that order must fall to the ground and must be deemed to be a nullity. The result is that this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

The father of a Hindu joint family transferred to his sons his full proprietary ownership in certain property which had been allotted to him on a partition of the family property and reserved to himself only a life-interest therein. A creditor of his sought to attach the property in execution of a decree against him:

Held, that section 10 of the Transfer of Property Act had no application to the transfer; that as by the transfer the father was entitled to only a life-interest in the property, this was all the creditor could attach and bring to sale in execution of his decree. [p. 553, col. 2.]

Second appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Shahjahanpur.

JUDGMENT.

RYVES, J.—I am doubtful whether on the facts the difficult questions of law which have been so elaborately argued both before Lindsay, J., and ourselves really arise.

The facts are these:—Puran Singh and his two sons, Kunr Singh and Kundan Singh (plaintiff-appellant), formed a joint Hindu family owning considerable Zamindari property. They agreed to partition this property, and this was done by two awards in 1912 according to which the undivided property was divided into three shares. By these awards Puran Singh acquired full proprietary rights in the specific property allotted to him, and he became sole owner thereof. That property included the Chaupal or "collection house" which is in dispute here.

In 1913 Kuar Singh applied to have the awards made a rule of Court. It appears that Puran Singh and Kundan Singh raised objections but ultimately they agreed to a compromise and the Court passed a decree, not indeed in terms of the awards, but in terms of the compromise which modified the awards. According to the compromise decree, Puran Singh gave up his full proprietary ownership of the property which had been allotted to him, and reserved to himself only a life interest in that property. It seems to me that Puran Singh then, after the award, as full and sole owner of his specifically allotted property was perfectly justified in doing what he liked with it. He could, if he so wished, have made a gift of this Chaupal or of any other parcel of his (now own) property to whomsoever he pleased. If he had made a gift of this Chaupal, for instance, to one or both of his sons, it could not be argued that such a gift was illegal in itself. Instead, however, of making an absolute gift of the Chaupal he gave it subject to his own life interest, in other words, the sons became owners of it subject to the father's right to enjoy its usufruct so long as he lived. Whether this transaction was done out of Court, by private treaty, or during the pendency of litigation and was finally incorporated in a Court decree, seems to me wholly immaterial. It must of course be understood that the transfer made by Puran Singh was not vitiated by fraud or made to defeat creditors. No such considerations arise in this case, although it is true that in the course of his judgment the learned Munsif observed that "the condition in the compromise derogating Puran Singh's absolute ownership in the property under the arbitration award was not a bona fide one but was evidently intended to defeat Puran Singh's creditors. Such condition in restraint is, in my opinion, void and ineffectual as against the contending defendants who were no parties to the case." This seems to me to be an inference drawn from what the learned Munsif considered the probabilites of the case, rather than a decisive finding on which he based his conclusion. This must be so because there was no proper foundation laid in the pleadings on which such a defence could be raised, and I find on examining the record no evidence at all on which it could be decided. It was not the ground of decision in either of the Courts below. The lower Appellate Court held simply that "the condition imposed in the compromise embodied in the decree that Puran Singh will have no power to transfer his separated property was void as being a restraint upon alienation, vide section 10 of Act IV of 1882 and Khiali Ram v. Raghunath Prasad (1)." In my opinion the Court has completely misconstrued and misunderstood the compromise decree. So far from being a transfer from the sons to their father with restrictions on his powers of alienation, the father transferred to his sons (subject to his life enjoyment of the usufruct) with no restrictions on their rights of alienation in the property so transferred. Hence section 10 has no application. It would have been otherwise had Puran Singh conveyed to his sons his whole proprietary rights in the property and then sought by a condition in the compromise to prevent them alienating the property.

On the facts I would hold that all that Puran Singh was entitled to was a life-interest in the property and that that was all that the creditor could attach and bring to sale in execution of his decree.

WALSH, J.—I agree. The point referred really does not arise. Out of deference to the referring order of our brother Lindsay, I will merely say that I agree with the view which he evidently took. I do not think the Transfer of Property Act applies to partitions of joint Hindu family property, nor do I think that a limited interest partitioned to one member of such a family is aimed at by section 10. In my opinion the Transfer of Property Act deals with the formal acts and documents brought into existence by parties with the object of effecting transfers and not with mere transactions which, although not in form transfers, may produce similar results. The view of our brother Lindsay seems to me to follow from the reasoning in Gyanneesa v. Mobarkanessa (2), but it is not necessary for us to decide this point.

BY THE COURT.—The result is that the relief to which the plaintiff is entitled is a declaration that Puran Singh has vested in him a life interest in the property in suit, and that no more than such life-interest or usufruct can be sold. The plaintiff, however, claimed a good deal more than this by his plaint. It is only in consequence of the Courts having gone too far in the opposite direction that it was necessary for him to come here. Under the circumstances the appeal will be allowed and the plaintiff granted a decree for a declaration in the limited sense above mentioned, but the parties must pay their own costs in all Courts.

A compromise affecting immoveable property of the value of over Rs. 100 embodied in a petition under Order XXI, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code, which has been recorded by the Court is exempt from registration under section 17 (2) of the Registration Act. [p. 557, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Tellicherry, in Appeal Suit No. 75 of 1918, (Appeal Suit No. 591 of 1916 on the file of the District Court of North Malabar), preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Nadapuram, in Original Suit No. 437 of 1915.

This second appeal came on for hearing on the 6th, 9th and 10th February 1920 before Ayling and Coutts Trotter, JJ.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. O. Madhavan Nair, for the Appellants.—The compromise deed is invalid and could not be acted upon, not being registered. See Muthayya v. Venkataratnam (1), Patha Muthammal v. Esup Rowther (2), Ravula Parti Chelamanna v. Ravula Parti Rama Row (3) and Venkatappa Nayanim Varu v. Thimma Nayanim Varu (4), which follow the Privy Council ruling in Pranal Anni v. Lakshmi Anni (5). The sub-section (2) of section 17, Registration Act, granting exemption in cases of decrees and orders does not apply to this case. The order of Court 'recorded' on the petition of compromise does not make it an executable decree of Court. It cannot be construed as giving effect to the dispositions of property contained in the document. The respondent has never sought to execute the decree. He is seeking his remedy by a separate suit.

Mr. K. P. M. Menon, for the Respondents.—The order of Court 'recorded' on the compromise petition gives it all the effect of a decree of Court. It is a judicial proceeding within the scope of the ruling in Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (6). Vide Natesa Chetty v. Vengu Nachiar (7) and Sellappa Koundan v. Gurumoorti (8).

In any event the compromise, Exhibit D, should be regarded as a 'pleading' of parties. Section 17 of the Registration Act does not apply to pleadings, Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (6).

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

AYLING, J.—In the suit out of which this second appeal arises plaintiff sued for possession of certain properties which fell to his share under a compromise embodied in a document filed as Exhibit D. Exhibit D was not registered, but was filed in Court under Order XXI, rule 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure in execution proceedings arising out of a partition decree. To quote from the judgment of the lower Appellate Court (paragraph 4), "Plaintiff obtained a decree for recovery of his share in joint properties including the plaint property in Original Suit No. 250 of 1906. The properties were divided in execution of that decree and plaintiff was put in possession of his specific share. There was resistance. The co-sharers amicably settled all the disputes and effected the compromise contained in Exhibit D. That was presented to the Court and Court recorded it."

It is contended on behalf of appellants (defendants) that Exhibit D is invalid for want of registration and this contention was accepted by the District Munsif. The lower Appellate Court has taken a different view, and holds:

"I do not understand how the compromise is not valid and title has not passed to plaintiff under it. The Court had nothing further to do in the matter, as plaintiff admitted having obtained his share under the decree by the compromise. This order of the Court embodying the agreement, being a judicial proceeding, is exempted from registration." The passage quoted indicates a certain confusion, or at any rate lack of distinction, between the document containing the compromise and the order of the Court recording it: but the Subordinate Judge, I take it, means to hold that by virtue of the order "recorded" passed on it, the compromise deed, Exhibit D, obtains the same validity as if it had been legally registered. The correctness of this view has been strenuously debated before us. Counsel for appellants relies on a series of cases, Muthayya v. Venkataratnam (1), Patha Muthammal v. Esup Rowther (2), Ravula Parti Chelamanna v. Ravula Parti Rama Rou (3) and Venkatappa Nayanim Varu v. Thimma Nayanim Varu (4), all based on a ruling of the Privy Council reported as Pranal Anni v. Lakshmi Anni (5). As against these, two other cases of this Court are quoted, Natesa Chetty v Vengu Nachiar (7) and Sellappa Koundan v Gurumoorti (8), which are based in their turn on the concluding passage of the judgment of the Privy Council in Bindesri Naik v Ganga Saran Sahu (6).

Speaking for myself, with all deference to the learned Judges who have taken the opposite view, I cannot but feel that the contention of appellants' Counsel and the decision of the District Munsif are correct. Section 17 of the Registration Act grants exemption from registration to "decrees and orders of Courts." But I do not see how it can be held that the Court's order "recorded" on Exhibit D can be interpreted as embodying and giving effect to the dispositions of property set forth in Exhibit D. The decree passed in Original Suit No. 250 of 1906 was final and could only be modified by way of appeal or review, neither of which procedure was resorted to. It seems to me futile to suggest, as the learned Counsel for respondent has done, that the Court accepted the compromise arrived at by the parties, and by its order "recorded" substituted, as it were, a decree in accordance therewith for the decree it had itself passed. If this were so, why has not respondent sought to execute this substituted decree? and how comes he to be seeking his remedy by separate suit? Exhibit D was admittedly presented under Order XXI, rule 2, as a certificate of adjustment of the decree: and, as I read the rule, the duty of the Court was simply to record the fact that the decree had been adjusted and that no further proceedings could be taken in execution of it.

But it is argued that Exhibit D should be regarded as a "pleading" of parties: and that the Privy Council has held in Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (6) that section 17 of the Registration Act does not apply to pleadings filed by parties any more than to orders of Courts. The concluding passage in their Lordships' judgment in that case has certainly been interpreted in this sense by the learned Judges in Natesa Chetty v. Vengu Nachiar (7). If this interpretation is correct, it is to my mind impossible to reconcile the dictum in Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (6) with the decision of the Privy Council in Pranal Anni v. Lakshmi Anni (5). Personally I am inclined to think their Lordships in the former case merely intended to imply that the exemption from registration extended to an order of Court, even if it was necessary to import into it the contents of pleadings so as to make it intelligable. Such a method of interpretation would apparently have been necessary in the case before them.

But whatever my own view may be, we are pressed by the fact that contradictory views have been expressed on the point by two Benches of this Court in Natesa Chetty v. Vengu Nachiar (7) and Ravula Parti Chelamanna v. Ravula Parti Rama Row (3). Moreover in Sellappa Koundan v. Gurumoorti (8), decided after the latter case another Bench has expressly confirmed the view taken in Natesa Chetty v. Vengu Nachiar (7), after considering both cases. It is clear, therefore, that there is a difference which can only be decided by a Full Bench. I have not overlooked the fact that both the cases deal with compromises filed in pending suits and have considered whether the present case might be distinguished on that ground, and effect given to the view which I hold to be correct. The same principle might, however, govern both classes of cases: and the difference of opinion is on a point of great importance and based on the interpretation of judgments of the Privy Council. I, therefore, think the best course is to refer the following question to a Full Bench.

Is a compromise affecting immoveable property of the value of over Rs. 100 embodied in a petition under Order XXI, rule 2, which has been recorded by the Court, exempt from registration?

COUTTS TROTTER, J.—I concur in the proposed reference. My Lord has so fully discussed the case-law on the subject that it would be useless for me to go over the same ground again. A perusal of the cases shows a distinct line of cleavage of opinion. One view is that a compromise incorporated in a decree is exempted from registration only because and in so far as its terms become part of the decree: from which it would follow that any terms of a compromise which travelled outside of the issues in the suit would require registration, if they purported to deal with immoveable property over Rs. 100 in value. They could not properly be embodied in the decree, and even if they were, the result would be the same; for quoad those terms, the decree would be travelling outside the ambit of its jurisdiction. In favour of this strict construction is the decision of the Privy Council in Pranal Anni v. Lakshmi Anni (5) and the later cases in Allahabad, and the settled current of recent decisions in Calcutta.

The other view is that expressed in Natesa Chetty v. Vengu Nachiar (7) and the earlier Allahabad cases; the underlying principle of which no doubt is that publicity—the object which registration aims at—is sufficiently attained by the production and recording of documents in Court. The origin of the doctrine appears to be an expression used in the judgment delivered by Lord Watson in Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (6), where he says that the provisions of section 17 of the Registration Act "do not apply to proper judicial proceedings, whether consisting of pleadings filed by the parties or of orders made by the Court." Now, I do not think that that reference to the pleadings is necessarily inconsistent with the stricter view. For if the terms of a compromise are only binding when they become part of the judgment, and the judgment itself is only binding in so far as it relates to matters over which the Court had jurisdiction in the suit, it would clearly be necessary to refer to the pleadings to ascertain, if the question arose whether the Court in fact had jurisdiction or not. My own opinion is that the sentence has been put to a use in Natesa Chetty v. Vengu Nachiar (7) which it was not designed to indicate: and that the decision in that case is contrary to the principles laid down in Pranal Anni v. Lakshmi Anni (5). But what is really important is that the matter should be definitely settled one way or the other for this Court, so that practitioners can give their clients clear advice: and this can only be done by a Full Bench in a duly authoritative manner.

JAGMOHAN NARAIN v. GRISH BABU.

This second appeal coming on for hearing on the 7th April 1920 in pursuance of the above Order of Reference to a Full Bench, upon perusing the grounds of appeal, the judgments and decrees of the lower Appellate Court and the Court of first instance and the material papers in the suit and the said Order of Reference to a Full Bench and upon hearing the arguments of the Counsel, and the case having stood over for consideration till this day, the Court expressed the following OPINION.—Where, as in the present case, after decree, a petition has been presented under Order XXI, rule 2, to the Court whose duty it was to execute the decree, certifying, as required by the rule, that the decree has been adjusted and praying that the petition, setting out the terms on which the decree has been adjusted, should be recorded, and the order "recorded" has been passed upon it, the order must be read as referring to the petition which it would have set out in full, if it had been formally drawn up. It is in effect an order that the petition should be recorded as certifying the adjustment of the decree on the terms stated in the petition, in compliance with the requirements of the rule. In these circumstances the petition is exempted from registration by virtue of the exception in sub section 2 of section 17 of the Indian Registration Act in favour of "any decree or order of a Court," and the question referred to us must be answered in the affirmative. The recent decision of the Privy Council in Hemanta Kumari Debi v. Midnapore Zemindari Company Limited (9) has settled the differences of opinion which are referred to in the order of reference as to the interpretation of Lord Macnaghten's judgment in Pranal Anni v. Lakshmi Anni (5). Their Lordships point out that the word "decree" in section 17 of the Registration Act "must be read in connection with the purpose of the Statute, which is to provide a method of public registration of documents, and there is, therefore, no reason why a limit should be imposed on the meaning of the word so as to confine it to the operative portion only of the decree." The same reasoning of course applies to the other word "order" with which we are now concerned. Their Lordships proceed to distinguish their earlier decision in Kader Moideen v. Nepean (10) on the ground that in that case the order on the compromise petition had not in fact narrated or referred to the Razinamah in so far as it mentioned lands which were not the subject of the suit, whereas in the case before them the decree recited the petition for compromise and set out its terms in full. That decree, they held, made no difference between one part of the compromise and another but incorporated the whole; or in other words, was a decree which, though affecting the lands in suit as a decree, incorporated the whole agreement which led to the suit being compromised. Registration of the agreement was, therefore, unnecessary, as the decree was sufficient evidence of its terms. This decision entirely covers the present case and we must answer the question in the affirmative and overrule the decisions on this question in Ravula Parti Chelamanna v. Ravula Parti Rama Row (3) and Venkattappa Nayanim Varu v. Thimma Nayanim Varu (4) which followed it.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 247—Minor, whether can be adjudicated insolvent—Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907), s. 42—Court, power of, to annul adjudication.

MUHAMMAD MUMTAZ ALI KHAN v. UGRAJ SINGH.

In view of the terms of section 247 of the Contract Act, the adjudication of a minor as insolvent is illegal.

Where a person has been adjudged insolvent, who ought not to have been so adjudged, the Court has power, under section 42 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, to annul the adjudication.

First appeal from an order of the District Judge, Allahabad.

Mr. Girdharilal Agarwala, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of insolvency proceedings. Apparently there was a partnership firm which, at the time of the application for adjudication, consisted of two partners, Banke Behari Lal and a minor called Grish Babu. Certain creditors applied for an adjudication, not that the firm itself had gone bankrupt, but that the two persons who constituted the firm had become bankrupt and should be adjudged insolvents. The application being in this form, the Judge separated the case into two parts. The case of Banke Behari Lal has been settled otherwise. Notice was issued to the minor's mother, but nobody appeared and the Judge passed a final order declaring the minor to be an insolvent. Subsequently an application was made on behalf of the minor that he could not legally be declared an insolvent and, therefore, the order should be annulled under section 42 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. This was opposed. The District Judge has held that a minor cannot be declared an insolvent and has annulled the adjudication in the case of the minor. One of the creditors has appealed here. The point is already covered by a decision of the Calcutta High Court to be found in the case of Sanyasi Charan Mandal v. Asutosh Ghosh (1). The portion of the judgment which covers this point is to be found at page 231*. As the learned Judges who decided the case have pointed out, section 247 of the Indian Contract Act is very clear. It sets forth that "a person who is under the age of majority according to the law to which he is subject may be admitted to the benefits of a partnership but cannot be made personally liable for any obligation of the firm, but the share of such minor in the property of the firm is liable for the obligations of the firm." If the application had been directed simply against the minor's interests in the firm, there would have been no difficulty. The law is perfectly clear. The present application is directed against the minor himself personally and the order of adjudication is clearly wrong in view of the terms of section 247 of the Contract Act. It is urged that the District Judge had no power to annul the adjudication. We do not think there is any force in the contention, for the section clearly says that "where in the opinion of the Court a debtor ought not to have been adjudged insolvent the Court shall, on the application of the debtor or of any other person interested, annul the adjudication." It is obvious that in the present case the minor ought not to have been adjudged an insolvent, and the Court, therefore, had power to annul the adjudication. There is, therefore, no force in this appeal. It is still open to the creditors to make a proper application against the firm and the minor's interests in that firm. We make no order as to costs as the opposite party is not represented.

Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), s. 61—Adverse possession—Landlord and tenant—Tenant claiming to be under-proprietor—Hostile title—Ejectment proceedings.

In 1892 a notice of ejectment was served upon B. by the Taluqdar. The notice was contested by B., who alleged himself to be an under-proprietor and not liable to ejectment by notice. In 1893 the Rent Court set aside the notice and held that B.'s status was superior to that of an ordinary tenant. In 1905 the Taluqdar filed a suit against B. for proprietary possession but his suit was dismissed. Subsequently in 1910 he obtained a decree against B. for arrears of rent, and took steps to have him ejected under section 61 of the Oudh Rent Act, and obtained an ex parte order for possession in 1911. B. died and his son brought a suit in the Rent Court under section 108 of the Oudh Rent Act to contest the ejectment, which was dismissed. Thereupon he brought a civil suit to be restored to possession of the holding:

Held, that the order of the Rent Court of 1893 was adverse to the Taluqdar, and as B's possession was not disturbed till after the lapse of more than 18 years from the first certain date on which the Talukdar had notice of hostile title, the dispossession of B. was illegal, as at the time when the order of ejectment was obtained B. had acquired the status of an under-proprietor by adverse possession. [p. 560, col. 1.]

In considering the question of adverse possession the nature of the possession set up is to be looked to, and that is to be judged by the acts of the person in possession. [p. 560, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree and judgment of the District Judge, Gonda, dated the 9th February 1917, upholding the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge, Gonda, dated the 22nd December 1916.

Mr. Raja Prasad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Ram Chandra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit brought by the plaintiff Ugraj Singh to recover possession of certain lands measuring 52 bighas 11 biswas kham. There was also a claim for Rs. 150 by way of mesne profits. The principal defendant in the suit was Raja Mohammad Mamtaz Ali Khan, the Raja of Utraula who is the appellant before me. He admittedly is the Taluqdar of the village in which the lands in dispute are situated.

In order to understand the facts of the case set up by the plaintiff, it is necessary in the first place to mention that he is the son of one Bairam Singh. It is admitted that some time in the year 1892, or in the beginning of 1893, the Taluqdar issued a notice of ejectment against Bairam Singh in respect of the fields now in dispute. This notice was contested by Bairam Singh, who alleged himself to be an under-proprietor. He claimed that he could not be ejected by notice. This plea of his was upheld by the Rent Court on the 9th of May 1893. The Rent Court held that the status of Bairam Singh was superior to that of an ordinary tenant and consequently the notice was set aside. Nothing seems to have happened after this till the year 1905, when the Taluqdar filed a suit for proprietary possession against Bairam Singh. This claim was decreed in the first Court but was dismissed in appeal by the District Judge and a second appeal preferred by the Raja to this Court was likewise dismissed on the 8th of August 1906. Subsequent to this date, that is to say, in August 1910, the Taluqdar obtained a decree for arrears of rent against Bairam Singh. Having got this decree against him, he took steps to have him ejected under section 61 of the Oudh Rent Act and got an order for possession on the 29th of June 1911. It appears from the record that the decree for the arrears of rent and the order for ejectment were obtained ex parte. After this Bairam Singh died and the plaintiff, his son brought a suit in the Rent Court under section 108 of the Oudh Rent Act, alleging that he and his father had been unlawfully dispossessed, that he was an under-proprietor and that he could not be ejected under section 51. This suit was dismissed by the Rent Court, and now we have the present suit which Ugraj Singh has brought in the Civil Court for the purpose of being restored to possession of the holding which was once in the occupation of his father. The plaintiff alleged himself to be a Birtdar, but the Courts below have found that it has not been proved that any grant of Birt right was ever made to him or his predecessor-in interest. The Subordinate Judge, however, has found, and the learned District Judge has agreed with him, that long before Bairam Singh was put out of possession in June 1911 he had acquired by prescription the status of an under-proprietor. If this finding is correct, and I may say at once that I think it is, the appeal must fail; and so much was conceded by the learned Counsel who appears here for the appellant. The argument before me has been that no case of the acquisition of under-proprietary title by prescription has been made out on the facts established. The point in contention had been that inasmuch as the Rent Court in the year 1893 did not decide that Bairam Singh had under-proprietary rights in this holding, there was no obligation upon the Taluqdar to file any suit for declaration and that consequently the assertion in those proceedings by Bairam Singh of his status as an under proprietor did amount to what the law understands as an assertion of adverse title. The argument does not appeal to me, for in the first place it seems to me that it cannot be maintained that the order of the Rent Court passed in May 1893 was not adverse to the Raja. It certainly was adverse because the result of it was that the attempt which the Raja was making to eject Bairam Singh failed. The Rent Court set aside the notice which had been issued to him and held that he was not liable to be ejected by notice. It does not seem to me to matter whether the Rent Court in those proceedings decided or did not decide that Bairam Singh was an under-proprietor. When we are considering the plea of adverse possession, what we have to look at is the nature of the adverse possession set up, and that is to be judged by the acts of the person in possession. It is not to be doubted that Bairam Singh openly gave the Raja notice in those proceedings that he was claiming to hold these lands as an under proprietor, and as the Court of first instance points out, it is proved by the evidence of the Patwari who was summoned as the appellant's own witness in this case that all along Bairam Singh insisted that he was the under proprietor of the lands in question. This being so, it seems to me impossible to find in favour of the appellant that the decision of the Courts below was wrong. On the contrary I think the decision is right, and it must be taken that since the year 1893 Bairam Singh continued to remain in possession of these lands under an open claim that he was holding them as under proprietor. His possession was not disturbed until the year 1911, that is to say, till after the lapse of more than 18 years from the first date upon which we can say for certain that an open notice of hostile title was given to the Raja. I agree with the Courts below, therefore, that at the time the ejectment order under section 61 was obtained by the Raja, Bairam Singh had acquired the status of an under proprietor by adverse possession. It follows necessarily that he was not liable to be ejected under the provisions of that section and the Courts below were, therefore, right in holding that his dispossession was illegal. I find, therefore, definitely in favour of the plaintiff-respondent that he is under proprietor of the lands in suit.

It is not necessary for me in view of this finding to discuss the other matters which are set out in the memorandum of second appeal. It is clear that on this finding the appellant's case cannot possibly succeed.

The result is that I affirm the judgment of the Court below and dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

CIVIL REVISION No. 56 OF 1919.

March 1, 1920.

Present:—Justice Sir P. C. Banerji, KT.

FATEMA BEGAM—PETITIONER

IMDAD ALI—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 24—Transfer of case—District Judge, jurisdiction of—Notice, whether necessary.

A District Judge may of his own motion transfer a case from one subordinate Court to another within his jurisdiction without notice to the parties; but where a party applies for a transfer, he is bound under section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code to issue notice and hear the parties before making an order for transfer, and if he omits to do so, he acts without jurisdiction and his order is liable to be set aside. [p. 561, col. 1.]

Civil revision from an order of the District Judge, Agra, dated the 2nd March 1913.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Applicant.

Mr. Panna Lal, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an order of the District Judge of Agra transferring a suit from the Court of the Munsif of Agra to that of the Subordinate Judge. It appears that the present applicant Musammat Fatema Begam brought a suit in the Court of the Munsif of Agra against Imdad Ali for his ejectment from a house. That suit was contested and evidence was adduced by both parties before the Munsif. On the 5th of March 1918 the Munsif proceeded to write his judgment. While he was doing so, an application was made to him by the defendant asking him not to proceed with the decision of the suit as he, the defendant, intended to apply to the District Judge for a transfer of the case. This application apparently was not granted, but the defendant went to the Court of the District Judge the same day and filed an application for transfer on the ground that a suit relating to the same property instituted by a third party, namely, the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha was pending in the Subordinate Judge's Court. The District Judge ordered the record to be sent for and notice to issue to Musammat Fatema Begam, but it seems that he did so after hearing the Pleader for the applicant and a Pleader who had appeared in the Munsif's Court for Fatema Begam but who did not appear as Pleader in the District Judge's Court in the matter of the transfer but happened to be present. When the record came, the learned District Judge appears to have considered the matter and on the 10th of March he ordered the transfer of the case. Section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code provides that when an application is made by any of the parties for the transfer of a case, the Court is to issue a notice and after hearing such of the parties as desire to be heard, it may make an order for transfer. In the present case the learned Judge, as stated above, made an order for the issue of notice. He now reports that no notice was issued and no date was fixed for hearing the plaintiff whose case was sought to be transferred from the Munsif's Court. In the explanation which the learned District Judge had furnished upon a reference made by this Court, he does not say that after examining the record he made an order of transfer of his own motion. Of course he was competent to transfer a case from one subordinate Court to another of his own motion and in such a case he was not bound to issue notice. But where upon an application of one of the parties (as in the present case) he ordered a transfer, he was bound to issue notice and hear the parties before he made any order of transfer. The learned Judge, therefore, in ordering the transfer before issuing the notice which he had ordered to be issued and before hearing the other side, acted without jurisdiction and his order must be set aside. I accordingly set aside the order of transfer and send back the case to the learned District Judge with directions to take up the application for transfer and issue notice to the other side fixing a date for hearing and on the date so fixed, to hear the parties, if any of them desire to be heard, and then to pass such orders as he may think fit.

Order set aside.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

CIVIL APPEAL No. 2 OF 1918.

February 5, 1919.

Present:—Sir Lancelot Sanderson, KT., Chief Justice, and Justice Sir John Woodroffe, KT.

IN THE MATTER OF INDIAN COMPANIES ACT

AND

THE COMPANY—APPELLANT

THE Maharaja Bahadur SIR RAMESWAR SINGH, G. C. I. E., OF DARBHANGA —RESPONDENT.

Companies Act (VII of 1913), ss. 162, 163 (i)—Winding-up petition by creditor—Application by company to remove winding-up petition from file of Court, dismissal of Appeal, whether lies—Abuse of process of Court—Bona fide dispute as to indebtedness of company, effect of—"Neglected to pay", meaning of.

A creditor presented a winding-up petition against a company under section 163 (i) of the Companies Act The company thereupon made an application to remove the winding-up petition from the file of the Court and for stay of all proceedings in connection therewith, on the ground that the winding-up petition was an abuse of the process of the Court and also on the ground that the winding-up petition was presented by the creditor with an ulterior object, viz, to put pressure on the company to accept terms of settlement in a litigation which was pending between the company and the creditor. At the time of these applications two suits were already pending between the company and the creditor for the enforcement of the claim of each against the other The Court of first instance dismissed the application of the company for the removal of the winding-up petition of the creditor from the file of the Court, but directed that the company would be at liberty to appeal against the order of dismissal under certain terms:

Held, (1) that having regard to the terms of the order giving effect to the judgment, an appeal was competent against the judgment under clause 15 of the Letters Patent; [p. 566, col 2.]

(2) that the learned Judge was not right in dismissing the company's application in toto; [p. 566, col 1.]

(3) that the proper order to be made, under the circumstances of the case, would be that the winding-up proceedings be stayed until the determination of the two suits between the company and the creditor. [p. 566, col. 1 ]

When a company is solvent and there is ground for supposing that there is a bona fide dispute as to a substantial part of the debt on which a winding-up petition is based under section 163 (1) of the Companies Act, the proper course for the creditor is to file a suit and not to make an application under section 163 (i). [p. 566, col. 1 ]

It is a well-recognised principle that the Court has inherent jurisdiction to stay proceedings when they amount to an abuse of its process. [p. 565, col. 2 ]

When a debt is bona fide disputed by a debtor company, it cannot be said to have "neglected to pay" the debt within the meaning of section 163 (i) of the Companies Act [p. 566, col. 1 ]

Appeal against the decision of Mr Justice Greaves, date the 21st December 1917.

Mr. A. N Chaudhuri (with him Mr. B. K. Lahiri), for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal by the company against the judgment of Greaves, J., delivered on the 21st December 1917.

On the 13th December 1917 a winding up petition against the company was presented; on the presentation of the petition a day was fixed for the hearing and directions were given as to the issue of advertisements. On the same day the company made an application to stay the issue of the advertisements in order that an application might be made by the company for the stay of the petition and all proceedings in connection therewith, on the ground that the petition was an abuse of the process of the Court.

The learned Judge stayed the issue of the advertisements and on the 14th December a notice was served by the company on the petitioning creditor of an application for an order that the petition for the liquidation of the company should be removed from the file, that the applicant should be restrained from issuing advertisement of the petition and that all proceedings thereunder should be stayed.

The learned Judge heard the company's application and dismissed it, and it is from his judgment in respect thereof that this appeal is brought.

The respondent took a preliminary objection, which was much pressed, that no appeal lay from the judgment of Greaves, J.

We held that having regard to the terms of the order giving effect to the judgment, there was an appeal.*

The order, as already pointed out in our previous judgment, dealt with two main matters. In the first place, it dismissed the appellant company's application to remove

*The following is the judgment in appeal:—

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal from a decision of my learned brother Mr. Justice Greaves, which was given upon an application made by the company to take the petition for the liquidation of the company which had been presented by the petitioner from the file and the application also asked that the petitioner should be restrained from issuing an advertisement of the petition and that all proceedings thereunder should be stayed. The learned Judge dismissed the application, and it is from that decision that this appeal has been preferred

On behalf of the respondent a preliminary point was taken that no appeal lies.

Sir Benode Mitter yesterday drew our attention to section 102 of the Indian Companies Act of 1913, which is one of the sections dealing with the winding-up of companies, and which provides as follows: "Re-hearings of, and appeals from, any order or decision made or given in the matter of the winding-up of a company by the Court may be had in the same manner and subject to the same conditions in and subject to which appeals may be had from any order or decision of the same Court in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction." It was argued that that was the only section dealing with the matter of appeals from decisions made in the winding-up of companies, and that consequently the right of appeal depended upon clause 15 of the Letters Patent which applied to this Court further, that the decision of the learned Judge in this matter was not a "judgment" within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent, and that is the point which we have to decide in the first instance.

Now, the application to remove the petition from the file was based upon certain grounds which are referred to in the learned Judge's judgment After considering those points he came to the conclusion that at all events at that stage of the proceedings he ought not to accede to the petitioner's request; and he said at the end of his judgment, "For these reasons I do not think, I ought to accede to the application that is made to me at this stage, and I think that the Court ought only to interfere in a case of this kind in limine, if there is an absolutely overwhelming case"

The matter, however, does not rest there, because upon that judgment being given an order of the Court was drawn up: and that order after providing that the application is thereby dismissed with costs goes on as follows: "And it is further ordered that the said company be at liberty to prefer an appeal against this order and upon their undertaking to apply for expedition of the hearing of such appeal if preferred, and upon their paying to the respondent's petition for liquidation from the file and to restrain the issue of advertisement and to stay all proceedings thereunder. Secondly, it ordered that the appellant company be at liberty to appeal against this order of dismissal upon their undertaking to expedite the hearing of the appeal; and upon their paying to the Maharaja the respondent two lakhs and nine thousand rupees without prejudice to their contentions, it was ordered that the petition for winding up be stayed pending the disposal of the appeal, and it then directed that if the appeal was decreed the Maharaja should return the two lakhs and nine thousand rupees to the company; but if it was dismissed, the Maharaja was to withdraw the petition for winding up; on which, of course, he would retain the sum so paid.

the said Maharaja the sum of rupees two lacs and nine thousand without prejudice to their contentions it is further ordered that all proceedings on the petition for winding-up the company presented by the said Maharaja on the 14th day of December instant be stayed pending the disposal of the said appeal: and it is further ordered that the said Maharaja do return the said sum of rupees two lacs and nine thousand to the said company should the said appeal be decreed, but if the said appeal be dismissed, the said Maharaja do withdraw his petition for winding-up and that the said company in that event do pay the Maharaja costs of and incidental to the said petition and the proceedings thereon."

Now, it is clear from what has been stated by the learned Counsel that the order was not a consent order. I think that if it had been a consent order, the learned Counsel, Mr. Sarkar, agreed that it would not have been open to the respondent to take this preliminary point that there is no right of appeal, because it would have been clear that the order had been drawn up upon the basis that there was a right of appeal and that these terms had been arrived at upon the assumption that the Court of Appeal would hear the appeal and would decide the points which were at issue between the parties But as I have said it was not a consent order It is true that the learned Counsel for the purpose of assisting the Court drew up what they considered were some of the terms of the order but there is no doubt that the learned Judge after considering those draft minutes himself settled the order, and it is an order of the Court

Now, what is the effect of that order? It is this: Under that order the sum of rupees two lacs and nine thousand has been paid to the petitioners If this appeal is not heard on account of this preliminary point, and the appeal is dismissed, the order of Mr. Justice Greaves will stand and the Maharaja will retain the two lacs and nine thousand rupees, and there can be no further question with respect to his right thereto: the decision will be final The result, in my opinion, is that the terms of the order read with the judgment make the decision of Mr Justice Greaves a "judgment" within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent.

The learned Counsel, Sir Benode, yesterday argued that the four points which had been raised before Mr. Justice Greaves could be raised at the hearing of the petition and would then be finally gone into and decided Having regard to what I have said, it is clear that if this appeal is dismissed, those points could not be gone into at the hearing of the petition because the judgment of Mr Justice Greaves will stand and the order which is based upon that judgment will also stand, and by reason of the terms of the order if this appeal is dismissed the Maharaja will retain the money and the petition is to be withdrawn and there will be no further hearing of the petition Consequently I think this is a "judgment" within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent and that there is a right of appeal.

I desire to add that the circumstances of this case are peculiar and quite out of the ordinary having regard to the facts I have mentioned and are not likely to create any precedent for any further case: and further, to say that having decided that there is a right of appeal, when we come to hear the appeal it may be necessary for us to deal with the point which has been raised by Mr. Sirkar at the end of his address this morning, namely, that his client, having regard to the form of the application, did not place before the Court all the evidence which he had at his disposal upon the points which were at issue; When we come to hear the appeal, in my judgment it may be necessary for us to hear the learned Counsel upon that question and come to a conclusion upon it. It is not necessary for me at the present moment to say anything more upon that matter The only point which I now decide is that there is a right of appeal.

WOODROFFE, J.- I also think that an appeal lies. This application was one to quash the winding-up proceedings so far as they had gone, on the ground that they constituted an abuse of process of Court

It was argued on behalf of the respondent that no appeal lay, because it was said that the findings of Mr. Justice Greaves were not final but merely given for the purposes of the particular application before him and that all the questions dealt with in the judgment would be open on the further proceedings taken upon the petition. But this matter cannot be determined solely with reference to the judgment to which the argument made reference. In consequence of the judgment of Mr Justice Greaves an order which is not a consent order was on the same date made That order assumes that there is a right of appeal and proceeds to determine what will happen when the appeal is heard, according as that appeal is determined one way or the other. The order, after stating that the application of the Bank was dismissed, provided that the company be at liberty to prefer an appeal against that order: and it concludes as follows:— "And it is further ordered that the said Maharaja do return the said sum of rupees two lacs and nine thousand to the said company should the said appeal

THE COMPANY v. RAMESWAR SINGH.

After we had given judgment, basing our decision on the second part of the directions in this order, without deciding what would have been the case had those directions not been contained in the order, Mr. Sircar for the respondent said that he would consent to the second part of the order being reserved. This was done with the view to a contention that if this part of the order was removed, there would be no appeal as regards the remaining part of the order dismissing the appellant's application for stay of winding-up proceedings. This proposal was not assented to by Counsel for the appellant company, who contended that the order and the appeal therefrom must be dealt with as a whole. This contention was right. The respondent could not, after our judgment had been given, holding that there was an appeal from the whole order, by any such offer as to part of the order, affect the judgment so as to make it necessary to give a second judgment on the question whether there would or would not be an appeal, had the order been made without the second class of directions to which I have referred.

be decreed, but if the said appeal be dismissed, the said Maharaja do withdraw his petition for winding-up and that the said company in that event do pay the Maharaja the costs of and incidental to the said petition and the proceedings thereon" an it have been intended that objection was going to be taken that no appeal lay or did the learned udge, who passed the order, think that no appeal lay? The answer must, I think, be in the negative. To hold now that no appeal does in fact lie would have this effect, that the Maharaja would retain without possibility of return the Rs. 2,08,000 upon the judgment of Mr. Justice Greaves which would be final without possibility of further proceedings or appeal.

Sir Benode Mitter argued that all the questions dealt with in the judgment would be open on the further hearing. But this is not the fact. They can never be argued again if this appeal be dismissed, because, according to the order if the appeal be dismissed, then the Maharaja retains the money paid to him and withdraws his petition, bringing those proceedings to an end, so far as the petitioner Maharaja is concerned. The effect of the order passed is thus to make the judgment which preceded it final I think there is, under the circumstances of this case which are peculiar, an appeal. It is not necessary, having regard to these peculiar features of the case, to enter into a discussion of the more general argument on the question of appeal which was addressed to us. Whether, as Mr. Sarkar argues, the issues should be tried on further evidence is a matter, as pointed out by the Chief Justice, to be determined on the appeal when admitted.

We accordingly held that the appeal should be heard on the merits which has now been done.

Sections 162 and 163 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, are applicable to this case.

By section 162 it is provided that a company may be wound up by the Court if the company is unable to pay its debts. Section 163 sets out three sets of conditions under which the company shall be deemed to be unable to pay its debts. Sub-section (iii) does not apply, as the learned Judge found that the company was solvent, and the arguments of the learned Counsel for the respondent have not satisfied us that the learned Judge's conclusion on this point was wrong. Sub-section (ii) was not alleged to apply, and it was sub section (i) which was relied on by the petitioner. Sub section (i) runs as follows:—"If a creditor, by assignment or otherwise, to whom the company is indebted in a sum exceeding five hundred rupees then due, has served on the company, by leaving the same at its registered office, a demand under his hand requiring the company to pay the sum so due and the company has for three weeks thereafter neglected to pay the sum, or to secure or compound for it to the reasonable satisfaction of the creditor...."

The demand prescribed by the sub section was served by the respondent upon the appellant company on the 2nd October 1917 by which a sum of Rs. 2,41,355 was demanded. That sum not having been paid within the specified time, the petition was presented, as already stated, on the 13th December 1917.

The two main grounds on which the appellant company relied were, 1st, that there was a bona fide dispute as to the indebtedness of the company, and (2) that the petition was presented with an ulterior object, viz., to bring pressure on the company to accept terms of settlement in litigation which was proceeding between the company and the ex-directors of the company, of whom the respondent was one, and so to bring such litigation to an end.

It appears that in August 1915 the company filed a suit against the ex directors of the company, including the respondent in this appeal, claiming a sum over six lakhs as damages for fraud and negligence. It was stated in the course of the argument that when this suit came on for trial in August 1917, the charge of fraud against the respondent was withdrawn.

In December 19 5 one R. Mukerjee instituted a suit against the appellant company and the respondent for the recovery of certain deeds and securities which the plaintiff alleged he had pledged to the appellant company as security for advances made, and which he alleged were wrongfully retained by the respondent, after the plaintiff had paid off the amount due from him to the appellant company.

In April 1916 the respondent instituted a suit against the appellant company for the recovery of Rs. 2,83,747 alleged to be due to him in respect of principal and interest on account of advances made by him to the company, and this sum comprised the alleged debt upon which the winding-up petition was based. In this suit the company set up certain defences, amongst them being allegations:—

(1) That the respondent, being a director of the company, was not entitled to contract with the company and to charge any interest on the deposits made by him or to make any profits out of any transaction with the appellant company, and that he was liable to account in respect of any profits made by him.

In this connection the company relied upon a statement in the affidavit of R. Mukerjee, upon which the application to Greaves, J., was based, that the respondent while he was a director was paid a much larger rate of interest on deposits made by him than was paid under the rates of the appellant company to the outside public for deposits of a similar nature.

(2) The appellant company further alleged that certain securities, pledged with the company, had been improperly deposited with the respondent without the authority of the re-constituted Board of Directors, which had come into existence in May 1914, and that such securities were wrongfully and improperly withheld by the respondent, by reason whereof the company had suffered loss, and they claimed damages in respect thereof to the extent of Rs. 50,000 In this respect, it was alleged that the respondent insisted upon the market value of the securities being paid to him in reduction of his debt, before he would give up such securities.

By reason of the aforementioned matters it was alleged that the company had a set-off against the respondent's claim, and they also counter claimed in respect thereof, and alleged that upon an account being taken hardly any money would be found due to the respondent.

The trial of the respondent's suit against the company, although the suit stood in the cause list, dated 9th June 1917, which was shown to us, before the company's suit against the ex-directors, was postponed until after the determination of the company's suit.

There is a dispute as to how this came to be done and as to whether it was with the consent of the respondent or against his wishes; but the fact remains that the repondent's suit has not yet been heard, whereas the trial of the company's suit was begun in August 1917 and now stands adjourned part-heard, and we were informed that a day in the present month has been fixed for the further hearing.

As regards R. Mukerjee's suit, the position is that a decree has been obtained by the plaintiff in that suit against the company and the respondent, and the question of liability for costs between the two co-defendants stands over until after the trial of the company's suit.

It is alleged on behalf of the company that under these circumstances there was a bona fide dispute as to the indebtedness of the company to the respondent, and that the presentation of the winding up petition was an abuse of the process of the Court

There is no doubt that the Court has inherent jurisdiction to stay proceedings where they amount to an abuse of its process: this is a well recognised principle.

And it was argued that in this case the company had not 'neglected' to pay the sum demanded within the meaning of section 163 (1) of the Indian Companies Act. Reliance was placed upon the judgment of Sir G. Jessel, M. R., in London and Paris Banking Corporation In re (1), in which case he was dealing with the English Statute which is in similar terms to the Indian Act and in which he said: "Negligence is a term which is well known to the law. Negligence in paying a debt on demand, as I understand it, is omitting to pay without reasonable excuse.

(1) (1874) 19 Eq. 444 at p. 448; 23 W. R. 643.

Mere omission by itself does not amount to negligence. Therefore, I should hold, upon the words of the Statute, that where a debt is bona fide disputed by the debtor, and the debtor alleges, for example, that the demand for goods sold and delivered is excessive and says that he, the debtor, is willing to pay such sum as he is either advised by competent valuers to pay, or as he himself considers a fair sum for the goods, then in that case he has not neglected to pay, and is not within the wording of the Statute."

In this case the company alleged there was a bona fide dispute and they were willing to pay what was found due on the taking of an account.

Now in this case we do not think it is necessary for us to decide finally whether there is a "disputed claim" in fact; it is sufficient for us to say that it appears to the Court (1) that on the materials before it there is ground for supposing that there is a bona fide dispute as to a substantial part of the debt on which the winding-up petition was based, and (2) that the company is solvent.

Under such circumstances the proper course is a suit: that course the respondent did adopt; and the suit which he instituted to recover the amount due to him has in fact been postponed until after the hearing of the suit by the company against him and his co-directors; under these circumstances we do not think that an order for winding-up the company ought to have been made on the petition until the litigation involved in the two above-mentioned suits had been disposed of.

It follows that in our judgment the learned Judge was not right in dismissing the company's application in toto.

The application was to remove the petition from the file, to restrain the issue of advertisement and to stay all proceedings in respect of the petition, and in our judgment the proper order to be made, under the circumstances of this case, will be that the winding up proceedings be stayed until the determination of the two above-mentioned suits viz, the Company's Suit (No. 961/15) and the respondent's Suit (No. 454/16), the question of the costs of the winding up proceedings will be determined by the Judge taking such winding up proceedings; this will include the costs of the application heard by Greaves, J., which is now the subject of appeal.

We have said nothing with regard to the second ground above-mentioned, viz., that the petition was presented with an ulterior motive: having regard to the conclusion at which we have arrived in respect of the first ground, a decision upon the second is rendered unnecessary, and, inasmuch as there is litigation pending between the parties, it seems to us that it is not desirable to express an opinion upon any matters involved in this application unless it is necessary and material for our judgment.

The result will be that the appeal will be allowed, the order of the learned Judge will be set aside and that the respondent will return to the company the sum of two lakhs nine thousand rupees, and the order above-mentioned will be substituted for the order of the learned Judge. The respondent must pay the appellant's costs of this appeal.

WOODROFFE, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

JUDGMENT.—The two appeals Nos. 140 and 241 of 1916 are connected and arise out of a suit brought under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The principal appeal is No. 140 of 1916 and is by one of the defendants only. It appears that there were two brothers, called Kunj Behari Lal and Sital Prasad, who had a considerable joint business at Etawah. Kunj Behari had no children. Sital Prasad had four sons, namely, Banke Behari Lal, Girwardhari Lal, Banarsi Das and Sheo Narayan. On the 6th of December 1900 there was a partition between the two brothers, Kunj Behari and Sital Prasad. On the 21st of December 1900, Kunj Behari made a Will by which he gave his separated share to his nephew, Banke Behari Lal, and the eldest son of the latter, Jai Narayan, in the proportion of 7 annas and 9 annas respectively. Kunj Behari Lal died some time prior to 1902. On the 18th of December 1902, Sheo Narayan and Girwardhari Lal brought a suit against their father and their brothers and nephews for partition of the property, ignoring the partition of 1900 and contesting at the same time the validity of the Will of Kunj Behari Lal in favour of Banke Behari and his son. The dispute between the parties was referred to arbitration. The arbitrators upheld the partition of 1900 as also the Will of Kunj Behari Lal. They divided the separated share of Sital Prasad between him and his dessendants. A decree was accordingly made in terms of the award on the 16th of April 1903, under which property of the value of about Rs. 52,000 was given to Sital Prasad. On the 24th of February 1904, Sital Prasad made a Will in respect of his separated share, by which it is alleged he created a wakf directing the erection of a dharamshala and a bathing ghat at Etawah and appropriating the income to the upkeep of both. He died a few days after on the 5th of March 1904. On the 12th of September 1904, two applications were made by Banke Behari Lal to the Municipal Board of Etawah for permission to build a bathing ghat on the banks of the Jamna and a dharamshala on the land mentioned in the application in or near the town of Etawah. The two applications are printed at pages 16 and 17 (R). With regard to his application relating to the building of the bathing ghat permission was granted by the Municipality. His application about the dharamshala was refused on the ground that the land upon which he proposed to build was nazul land and permission could not be granted to build upon it. Nothing further was done in the matter for some years. Banke Behari Lal died on the 5th of March 1907. On the 14th of March 1907 Banarsi Das and Sheo Narayan, two of the sons of Sital Prasad, brought a suit against Jai Narayan, Girwardhari Lal and Gur Narayan for cancellation of the Will of the 24th of February 1904 and for the recovery of their share in the estate of Sital Prasad. In the alternative the plaintiffs prayed that if the Will of the 24th of February 1904 was held to be genuine, the directions contained therein should be carried out. The defence to the suit was that the Will was a valid Will and that it created a wakf. In May 1907 an application was made by the plaintiffs for the amendment of their plaint, praying that the allegation with regard to the validity of the Will be eliminated, and that their relief with regard to the maintenance and observance of the wakf be allowed. The amendment was opposed by the defendants unsuccessfully. The case was disposed of on the 29th of June 1907, and the only question before the Court was as to costs as the relief sought by the plaintiffs after the amendment was practically admitted by the defendants. A few days prior to the decision of that case Jai Narayan and Rup Narayan brought a suit on the 13th of June 1907 against Banarsi Das for the recovery of Rs. 14,268, of which Rs. 11,764 was the principl and the balance interest, on the allegation that Banarsi Das had taken a loan from his father and the money was payable to the wakf fund. The claim was resisted on the ground that no loan was obtained by Banarsi Das but that the sum in question was a gift by his father to him in his lifetime. The case was fixed for hearing on the 5th of December 1907. On that date the first meeting of the committee constituted by the Will of the 24th of February 1904 was held and certain questions were put by Banarsi Das to the members of the committee for decision. Among the said questions three related to three sums alleged to have been paid to Banarsi Das, to the daughter of Jai Narayan and to the daughters-in-law of the family of Sital Prasad. The three sums were:—

Rs. 10,000 to Banarsi Das, Rs. 5,000 to the daughter of Banke Behari Lal as kannyadan, and Rs. 4,000 to the daughters-in-law of the family.

The committee came to the conclusion that the said three sums were gifts by Sital Prasad to the persons named above. Sheo Narayan, who was a member of the committee, entered his protest against the resolution of the committee. The proceedings of the committee of that date that have been printed and are before us show that Sheo Narayan objected to one of the resolutions. He has, however, in his evidence deposed that he objected to all the resolutions passed at that meeting and that the word yih has been changed into ek, that is, in other words, the word "these" has been altered into "one."

Another resolution of the same committee was passed to the effect that the claim against Banarsi Das should not be pressed.

Accordingly a telegram was sent to the Court at Mainpuri where the case was pending, and the claim against Banarsi Das was withdrawn.

On the 27th of May 1907 a house was purchased in Etawah for Rs. 8,500 and a dharamshala was started. It is in evidence that charity was dispensed at the place from the 14th of August 1907 to the 3rd of June 1909, and that the expenses during that period amounted to Rs. 1,308-8-3. The building was sold on the 1st of March 1910, and we will refer to this transaction later on. On the 17th of November 1913, an application was made by three persons, namely Gauri Shanker, Banke Lal and Ujagar Lal, to the Legal Remembrancer for permission to bring a suit in respect of the alleged wakf under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure and permission was granted to them on the 19th of March 1914. They instituted the suit out of which these two appeals have arisen on the 20th of May 1915 against the sons of Banke Behari Lal, of Girwardhari Lal, of Banarsi Das and against Sheo Narayan. The latter is the only surviving son of Sital Prasad. It was alleged in the plaint that Sital Prasad had created a wakf by his Will dated the 24th of February 1904 and that the wakf property consisted of cash, houses, village and jewelry amounting in all to the value of Rs. 1 20,000. The trust was created according to the plaintiffs for the construction and upkeep of the dharamshala, the two temples and a bathing ghat on the banks of the Jamna, both for the use of the Hindu public. Under the Will a committee was appointed, consisting of a President, a Secretary and four members. The committee had not only done nothing in the matter but had been guilty of misconduct. It was alleged in paragraph 6 of the plaint that the members of the committee had been misappropriating the wakf properety and had been deriving undue advantage therefrom and had been benefiting their near relations. A specific instance of bad faith was given in paragraph 7 of the plaint, where it was stated that an irrecoverable debt due to the firm of Banke Behari Lal and Jai Narayan for the sum of Rs. 16,000 was transferred to the wakf account and a mortgage taken from the debtors. The plaintiffs described themselves as members of the family of Sital Prasad and of the religion that he belonged to. They said that they were entitled to worship at the temple that was to be built according to the Will of the 24th of February 1904, as also to bathe at the ghat on the banks of the Jamna if that had been built. They, therefore, said that they had a right of action against the defendants. They distinctly stated that the wakf created under the Will of the 24th of February 1904 was a charitable and religious public wakf. They prayed for the following reliefs:—

(a) The present trustees may be removed and new ones may be appointed according to the discretion of the Court,

(b) The entire property of the wakf may be delivered over to the new trustees.

(c) Jai Narayan and Prag Narayan, the two adult sons of Banke Behari Lal, should be made to furnish an account of the wakf properties and to state what and where the wakf properties are. They should also be made to refund to the wakf fund any sum which may have been misappropriated by them or by their ancestor or may have been lost by misconduct or negligence of themselves or their ancestor.

(d) A scheme for management of the wakf property should be laid down.

(e) Any other relief which the circumstances of the case may require be granted to the plaintiffs.

(f) Costs of the suit be awarded against the defendant who is found to be at fault.

The chief contesting defendants in the case were Jai Narayan, and his brother, Prag Narayan, who filed a joint written statement. They pleaded that the trust in question was a private trust and not a public trust: that full discretion was allowed by the testator to the members of the committee both as to the object of the trust and the management of the trust property; that the dharamshala and the ghat were not built because the funds left for their construction were found to be insufficient; that in place of the dharamshala and the ghat the members of the committee started a school and thereby carried out the wishes of the testator. The instance of the mortgage of Rs. 16,000 mentioned in paragraph 7 of the plaint was challenged. The defendants said that it was a good investment. The list of wakf property given at the foot of the plaint was challenged. The last plea was that the suit by the plaintiffs was a counterblast to the suit brought by Prag Narayan against Gauri Shanker for the recovery of sums misappropriated by his father, Raghubir Dayal, who for a long time was the Munib of the firm of the defendants. Sheo Narayan, the surviving son of Sital Prasad, practically supported the claim of the plaintiffs. Both parties gave evidence in the case, but the account books of the defendants were not produced in Court in spite of repeated demands till a very late stage, when they could be of no use as the evidence in the case had closed. The learned Judge who tried the case, after a careful consideration of the evidence, came to the following conclusions. That the Will of the 24th of February 1904 created a charitable and religious public wakf; that the plaintiffs had a right to sue; that the committee had not carried out the objects of the wakf; that some of the members of the committee had been guilty of misconduct and that the instance given by the plaintiffs as well as the relinquishment of the claim of Rs. 10,000 against Banarsi Das together with the payment of the sum of Rs 5,000 to the daughter of Banke Behari Lal were some of the instances of bad faith; that the trust property was worth Rs. 53,000 and that Jai Narayan should render accounts to the new committee which the Judge appointed. We have already remarked above that there are two appeals in the case. The principal appeal is by Jai Narayan and the connected appeal is by the plaintiffs. We shall dispose of both appeals by one judgment in the principal case of Jai Narayan.

The argument on behalf of Jai Narayan is somewhat different from that which was put forward in the Court below. We shall first give the heads of the arguments of the learned Counsel for him and then discuss them seriatim. It is contended on behalf of the appellant Jai Narayan that the Will of the 24th of February 1904 created no wakf at all; that if by straining of the language it be held that the Will did create a wakf, that wakf was a private one. In case the wakf is held to be a public one for charitable and religious purposes, then it is bad for vagueness. Moreover, the members of the committee have from time to time dealt with the wakf property honestly and to the best of their judgment and ability and no misappropriation of any portion of the wakf property has been made, nor has any bad investment been deliberately made by any members of the committee of the wakf fund. A wakf in respect of the village of Kutubpur had been made sometime prior to 1904 and no new wakf could be created by the Will of 1904 and, therefore, the village should be left out of account. The sum found by the learned District Judge as wakf property is wrong and the real amount is Rs. 33,550-7-9. It is further contended that all the defendants should have been made liable, if at all, for rendition of account and delivery of the trust property. The order of the learned District Judge with regard to the delivery of trust property is challenged on the ground that it is ultra vires, as no such order can be made under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As to the constitution of the new committee objection is taken to the appointment of Brahma Narayan, who is not among the descendants of Sital Prasad.

Before discussing the merits of the first objection that the Will did not create a wakf at all, we would remark that this objection was not taken by the defendants in their written statement or in the argument before the lower Court or in the grounds of appeal before this Court. We have, however, allowed the learned Counsel to urge and argue the point. He contends that the language of the Will only expresses a pious wish of the testator and does not positively lay a command upon the members of the committee to do any of the things suggested in the Will. Therefore, the words are precatory and cannot be said to create a valid trust. After a careful perusal and examination of the language of the Will which, by the way we may remark here, we have seen and considered in the original, we are unable to agree with the learned Counsel. The words of the Will bearing on the point under discussion are as follows:—

"I, therefore, give it in writing as regards the said property that I shall remain in proprietary possession of the property during my lifetime, that as regards the moveable and immoveable properties that might remain in my possession at the time of my death I make a Will as follows. A committee should be formed to carry out the directions given below:—The committee would have all sorts of powers regarding the management of the said properties. My eldest son, Banke Behari Lal, should be appointed as the president (of the committee), Banarsi Das, my third son, should be the the secretary, and Sheo Narayan, my fourth son, Jai Narain, son of Banke Behari Lal aforesaid, Gur Narain, son of Girdhari Lal, and Gauri Shanker, son of Raghubir Dayal, should be appointed as the members of the said committee."

After giving certain directions about the constitution of the committee the testator goes on to say:—

"I consider it advisable to give some of the directions below. The committee, so far as possible, shall be bound to comply with them.

(a) Bisrant (ghat) Sri Jamnaji should be built in Etawah at a cost of about Rs. 2,500.

(b) A dharamshala containing two temples, one of Sri Mahadeoji Maharaj and the other of Sri Thakurji Mharaj, should be built in Etawah at a cost of about Rs. 5,000.

(c) In the said dharamshala each of the four sons of mine should cause 4 small rooms to be built at his own cost, under the management of the committee, with reference to the plan of the dharamshala. The amount that might be given in charity on the occasions of the marriages of my sons, grandsons or their male children should be given in this wakf fund to the extent of 1/4th. Should any one fail to do so, he and his sons should be debarred from holding any of the aforesaid offices so long as they do not comply with the above directions.

(d) The principal amount of cash or the property should not be utilised in defraying any expense other than those enumerated above. So far as possible about 3/4ths of the income yielded thereby, i. e, interest or profits should be spent on the following objects according to the discretion of the committee or on any other act of charity."

The objects of charity are then specified. The rest of the Will relates to the powers of the president and the secretary and the mode in which the wakf property shall be managed. There is a distinct direction that the income and the expenditure of the property shall be daily entered in the account book. It is clear from the language of the passages we have just quoted that the Will in question did create a wakf. The argument on behalf of the appellant is founded upon the discretion allowed to the committee, but that discretion relates only to the management of the properties and not to the objects for which the wakf was created. The words of the Will are:—"The committee would have all sorts of powers regarding the management of the said properties." It is nowhere stated in the Will that the committee could, if they chose, divert the use of the property from the objects for which the trust was created. It is true that where charities are mentioned, the testator gives discretion to the committee to spend the income on the charities mentioned by him as well as any other that the committee might think proper, but the language would not bear the construction tried to be put upon it by the learned Counsel for the appellant, to the effect that the charities specified in the Will could entirely be ignored by the members of the committee. The descendants of Sital Prasad themselves understood the Will to create the trust. This is not only apparent from the written statement in the present case but also from the written statement filed in the suit of 1907, already mentioned above, as also from the applications of Banke Bihari Lal made to the Municipality on the 12th of September 1904. There were 12 meetings of the committee in all from 5th of December 1907 to the 29th of July 1915, and at all those meetings the trust was recognised. We are, therefore, of opinion that the Will does create a trust.

The contention for the appellant that it is a private trust has also no force. The object of the trust was the construction of a dharamshala and of a bathing ghat, at both of which not only the members of the family of the testator or the members of his religion but presumably the Hindu public would have access. There were to be two temples in the dharamshala to which the Hindu public worshipping the idols to be installed in those temples would have free access. The feeding and the clothing of the poor who visited or resided in the dharamshala and the free distribution of medicine would also go to show that the trust was a public trust. In fact Banke Behari Lal in his applications to the Municipality, when asking for permission to build a dharamshala and a bathing ghat, describes the trust to be a public trust. We will quote one or two sentences from his applications. In his application for building the ghat he says as follows:—"According to the directions given in his Will by my deceased father I wish to construct two pakka built vishrants for the good of the public and the benefit of the soul in the next world. I pray that the Government may, for the benefit of the general public and the poor, be pleased, etc., etc."

In his application for permission to build a dharamshala he said:—

"At the time of his death my father made a Will for construction of a dharamshala as well. I also want to execute the Will aforesaid for the benefit in this world and in the next world as well as for public good. I file herewith two copies of maps and pray that for the purpose of doing good to the poor, for public and charitable purposes, the dharamshala may after local inspection be permitted to be constructed."

At the various meetings of the committee that took place from time to time it was prominently brought out in the proceedings that the trust was a public trust. The proceedings are printed from pages 28 to 42 (A). We have no hesitation in holding that the trust created by the Will is a public trust for charitable and religious purposes.

The contention with regard to vagueness was, however, strongly pressed before us by learned Counsel for Jai Narayan. In respect of this contention also we have to remark that it was not urged in the Court below at any stage of the case, nor does it find a place in the grounds of appeal here. The argument is again urged on the basis of the power of discretion given to the committee by Sital Prasad. It is contended that when the committee had full discretion to do as they thought proper both with regard to the object of the wakf and the manner of managing of the wakf property, there obviously was vagueness in the creation of the trust. We do not find from the Will that full and unlimited power was given to the committee to do what they liked both with regard to the object of the wakf and the management of the property. On the contrary we find that the only discretion given to the committee was with regard to the management of the trust property, and that with the qualification that the corpus of the property could not be dealt with. The committee had also to a certain extent discretion as to the expenditure of a portion of the income on charity other than the charities specified by the testator. The learned Counsel for the appellant first assumes that the Will left everything to the members of the committee and then bases his argument on the plea of vagueness. As we have already remarked above, the Will distinctly and clearly lays down the direction that a dharamshala and a bathing ghat are to be built and that three-fourths of the income of the wakf property is to be spent in the upkeep of the two buildings and towards the support of the poor and the needy who visited the dharamshala and on the free distribution of medicine to the sick. There is no vagueness about these objects at all, nor is there any discretion left to the members of the committee about them. For the appellant several cases have been cited in support of the contention that the trust created by the Will is bad for vagueness. Gokool Nath Guha v. Issur Lochun Roy (1), Mussoorie Bank Limited v. Albert Charles Raynor (2), Kumarasami v. Subbaraya (3), Runchordas Vandravandas v. Parvatibai (4), Jugalkishore v. Lakshmandas (5), Grimond v. Grimond (6), Blair v. Duncan (7).

In the Bombay case (4) the property was left by the testator to the trustees for making dharamshala. It was held that the word dharm dan had so many various meanings that it could not be decided for what purpose the testator left the property. The dedication was held to be void for uncertainty. The second Bombay case to be found at page 659 (5) is really against the contention of the appellant. In that case it was held that because the dharamshala was attached to the temple and there was a direction for the maintenance of a sadabart, the intention of the founder was to devote the property to public, religious and charitable purposes.

In the Madras case (3) a Hindu by his Will, after appointing certain persons executors for the purpose of managing his estate after his death, gave them the following direction: "You should give my brothers, their wives and children according to your wishes." The contention for the beneficiaries was that a trust had been created in their favour. Their contention was disallowed, on the ground that the words of the testator mentioned above did not create a trust as they were not sufficiently imperative and too vague and general.

The case of Mussorie Bank Limited v. Albert Charles Raynor (2) is also distinguishable from the present case. In that case property was left by the testator to his wife completely, with a wish that when no longer required by her he hoped that she would deal justly by her children. It was held that the Will created no trust and that the words were neither well defined nor imperative.

In the case of Blair v. Duncan (7) a lady by a codicil in her own handwriting directed her trustee that in a certain event one half of the residue of her estate should be applied for such charitable or public purposes as the trustee might think proper. The words were found to be much too vague and uncertain to create a valid trust.

In the case of Grimond v Grimond (3) property was left to the trustees for application to charitable or religious societies or to such institutions as the trustees might select.

In both the English cases the word "or" was taken to be disjunctive, and it was held that the language of the testator was much too vague and uncertain as to the object of the trust. We do not think that any of the cases relied upon by the learned Counsel for the appellant helps him. The correct principle to determine the validity of a trust, in the words of an eminent English Judge, is whether "the testator has pointed out the object, the property and the way in which it shall go." In the present case the objects of the trust are distinctly specified in the Will by Sital Prasad, namely, the building of the ghat and the dharmashala and their maintenance and certain charities. The property is also specified in the Will, for he says that the property in respect of which he creates the trust is that in respect of which he obtained a decree on the 16th of April 1903, and the way in which the property was to be applied is also definitely stated in the Will, namely, the upkeep of the ghat and the dharmashala and the support of the charities mentioned in the Will. We, therefore, hold that the trust created by Sital Prasad is not bad for vagueness.

The 4th objection relates to Kutubpur. It is said that no trust could have been created in respect of it by Sital Prasad, inasmuch as he himself admits by the Will that a former trust existed in respect of it. This plea was not taken in the Court below at any stage of the case. The decision of the question really depends upon evidence, which would disclose the facts and circumstances under which the former trust with regard to Kutubpur was made. It is quite conceivable that Sital Prasad himself made a trust in respect of Kutubpur in language which left him the power in his own lifetime of creating another trust in respect of it. The defendants had sufficient opportunity to meet the case of the plaintiffs and they could have shown by evidence circumstances under which the original trust in respect of Kutubpur was created. We, therefore, disallow the objection.

The objection of the appellant to that part of the decree of the lower Court which directs delivery of the trust property to the new trustees is also without foundation. It is contended that such a decree is not within the purview of section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We think that clause (h) of section 92, Civil Procedure Code, to the effect "granting such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require" empowers a Court to make such a decree as the lower Court has done. This view is not without authority. It has been adopted in one or two cases both here and in Calcutta.

A very strenuous objection is taken to the appointment of Dharam Narayan to the new committee, on the ground that the Will of Sital Prasad distinctly laid down that no one other than from among his descendants was to be a member of the committee. It is true that there is such a provision in the Will, but if by death or refusal or misconduct of the descendants of Sital Prasad it appears that none of them is available for service of the committee, or if a sufficient number of them cannot be obtained to serve on the committee, the Court has power to add even strangers to the committee. In any other view of the law a trust could be defeated by a trustee or trustees by refusing to act or by misconducting themselves or by their death, if by the terms of the trust the appointment to the committee had to be made from the descendants of the testator only. Lewin in his book on "Trust" talking of a case like the present says:—

"If trustees either die in the testator's lifetime or decline the office or disagree among themselves as to the mode of execution or do not declare themselves before their death or if from any other circumstance the exercise of the power by the party who is entrusted with it becomes impossible, the Court will substitute itself in the place of the trustees and will exercise power by the most reasonable rule;" vide page 1050. We think that the learned Judge was right in appointing Dharam Narayan to the committee; the latter, though not a descendant of Sital Prasad, is a distant collateral.

Both the appeals, therefore, fail.

We modify the decree of the Court below by deleting from it the direction to Jai Narayan to render accounts to the new committee and instead we direct that the first three defendants should pay to the new committee Rs. 48,000 with interest at 4 per cent. per annum from the 5th of March 1904 to the date of payment less a sum of Rs. 1,308, and to deliver the houses and the share in the village of Kutubpur to the new committe. The rest of the decree is maintained.

The appeal of Jai Narain is dismissed with costs, including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

The cross-objection of Sheo Narain about his costs is disallowed.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 92, prov. 6—Document, party signing, whether can alter nature of, at registration—Intention of parties, evidence of, when admissible.

A party who has put his signature to a document which is clearly a sale-deed, cannot alter the nature of that document by writing on it when the document is registered that it means something else than it really appears to be. [p. 576, col 1.]

Where a document itself is a perfectly plain, straightforward document, no extrinsic evidence is required to show in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts It is only where the terms of a document itself require explanation, that evidence can be led within the restrictions laid down by proviso 6 to section 92 of the Evidence Act. JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff brought this suit to redeem the plaint land which had been mortgaged to the father of the 1st defendant by three brothers Balvantrao, Namdeo and Tatya by a deed of mortgage for Rs. 700 on the 8th August 1863 One Ramji purported to buy the equity of redemption by a sale deed in 1867, and the present plaintiff is an assignee from Ramji. After the three brothers had executed the deed in favour of Ramji in 1867, two of them Tatya and Namdeo purported to sell to two persons Savlya and Pandu their right in the equity of redemption, and thereafter in execution of a decree against Balvantrao his right in the equity of redemption was put up for sale and bought by the 1st defendant. The 1st defendant also alleges that as Savlya and Pandu filed a redemption suit and after getting a decree for redemption failed to redeem the property, their right to redeem was barred, and, therefore, the 1st defendant became entitled absolutely to the mortgaged property.

The proceedings have gone through various phases in the lower Courts. In the trial Court the plaintiff was granted a redemption decree which appears at page 9.

On appeal the case was remanded to the trial Court for findings on the following issues:—Was the sale deed to Ramji in 1867 really a mortgage; if it was a mortgage, to what relief is the plaintiff entitled?

The case on remand came before another Subordinate Judge, and he referred to the facts already recorded, and came to the conclusion that what purported to be a sale to Ramji in 1867 was really a mortgage and on that finding he held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover Rs. 133 5 4 as secured on Survey No. 120 out of the plaint land.

The case then came back to the lower Appellate Court again before another Judge, who dismissed the suit on the ground of limitation.

We are of opinion that both Courts have taken into consideration evidence which they ought not to have taken in construing the document of 1867, which is Exhibit 71 in the case. That is clearly a sale-deed, looking at the language of the document. There can be no two words about that. It is difficult to see how any discussion could have arisen, and how any decision could have been arrived at, that the document on the face of it was anything else except a sale-deed, and as far as I can gather from the judgments, both Courts refer to it as a sale-deed. An attempt was made by the defendant to show that the transaction evidenced by that document was a sham transaction, but he failed entirely to prove that allegation. But the Appellate Court has come to the conclusion that Exhibit 71 must be read as a mortgage. The learned Judge has rightly excluded the evidence of intention. But he has admitted exactly the same evidence that would have been admitted if evidence of intention had been allowed, under proviso 6 to section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act, and he has come to the conclusion really that when the parties executed the sale deed, they intended that it should be a mortgage transaction. The only circumstance upon which the defendants could possibly rely.

for their contention is the statement made by Balvantrao when acknowledging execution before the Registrar, in which he referred to the document as a sale by way of a mortgage. I cannot see myself how a party who has put his signature to a document, which is clearly a sale-deed, can alter the nature of the document by writing on it, when the document is registered, that it means something else than it really appears to be. Then the learned Judge has considered various facts with regard to the value of the property and the inadequacy of consideration, all which may be evidence that the three brothers, when they executed a sale-deed, intended that it should be a mortgage.

We think the case clearly comes within the decision in Datteo v. Ramchandra (1). Sir Lawrence Jenkins, Chief Justice, said:

"If we look to the deed alone, it is clear that the decree is correct, and that the plaintiff's father parted with his interest in the property. But it is said that the circumstances to which we have alluded require that we should draw an inference that the document is not what it appears to be. We can only understand that as meaning that the document was accompanied by a contemporaneous oral agreement or statement of intention which must be inferred from these several circumstances. But it has been pointed out by the Privy Council in Balkishen Das v. W. F. Legge (2) that in questions of this kind the Courts in India must be guided by section 92 of the Evidence Act."

The defendant has relied upon a dictum of the Privy Council in Jhanda Singh v. Sheikh Wahid ud din (3), where their Lordships say:

"It was not disputed that the test in such cases is the intention of the parties to the instruments. That intention, however, must be gathered from the language of the documents themselves viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances."

That is evidently a reference to proviso 6 to section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act which states that "any fact may be proved which shows in what manner the language of a document is related to existing facts." That is one of the provisos which is the despair of the Judge and the joy of the lawyers. It may be read in many ways. But it is not easy to see in what sort of a case this proviso would be directly applicable. If you have to look at surrounding circumstances in order to ascertain the intention of the parties which has already been clearly expressed in the deed, it seems to me it would be very easy to go over the line and attempt to prove from the surrounding circumstances that the intention of the parties was not what it appears to be. A very general statement no doubt is made by the proviso, and what their Lordships say in the passage I have just read is merely a repetition of the proviso. But on reading the whole of the judgment in that case, it seems clear that they had not applied that proviso to the facts of that case, as they merely considered the two documents before them and gave them the construction which they thought was the proper one from the consideration of what was written in the documents themselves.

We have also been referred to the decision in Maung Kyin v. Ma Shwe La (4). But the facts of that case are entirely different, because there the interests of a third party were involved. The head-note* says:

"The language of section 92 of the Evidence Act, 1872, with regard to a 'contract, grant or disposition reduced to writing' in terms applies, and applies alone, 'as between the parties to any such instrument or their representatives-in-interest.' Wherever, accordingly, evidence is tendered as to a transaction with a third party, it is not governed by the section or by the rule of evidence which it contains, and in such a case, therefore, the ordinary rules of equity and good conscience come into play unhampered by the statutory restrictions...In this case both the grantor and grantee in transactions by deed regarding certain land were shown by the evidence to have dealt with it with the

In Palkishen Das v. W. F. Legge (2) their Lordships said:

"The case must, therefore, be decided on a consideration of the contents of the documents themselves with such extrinsic evidence of surrounding circumstances as may be required to show in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts."

That appears to me to show that where a document itself is a perfectly plain, straightforward document, no extrinsic evidence is required to show in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts. There may be cases where such extrinsic evidence is required, and it will, therefore, be admitted. But it can only be in such cases where the terms of the documents themselves require explanation, and then evidence can be led within the restrictions laid down by the proviso.

Then I may refer to the case of Jhonda Singh v. Sheikh Wahid ud-din (3), where their Lordships, after dealing with the English cases on the subject, said:

"There is one other remark of Lord Cranworth's in Alderson v. White (5) which is particularly applicable to the present case. He said: 'I think a Court after a lapse of 30 years ought to require cogent evidence to induce it to hold that an instrument is not what it purports to be.'"

So assuming in this case we are prepared to allow evidence to show that this document is not a sale deed but something else, still on general principle it would certainly be extremely undesirable, after the document had stood more than fifty years, to allow evidence to be led to show that the document is not what it appears to be on the face of it, unless it be demonstrated to our complete satisfaction that the Legislature entitled us to admit such evidence The learned Appellate Judge seems to have been led away by the use of the words "creditor and debtor" in Exhibit 71 as showing that the position of creditor and debtor continued after the document was executed. But from the contents of the document itself it appears that part of the consideration was the amount previously due, and that accounts for those words being used. In my opinion, therefore, the decree of the lower Appellate Court must be set aside and the original order of the trial Court allowing the plaintiff to redeem on payment of Rs. 466-10-8, etc., must be restored. Up to 19th December 1913 the defendants are entitled to their costs. After that the plaintiff is entitled to his costs.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1185 OF 1917.

February 23, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Piggott and Mr. Justice Walsh.

MATA PRASAD SHUKUL AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

Musammat DEVI SHUKLAIN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Widow—Alienation—Legal necessity—Consent of reversioners, effect of—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11—Res judicata, applicability of—Test—Competency of former Court to decide subsequent suit.

Where a reversioner personally consents to an alienation by a Hindu widow, and acts for the vendee in acquiring a portion of the property sold, he, personally, is estopped from subsequently asserting that there was not legal necessity for the transfer. [p. 579, col 1.]

The consent of the nearest reversioner to such an alienation is strong presumptive evidence of the fact that there was legal necessity. [p. 580, col. 2.]

In determining whether a decree operates as res judicata in a subsequent suit, the test is whether the Court which tried the former suit had jurisdiction to entertain the subsequent suit; if it had not, the decision in the previous suit does not operate as res judicata to bar the subsequent suit. MATA PRASAD SHUKUL v. DEVI SHUKLAIN.

Second appeal from the decision of the Additional Judge, Gorakhpur, dated the 4th of May 1917.

Mr. Harbans Sahai, for the Appellants.

Mr. Kamala Kant Verma, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

PIGGOTT, J.—This is a second appeal in a case in which the plaintiffs claimed certain property as the nearest reversioners under the Hindu Law to the estate of one Mangal Nath, who died in 1903. It is common ground that possession over the estate of the deceased passed to his mother, Musammat Lekhraji, and we must take it that she took the same as a Hindu widow. On January 1st, 1905, Lekhraji executed a deed of sale by which she purported to transfer outright the bulk of the landed property which had come to her from Mangal Nath to four vendees. One of the reliefs sought is to have this alienation set aside, or at least to have it declared inoperative after the death of the vendor. This is not the first litigation to which this sale deed has given rise; and as there is an issue of res judicata raised in the present suit, it will be convenient to consider at once the circumstances under which the previous suit was brought and the effect of the decision arrived at.

The husband of Musammat Lekhraji was one Hans Nath. He was the only son of Har Sewak Shukul by that gentleman's second wife, but he had no fewer than five half brothers, sons of Har Sewak by his first wife. In 1905 the nearest reversioners living to the estate of Hans Nath, or of his son Mangal Nath, were four grandsons of Har Sewak, sons of two of his sons by his first wife, named Nakched and Bachcha. The sons of Nakched were Mata Parshad and Kalka Parshad, while the sons of Bachcha were Kashi Parshad and Brijnath. Of these the last named was a minor, living jointly with his brother Kashi Parshad. Amongst the more remote reversioners were two great grandsons of Har Sewak named Lalta Parshad and Nath Parshad, the sons of a grandson named Chandra Ched. The sale by Musammat Lekhraji was in favour of the wives of Mata Parshad, Kalka Parshad, Lalta Parshad and Nath Parshad and the sale-deed was attested by Kashi Parshad as a marginal witness. The suit filed in 1908 was instituted by Murlidhar, another great grandson of Har Sewak's, being the grandson of a son by the first wife, named Nageshar. The vendees were of course impleaded along with Musammat Lekhraji, but Nath Parshad appeared in the array of defendants as the heir of his wife who had died in the interval. Kashi Parshad and Brijnath were also impleaded as defendants, but were subsequently added as plaintiffs at their own request. Kashi Parshad declined to act as guardian ad litem for his minor brother, so that Brijnath was represented by his mother. The suit was for actual possession of the property covered by the deed of sale, one of the allegations in the plaint being that Mangal Nath had died while a member of a joint undivided Hindu family with the plaintiffs and others, so that Musammat Lekhraji had no title whatever to the property with which she purported to deal. In the alternative, however, a declaration was sought that the sale deed of January 1st, 1905, passed no title to the vendees beyond the lifetime of Musammat Lekhraji and would not affect the rights of the reversioner or reversioners entitled to succeed to Mangal Nath's estate on the death of that lady. The trial Court dismissed this suit on a variety of grounds. It found that Mangal Nath died as a separated Hindu, and went on to hold that there was a misjoinder of causes of action involved in the attempt to obtain alternative relief by way of a declaration as to the ineffectiveness of the transfer beyond the death of Musammat Lekhraji. For this reason perhaps the Court declined to go into the question as to whether there was legal necessity for the transfer. It held, however, that if the suit were to be treated as one brought by a reversioner to contest an alienation by a Hindu widow, then Murlidhar was not entitled to maintain such a suit in the presence of nearer reversioners. As against Kashi Parshad it found that he had assented to the transfer and was personally estopped from contesting it; finally it held that Kashi Parshad's assent bound his minor brother Brijnath. Against this decision only Murlidhar and Kashi Parshad appealed; the latter did not take the trouble to see that an appeal was also preferred, if only as a matter of form, on behalf of Brijnath. In 1909, while this appeal was pending, Musammat Lebkraji died. The appellants Murlidhar and Kashi Parshad thereupon petitioned the Appellate Court to be permitted to withdraw from the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit; in their petition they said that the suit as brought was undoubtedly open to objection on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action, and added further that the death of Musammat Lebkraji had considerably modified the position of the parties and their respective rights. The order of the Appellate Court on this application is dated April 12th, 1912, its effect is to substitute for the decree of the first Court dismissing the suit an order under Order XXIII, rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, permitting Murlidhar and Kashi Parshad to withdraw from the suit with leave to bring a fresh one: but this permission is in terms extended only to the two plaintiffs above named, they being the only appellants before the Court which passed the order. It may be noted that Brijnath was not even impleaded as a respondent to the appeal.

The present suit was filed on December 5th, 1914. The plaintiffs are Mata Parshad and Brijnath. The latter has, in the meantime, attained majority; his position in the previous litigation has already been indicated. Mata Prashad, it will be remembered, is the husband of one of the transferees under the deed of sale; he was impleaded as a defendant in the former litigatior, but did not then contest the validity of the alienation. The two plaintiffs now claim possession of the property affected by the deed of January 1st, 1905, on the ground that Musammat Lekhraji had only a Hindu widow's estate, that the alienation was without legal necessity and ineffective beyond the lifetime of the widow, and that they are themselves the nearest reversioners, entitled as such to possession of the property from the date when the succession opened on the death of Musammat Lekhraji. They admit the existence of Kashi Parshad as a reversioner equal in degree with themselves; but plead that he is disentitled to succeed inasmuch as he had "renounced the world" before Musammat Lekhraji died. The only defendant who has taken the trouble to contest the suit is Nath Parshad; he is indeed the person principally interested in doing so. His wife appears in the sale deed itself as the transferee of the larger portion of the property and as having advanced the largest portion of the purchase-money.

The learned Subordinate Judge in whose Court this suit was filed has tried it very carefully and, on the whole, judiciously; but his framing of the issues left the question of alleged legal necessity for the sale wholly detached from the questions of law and of fact raised by the plea that it was effected with the consent of the entire body of reversioners near enough in degree to have been entitled to the property if the succession had opened on the date of the sale. There was an issue of fact arising out of a plea that the property in suit was the stridhan of Musammat Lekhraji, or was at any rate property over which she had unlimited powers of disposal: this has been decided against the defendants on the evidence. It has also been found in favour of the plaintiffs—somewhat curiously in view of the decision come to in the first suit—that there was nothing to prove that Kashi Parshad had assented to the sale. On the other hand there was a finding of fact against the plaintiffs, that Kashi Parshad had not "renounced the world," but was equally entitled with the three plaintiffs to a share in the property in suit. On the issue of legal necessity, as framed by him, the learned Subordinate Judge held that there was no adequate evidence to support the alleged necessity of the several items of the consideration, except as regards one small item, and on the whole that the alienation could not be supported on that ground. Nevertheless he held that the two plaintiffs were, each of them for a separate and independent reason, precluded from questioning the validity of the sale. In respect of Mata Parshad he found that he had personally consented to the sale and was estopped from denying the title of the vendees. As regards Brijnath he held that the decree of the trial Court in the first suit operated as res judicata against him.

The Additional District Judge of Gorakhpur, before whom the case came in first appeal, dealt with these two questions only. Agreeing with the trial Court on both points, he dismissed the appeal.

As regards Mata Parshad I think there is little to be said except that the Courts below were right. There is a clear finding of fact against him by the lower Appellate Court; and in the view which I take of the case as a whole it seems to me that he undoubtedly gave his consent to the alienation and acted for his wife in acquiring a portion of the property sold. He is personally estopped from asserting that there was not legal necessity for the transfer.

The case of Brijnath has been argued out before us at considerable length from more than one point of view. I think the Courts below were wrong on the question of res judicata. To begin with, the Court which tried the first suit was the Court of a Munsif and was not legally competent to try the present suit, which was valued at Rs. 1,200 and instituted in the Court of a Subordinate Judge. On behalf of the respondents, it was pointed out that the property involved was identically the same in both suits, and reliance is placed on the decision in Gopi Nath Chobey v. Bhugwat Pershad (1). With all respect to the learned Judges who decided that case, I entertain grave doubts whether they have not declined—on what seemed to them to be adequate grounds of public policy—to give their full legal effect to the words "in a Court competent to try such subsequent suit," as they appear in the relevant section of the Code of Civil Procedure. I quite agree that we have to look to the competence of the first Court at the time when the first suit was instituted; but the Court of the Munsif would not have been competent in the year 1908 to try a suit valued at Rs. 1,200. Moreover, I am satisfied that the authority quoted does not cover the present case. There is no question of a proved or admitted increase in the value of the property concerned, and I see no reason why we should presume a substantial increase in value in the course of six years. In both suits the valuation for purposes of Court-fees was based upon the land revenue payable and is wholly independent of the valuation for purposes of jurisdiction. In the suit now before us this purports to be based on the market value of the property, stated at Rs. 1,200. This has never been disputed; there is no suggestion that the present plaintiffs overvalued the property in order to bring the suit before a tribunal of higher grade. Why the plaintiffs in the suit of 1908 were allowed, without question raised, to value their suit for purposes of jurisdiction at Rs. 999, being the sale consideration as stated in the deed of January 1st, 1905, has never been explained. The fact remains that the Court which tried the suit of 1908 is not, and never was, competent to try this present subsequent suit.

Over and above this, I think we should have to consider very carefully before holding Brijnath bound by the result of the suit litigated during his minority, in view of the peculiar course taken by that litigation. I do not wish to commit myself to any general proposition as to whether an order passed in appeal, in favour of some only of the plaintiffs, permitting them to withdraw from the suit with liberty to sue again, may or may not operate in favour of a plaintiff who is not in terms included in the permission. I think that was the effect in the present case of the Court's order of April 12th, 1910, as far as Brijnath is concerned. The decision against him in the trial Court had proceeded wholly upon a finding that this minor was completely represented in all these transactions by his elder brother Kashi Parshad, the managing member of the family, and was as much bound by Kashi Parshad's consent to the alienation as if he had himself joined in giving the same. It seems to me that Kashi Parshad virtually accepted this position when he dropped his minor brother out of the appeal altogether. The order of the Appellate Court in effect set aside the decree of the trial Court as a whole, and the order substituted therefor permits Kashi Parshad, the managing member of the joint family consisting of himself and his minor brother, to bring a fresh suit upon the same cause of action. Finally the cause of action is not, in my opinion, identically the same in the two suits: the death of Musammat Lekhraji has modified the position of the parties and has given rise to a fresh cause of action in favour of the nearest reversioners actually living on the date of that lady's death. I hold, therefore, that the result of the litigation of 1908-19 does not in itself preclude Brijnath from maintaining the present suit.

Nevertheless the above finding does not, in my opinion, involve the success of this appeal. To begin with, I must point out that Brijnath suing alone could not in any event claim more than one-fourth share in the property of which Mangal Nath was the last male owner: the finding of the trial Court that there were three reversioners equal with him in degree, alive and competent to inherit when the succession opened, was not challenged in the Court of first appeal and has become final. The contesting defendant Nath Parshad, on the other hand, was not only entitled in the Court of first appeal to support the decision of the first Court on any of the grounds on which that Court had decided against him, but he went out of his way to put in a written pleading giving fair notice to the opposite side of his intention to do so. He desired a fresh finding on the issue of fact decided against him as to the nature of Musammat Lekhraji's ownership of the property. We could not decree any portion of the plaintiff's claim without ourselves recording, or obtaining from the lower Appellate Court, a distinct finding on this point. Besides this Nath Parshad pleaded that Kashi Parshad had consented to the alienation and that this alienation was in fact made for legal necessity, or, at any rate, must be held to have been so made as against those reversioners who expressly consented at the time, and also as against Brijnath who is bound by the consent given by his elder brother as managing member of the family.

These last pleas involve certain mixed questions of fact and of law which, I think, we ought to look into before passing any order which would have the effect of prolonging this litigation. I find that at the time of the sale by Musammat Lekhraji a substantial portion of the property involved was in the hands of mortgagees holding under a mortgage contracted by that lady's late husband. The vendees under the deed of January 1st, 1905, were left Rs. 490 to pay this mortgage, but have never done so. The rest of the sale consideration, excepting a small sum advanced in cash at execution, consisted of the repayment of a series of small antecedent loans, the largest of which was advanced by Nath Parshad himself. It seems a fair inference that Musammat Lekhraji had succeeded to an encumbered property and was finding it difficult to maintain herself, and that she approached the nearest reversioners then living to see if they were inclined to help her. This much is certain that Mata Parshad and Kalka Parshad advanced comparatively small portions of the sale consideration in return for transfers of fractional shares in favour of their wives, while Kashi Parshad signed the deed as an attesting witness. The bulk of the sale consideration was furnished by two reversioners one degree more remote, Nath Parshad and Lalta Parshad, in return for transfers in favour of their respective wives. These facts seem to me to amount to very strong evidence in favour of the proposition that the three reversioners nearest in degree at the time of the sale, who were at that time of full age, were consulted beforehand as to the transaction and gave their consent to it because they were satisfied that there was legal necessity for the sale and were content that two reversioners one degree remote should acquire the greater part of the property by advancing the greater part of the sale consideration.

Of the authorities to which we were referred on the question of legal necessity for a sale by a Hindu widow, and of the effect of consent by the nearest reversioners living at the time of the sale, I think it unnecessary to refer to any other except the case of Rangasami Gounden v. Nachiappa Gounden (2) in which, privious decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council are reviewed and explained. The case before us is not an alienation by the widow of the entire estate of her late husband in her hands; the consent of the nearest reversioners living at the date of the sale will not validate it on the principle of acceleration of the succession. Nevertheless such consent remains strong presumptive evidence of the fact that there really was legal necessity for the sale. It seems to me that this presumption applies with peculiar force to the facts of the present case, and that there is nothing to rebut it in the comments made by the trial Court on the details of the sale consideration. The fact is that owing to the frame of the issues in the trial Court and to the subsequent course taken by the litigation, neither of the Courts below has really considered the probative value of the consent of the nearest reversioners on the issue of legal necessity. Had they done so in the light of the principles laid down in the ruling to which I have referred, I am confident that they would have reached the conclusion at which I have myself arrived. I would record a plain finding that legal necessity for the sale of January 1st, 1905, is proved, so as to give the vendees a clear title, more particularly as against the present plaintiffs. On this finding the appeal must fail, and I would dismiss it with costs including fees on the higher scale.

WALSH, J.—I agree.

BY THE COURT—We dismiss this appeal with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), Sch. III, Art. 3 —Landlord and tenant—Dispossession—Suit to recover possession—Landlord, whether necessary party—Limitation applicable—Amendment of plaint—Appeal, second.

Where a plaintiff joins several persons as defendants and proceeds against one only, describing the others as pro forma defendants, he cannot, in second appeal, be allowed to amend his plaint so that the defendant against whom he has proceeded may be left out of the suit altogether and the suit be so framed as to claim relief against the pro forma defendants. [p. 583, col. 1.]

In a suit by a tenant to recover possession of a holding of which he has been dispossessed through tenants inducted by the landlord, the landlord is a necessary party, and the suit must be brought within the period prescribed by Article 3 of Schedule III to the Bengal Tenancy Act. [p. 583, col. 1.]

Appeals against the decrees of the Subordinate Judge, Hooghly, dated the 7th of March 1917, modifying those of the Munsif, 1st Court at Howrah, dated the 6th of July 1915.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Jogesh Chandra Roy (with him Babu Haradhan Chatterjee), for the Appellant.—The defendant is the appellant. The appeals arise out of three suits for recovery of possession of 6/7th share of 3 jamas after declaration of title thereto. The allegation in the plaint was that such shares did not pass to the landlord, the defendant No. 1, by his purchase at the auction sale held in execution of rent decrees against defendant No. 2. The plaintiffs are some of the heirs of the deceased recorded tenant, which is admitted, as also the dispossession by defendant No. 1. The dispossession was effected more than two years before suit. The lower Appellate Court, modifying the decree of the first Court, held that Article 3 of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act applied only to suits in which it was admitted or proved that the dispossession took place by the landlord when acting as such. The appeals on coming up for hearing before Fletcher and Walmsley, JJ., were referred to the Full Bench for a decision of the question whether special limitation as provided by the Bengal Tenancy Act was applicable to a case where the dispossession was effected by the landlord as auction-purchaser of a holding and not as a landlord acting as such. That Full Bench reference has been disposed of on 1st August 1919 and the case has been referred back for decision by the Divisional Bench, inasmuch as the question referred to in the reference did not arise for consideration. The plaintiff has alleged in the plaint that he has been dispossessed by the defendant No. 1. The other defendants have been made pro forma defendants and no relief has been claimed against them,

Refers to Kali Das Chaudhuri v. Danpadi Sundari Dossee (1). In this case, therefore, the two years' rule of limitation would apply. The twelve years' rule would apply only when the dispossession has taken place at the instance of the landlord. In this case the settlement precedes the dispossession. On their own statement there is no case of dispossession. Then as regards the prayer of the other side that leave might be granted to amend the plaint I submit it ought not to be granted Six long years have elapsed since the institution of the suit and the amendment proposed would entirely change the nature of the suit. Refers to Chintamoni Sahu v. Upendra Nath (2), Hara Kumar Nath v. Sheikh Nasaruddin (3), Bheka Singh v. Nakchhed Singh (4), Aminuddin Munshi v. Ulfutunnissa Bibi (5), Basanta Kumari v. Nanda Ram (6).

Dr. Dwarkanath Mitter (with him Babu Bhupendra Kumar Ghose for Babu Jogendra Kumar De and Babu Nagendra Nath Ghose), for the Respondents.—I would renew my prayer for the amendment of the plaint. I would leave aside defendant No. 1 and claim relief against the other defendants. If that be disallowed, then I would contend that by receiving rent I would be in the position of a landlord. The new settlement must either be in that character or in that of an auction-purchaser.

Refers to Ram Kinkar Tewari v. Sthiti Ram Panja (7), Kamal Dhari Thakur v. Rameshwar Singh (8), Brojo Kishore v. Saraswati Dassi (9). I would pray for a remand.

Babu Jogesh Chandra Ray replied in brief.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff in the suit out of which this appeal arises sought to recover possession of 6/7th share of a certain holding, which was sold in execution of a decree for arrears of rent obtained by the landlord defendant No. 1, Raja Peary Mohan Mukherjee, against the recorded tenant and was purchased by the defendant No. 1 on the 12th June 1902.

The suit was directed against the defendant No. 1 as the principal defendant and certain other persons defendants Nos. 2 to 32, who are described as pro forma defendants. It was alleged that the defendant No. 1 had dispossessed the plaintiff at the time of obtaining symbolical possession. The suit was dismissed by the Court of first instance. On appeal that decision was reversed by the lower Appellate Court, and the defenant No. 1 appeals to this Court.

The case was referred to a Full Bench by Fletcher and Walmsley, JJ. The question before the Full Bench was whether the special rule of limitation contained in Article 3 of Schedule III to the Bengal Tenancy Act was applicable to a case where the dispossession was effected by the landlord as auction-purchaser of a holding and not as a landlord acting as such.

At the hearing of the case before the Full Bench, it was pointed out that as a matter of fact the defendant No. 1 continued receiving rent for the holding for six months after his auction purchase at the rent sale and that the defendant No. 1 in March 1903 dispossessed the plaintiff by inducting other tenants on the land. The Full Bench accordingly was of opinion that if such dispossession of the plaintiff was to be considered as dispossession effected by the appellant, it was effected by him in his capacity as landlord and that the question referred to the Full Bench did not arise. The case was then referred back to the Division Bench to be further dealt with and we have accordingly heard the Pleaders.

It must now be taken that the dispossession of the plaintiff was by the defendant No. 1 landlord, acting as such, and not as an auction-purchaser.

In the plaint it was distinctly stated that it was the defendant No. 1 who dispossessed the plaintiff and, as stated above, the suit was directed against the defendant No. 1 alone as the principal defendant. Upon the face of the plaint, therefore, the suit would be barred by the special rule of limitation.

It is contended, however, on behalf of the respondent that although there was an allegation that the dispossession was effected by the defendant No. 1, it was made on the footing that the dispossession took place at the date of delivery of symbolical possession and that now, it having been found that the dispossession was subsequently effected by the other defendants, the plaintiff should be allowed to proceed against those defendants only, leaving out the landlord defendant No. 1 who was an unnecessary party to the suit.

But, in the first place, the suit has proceeded up to now against the defendant No. 1 as the person who has dispossessed the plaintiff. In the body of the plaint, it is stated that it was he who had dispossessed the plaintiff and the prayer portion shows that the only person against whom any relief was claimed was defendant No. 1 with whom joint possession was claimed. No relief was claimed against the other defendants, who are described as pro forma defendants.

We have been asked to allow the plaintiff to amend the plaint, so that the defendant No. 1 may be left out of the suit altogether and the suit may be so framed as to claim relief against the pro forma defendants alone.

We do not think that this should be done at this stage. But apart from that we do not think that the defendant No. 1 is an unnecessary party to the suit. The dispossession effected by defendants Nos 2 to 32 was at the instigation of, and in collusion with, defendant No. 1, the landlord who inducted the tenants on the land. The plaintiffs, therefore, were dispossessed by defendant No. 1 through the tenants.

The decree of the lower Appellate Court is set aside, except in so far as it awards costs to defendant No. 25 which will stand, and the decree of the Court of first instance restored with costs.

The plaintiff will pay costs of this appeal to defendant No. 1 appellant and also pay his (i. e., appellant's) costs, as also the costs of defendant No. 25 in the lower Appellate Court.

There will be no separate costs for the Full Bench reference.

This judgment will govern the other two appeals (Second Appeals Nos. 1225 and 1226 of 1917).

Religious endowment, test for determining—Construction of document—Intention—Conduct.

In determining whether a transaction amounts to a dedication for a religious purpose the intention of the donor is an important factor, and as a guide to that intention regard must be had to his acts and declarations and the conduct of his heirs after his death. [p 583, col. 2.]

Where a Hindu executed an endowment deed of all his property in favour of an idol upon certain specific conditions, the fact that during his lifetime he did not comply with the conditions of the endowment would show that he had no religious intention and that the deed was not a deed of dedication. [p. 584, col. 2.]

First appeal against the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Benares, dated the 1st March 1917.

Messrs. B. E. O'Conor and H. K. Mukerji, for the Appellant.

Mr. Harnandan Prasad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case Musammat Mahesha Kuar asked for a declaration that certain property specified in a deed of November 6th, 1912, executed by her deceased husband Babu Bhan Singh was duly dedicated to and became the property of an idol installed in her house.

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that the transaction was invalid as not being prompted by religious motives. He came to the conclusion that the object of the deed was to keep the property inalienably in the line of Bhan Singh's daughter and daughter's sons, and perhaps also to exclude the operation of an alleged custom of Bhan Singh's caste whereby nephews in default of sons would inherit the property of the donor.

The decision of the case must turn on the question of the intention of the donor, and as a guide to that intention we must have regard to his acts and declarations and the conduct of his widow after his death.

SRI THAKURJI MAHARAJ v. SUHDEO SINGH.

The deed is a lenghty document, carefully drawn, and is in the usual form. The points of importance are that the donor purported irrevocably to make over to the idol, then stated to be installed in his house and described in the deed as Sri Thakurji, what was substantially the whole of his property, so that from the moment of the execution of the deed he and his wife had practically no income and property of at least the value of Rs. 30,000 passed from him to the idol.

In 1910 he had commenced partition proceedings, and in the deed of endowment he undertook to make an application to the Revenue Court for mutation of names in favour of the idol, whilst his name was to appear therein as manager. During his lifetime he was to be the manager and superintendent and he bound himself always to "use the income of the wakf property in meeting the expenses of the puja of and raj bhog to Sri Thakurji aforesaid and of repairing the house." Also he pledged himself always to keep a regular account of the income and expenditure.

After his death, the managership was to pass to his wife, if alive, and thereafter to his daughter's sons and downwards through their lineage.

The donor lived for about 16 months after the execution of the deed.

He did not apply that the name of the idol should be entered in the revenue papers, and he used only a fractional part of the income of the property for religious purposes—certainly not more than 1/10th and probably much less than that. The plaintiff did not produce any accounts to show in what way the income had been expended or surplus income applied. Interrogatories were drafted by the defendants on the questions, inter alia, of the value of the property and the expenditure of the income and the keeping of accounts. Objection was taken to these interrogatories on the ground that answering them would weaken the plaintiff's case, and apparently without exercising any judgment in the matter the order of the Judge was merely that the objection should be filed and defendants' Pleader informed. The Judge ought to have required the plaintiff to answer some of the interrogatories which were directly relevant to the enquiry. The absence of the answers embarrassed the defendants in the lower Court.

In that Court a large part of the evidence was directed to tracing out the history of the building of a temple for the reception of the idol and the date of the installation of the idol. As our decision does not depend on whether the contention of the plaintiff or the defendants is the right one on these points, we need not discuss this exhaustively, but we are of opinion that there was in the lifetime of the donor a family idol of Krishnaji, which was the idol indicated for worship in the deed of endowment, that the building of the temple was commenced and practically completed at least before the death of Bhan Singh and the idol duly installed, and we do not accept the story set up by the defendants that the temple was built and the idol installed within one month from the date of Bhan Singh's death. The circumstances of the building of the temple and the installation of the idol cannot, however, in our view prevail over the other facts which go to show that the donor's motive was to tie up the property and to render such property inalienable for generation after generation. He may also have wished to free it from any danger of descending to his nephews if the alleged custom should be proved, as it appears to have been in one case. We think that the following facts are decisive against the religious intention of the donor—

(a) the transfer of what in the Court below was assumed by both sides to be the whole of his property and agreed in this Court to represent practically all of it;

(b) the failure to obtain mutation of names;

(c) the failure to produce any accounts;

(d) the admitted fact that the expenditure on the idol was at the most 1/10th of the whole income;

(e) the absence of any explanation by the widow on any of the above points and of any account by her of her managership and dealing with the income after the death of her husband in 1914.

We, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs and fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. I, r. 8—Suit by temple worshippers to declare permanent lease to archakas invalid, maintainability of.

A suit by the worshippers of a temple for a declaration that a permanent lease granted to the Archakas in possession of the property is invalid, is maintainable under Order I, rule 8, Civil Procedure Code.

Appeal against the decree of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Musulipatam, in Original Suit No. 66 of 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. P. Narayanamurthi, for the Appellants.—The suit is not maintainable. It does not conform to the terms of section 42 of the Specific Relief Act. The plaintiffs who allege that they are worshippers have not such an interest in the property as to entitle them to sue. The interest must fall under section 42.

Messrs. P. R. Ganapathy Aiyar and V. Ramadoss, for the Respondents.—Section 42 of the Specific Relief Act is not exhaustive of the classes of declaratory suits. The worshippers of the temple have a substantial interest in the subject-matter of the suit. See Robert Fischer v. Secretary of State for India (1), Kalyana Venkataramana Aiyangar v. Kasturi Ranga Aiyangar (2) and Chidambaranatha Thambiran v. Nallasiva Mudaliar (3).

JUDGMENT.—The question is whether the worshippers of a temple can bring a suit for the declaration that a permanent lease granted to the defendants, who are Archakas in possession of the property, is invalid under Order I, rule 8 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The objection urged by the appellants is that a suit for a declaration must conform to the terms of section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, and since the worshippers as a body or their representatives under Order I, rule 8, cannot be said to have any right as to property within the meaning of section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, the suit is not maintainable. No authority has been cited for the appellants in support of this proposition; on the other hand the ruling of the Privy Council in Robert Fischer v. Secretary of State for India (1) suggests that section 42 of the Specific Relief Act is not exhaustive of cases in which declaratory suits may be maintained, and it was held by a Full Bench of this Court in Kalyana Venkataramana Aiyangar v. Kasturi Ranga Aiyangar (2) that such a suit as this is maintainable, though the question whether it came within the provisions of section 42, Specific Relief Act, was not raised then. There is also a ruling of this Court—Chidambaranatha Thambiran v. Nallasiva Mudaliar (3), where a suit by the disciples of a mutt was held to be maintainable under Order I, rule 8, for a declaration as to the invalidity of an alienation of the mutt property. We hold that the suit was maintainable.

Mr. B. E. O'Conor and Dr. S. N. Sen, for the Appellant.

Messrs. S. K. Dar and Harnandan Pershad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

PIGGOTT, J.—This appeal arises out of an application made under paragraph 20 of the Second Schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure to have an award made in an arbitration conducted without the interven tion of the Court filed. The party contesting the award put in what we may call a written statement, in which they contested the award on a great variety of grounds. They went so far as to contend that the award sought to be filed had never been made by the gentleman to whose arbitration the matters in dispute between the parties had been referred, but was a forgery concocted after that gentleman's death. On the pleadings of the parties a number of issues were fixed, ten in all, and the case was set down for hearing. The objector moved the Court to decide first of all two issues only, in respect of which it was represented to the Court that it would not be necessary to take any evidence. The issues as framed ran as follows:—Issue No. 2. "Has the arbitrator determined any matter not referred to arbitration under the agreement dated the 6th April 1918?"

Issue No. 4. "Is an objection to the legality of the award apparent on the fact of it?"

On each of these issues the Court below, after hearing arguments, found in the affirmative, and on these findings alone, and without any enquiry into the matters of fact raised by the pleadings, it has dismissed the application to have the award filed. The appeal before us is against the order refusing to file the award, and we have to consider whether that order is justified upon the only findings which have been recorded. The first finding is that the arbitrator has determined two matters not referred to arbitration under the agreement. The first of these matters relates to a sum of Rs. 2,000 which the arbitrator has held in effect to be a debt due from the joint family business, the assets of which it was his duty to apportion between the parties to the arbitration, and due from them to a connection of the family named Baijnath Prasad. Now it is quite true that Baijnath Prasad was no party to the reference, that there is no mention of Baijnath Prasad in the agreement of reference and that the arbitrator had no authority to make an award of Rs. 2,000, or of any other sum, in favour of Baijnath Prasad. The arbitrator, however, was bound to distribute between the parties the assets of the joint family business, and in so doing he recorded a finding that those assets were subject to a liability of Rs. 2,000 in favour of Baijnath Prasad. It is only incidentally relevant to note that he purports to do this with the full consent of the parties to the agreement; but in any case he had authority to determine what were the divisible assets of the business before he proceeded to divide them. Looking at the matter from another point of view, it may be that, in so far as the award purports to operate in favour of Baijnath Prasad to the extent of Rs. 2,000, it is a matter which can be separated from the rest of the award without affecting the determination of the matter really referred to the arbitrator, namely, the division of the assets of the joint family business. This is, of course, subject to what has already been remarked, namely, that for the purpose of determining the divisible assets the arbitrator had authority to find that the assets of the firm were less by Rs. 2,000 in consequence of a debt due to Baijnath Prasad. This portion of the award is within the powers of the arbitrator. The award cannot operate as a decree in favour of Baij Nath Parsad who was not a party to the reference but if, and in so far as, it purports to do so, that portion of the award is obviously separable from the rest. The same remarks apply in substance to the other portion of the award in which the arbitrator finds that certain money and jewellery must be taken out of the divisible assets of the joint family and left with one Musammat

Tara Devi, a member of the family. I hold, therefore, that the finding of the Court below on the second issue fixed by it is incorrect and that the award is not open to any valid objection on the ground of the arbitrator's having determined a matter not covered by the agreement of reference.

The decision of the Court below on the fourth issue raises two quite distinct points. They may be conveniently taken in the reverse order to that in which they are dealt with in the judgment under appeal. Part of the arbitrator's duty was to divide between the parties certain residential houses. The objector contends that the arbitrator first of all made a division of those houses in a particular way and that he subsequently altered that decision. In so doing it is contended that the arbitrator acted illegally and that this illegality is apparent on the face of the award, within the meaning of paragraph 14 (c) of the Schedule. We have been taken through that part of the award in which the decision about these residential houses is embodied, and in my opinion it does not show that the arbitrator was guilty of any illegality. I wish to express myself somewhat cautiously on this point, because I think it necessary to distinguish between an illegality apparent on the face of the award and an allegation of misconduct on the part of the arbitrator. I can conceive of cases in which it might amount to misconduct on the part of an arbitrator, dealing with a reference covering a large number of matters, to announce to the parties a final decision upon one of those matters and at a later stage to revise that decision, in spite of the protest of one of the parties affected by it. We are not called upon to consider whether the arbitrator in the present case was guilty of any misconduct of this kind. The simple point is whether the final award made by the arbitrator in respect of these residential houses, as embodied in paragraph 18 of the award, is on the face of it illegal. The paragraph is somewhat curiously worded. The arbitrator does not content himself with merely announcing his final decision on the point, but goes into a detailed recital of the negotiations between the parties and so forth which had preceded his final decision. He evidently felt that this question of the residential houses was one of the most difficult of those with which he had to deal with, and he gives in the most candid manner his reasons for finding the point a difficult one to determine. He says that on the 14th of June he proposed to determine it in a certain way, but that only two days later, i.e., on the 15th of June, upon some suggestion made to him, he decided that one of the parties alone should take both the houses concerned, provided compensation, which he assessed at Rs. 7,000, was paid down within a week to the opposite party. He then notes that this payment was not made within the period which he had fixed, but that the party required to make it asked for more time and finally tendered the money after the date which he had fixed. The opposite party then refused to accept the tender and asked the arbitrator to take up the question of the division of the houses de novo and to give his own decision on the point. The arbitrator says that, if he were looking at the matter as a pure question of law, he could not deny that the party who had been required to pay Rs. 7,000 had a reasonable cause for asking for extension of time, but the fact remained that the negotiations which had ended in the proposal to allot both the houses to one party upon prompt payment of this compensation had broken down and that the matter was referred back to him to be decided upon his honour and conscience. In a somewhat quaint phrase, which seems quite unnecessarily to have excited the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge, the arbitrator says in effect that the voice of conscience compelled him to re-consider his decision and to make a division of the houses in a certain way. This he proceeds to do in detail. I was about to add that he does this before signing the award on the 12th of August 1918, but I am at once brought up by the fact that one of the objections taken by the respondent in this Court was that the award was never really signed by the arbitrator at all. This may serve to illustrate the practical inconvenience of the course adopted by the Court below in taking out these two issues from the rest and attempting to decide them separately. As the matter stands, however, I am obliged to deal with it as if the question of fact had been determined, for purposes of argument, in favour of the appellant in this Court, that is to say, as if there were no doubt that the arbitrator did in fact formally sign this award embodying his final decision on the question of division of the house property, on the date which that document purports to bear, namely, the 12th of August 1918. In fact I am bound to take the document as it stands and to determine simply whether its 18th paragraph, embodying the arbitrator's decision on the question of the houses, is open to an objection on the score of illegality apparent on the face of the award itself. I feel quite unable to accept the view of the Court below on this point. It seems to me that this question must clearly be answered in the negative. The other point taken in connection with the same issue presents to my mind a good deal more difficulty, but I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the Court below cannot be affirmed. The arbitrator had to deal with the assets of a certain cloth business and those assets he avowedly desired to distribute equally between the parties. For some reason or other the quantity of cloth which he actually assigned to one party was of greater value than that which he assigned to the other, and he desired to order the party receiving the larger quantity of cloth to make such payment in cash as would equalise the division so far as this particular item of the joint property was concerned. In so doing he obviously fell into a mistake arising out of pure confusion of mind. He should have seen that, in order to equalise the division of this particular item in the assets, the party receiving the larger quantity of cloth should be required to pay to the opposite party one half of the excess value. Instead of so directing, he has ordered payment of the whole of the excess value, thereby obviously making the division between the parties, so far as this particular item is concerned, unequal precisely to the same extent as it would have been if he had awarded the cloth itself in unequal shares and given no direction at all as to payment of compensation. The contention for the respondent, which has been accepted by the Court below, is that, although the arbitrator would have been quite within his powers if he had divided the cloth unequally between the two parties, nevertheless, seeing that he avowedly set out to make an equal division, but has in fact made an unequal division, he has been guilty of an illegality, and that this illegality is apparent on the face of the award. I ought to note at once that the sum of money involved is a trifling one compared with the value of the properties with which the arbitrator had to deal. It comes to only Rs. 233-14-0. In the course of the argument on this point we were referred to a number of decisions, of which I desire to mention two only. The case of Mustafa Khan v. Phulja Bibi (1) does no more than lay down this principle, that the Court has no power to amend an award made in a matter referred to arbitration without the intervention of the Court. It must either allow the application to file the award, thus making the entire award a decree of Court, or reject that application altogether, thereby referring the parties back to the position in which they stood before the agreement to refer to arbitration was entered into. In the course of their decision in the above case the learned Judges referred to an older case, that of Allarakhia Shiji v. Jehangir Hormasji (2). On the face of it that case seemed to me decisive against the respondent. The learned Judges of the Bombay High Court had before them an award in which, by an obvious and palpable mistake, the arbitrator had given one of the parties Rs. 4,000 in excess of what he had intended to give. The learned Judges came, with undisguised reluctance, to the conclusion that they had no authority either to refer the matter back to the arbitrator, or to correct the obvious error into which he had fallen. But the point to be noticed is that, finding themselves tied down to the two alternatives noticed in the Allahabad decision, the alternative which they adopted was to file the award, that is to say, to make it a decree of Court as it stood, including the gross and palpable mistake in favour of one party and to the detriment of the other. The learned Counsel for the respondent has very keenly contended that it would not be right to treat the decision of the Bombay High Court in this matter as an authority against him, because that decision was pronounced under the Code of 1859, and undoubtedly several of the provisions of that Code regarding arbitration, and more particularly as to arbitration without the intervention of the Court, were amended when the Code of 1882 was passed and have been further amended in the present Code of Civil Procedure (Act V of 1908). Under the Code of 1859 the Court was bound to file the award if no sufficient cause be shown against it. Those words are perfectly general and the decision as it stands certainly implies that the learned Judges did not consider the fact of the arbitrator's having fallen into a confusion of mind, and made a clerical or arithmetical error, a sufficient cause against the award. In arriving at this conclusion they no doubt based their decision mainly on the wording of certain sections of Act No. VIII of 1859. The fact remains, however, that they seem to have acted on the broad view that, when parties submit a particular matter to the final decision of an arbitrator selected by themselves, they take their chance of his making a clerical or arithmetical error, just as much as they take their chance of his misinterpreting a document or refusing to believe the oral evidence of a perfectly trustworthy witness. At any rate the question now before us is to be decided with reference to the words of the relevant paragraphs of the Second Schedule to the present Code of Civil Procedure (Act No. V of 1908). There are only two paragraphs which have been suggested as applicable. The Court below has applied clause (c) of paragraph 14, holding that this arithmetical confusion into which the arbitrator fell is an objection to the legality of the award. It seems to me that it was no more illegal for the arbitrator to make a mistake in arithmetic than it would be illegal for him to disbelieve a truthful witness, or to be misled by the falsehood of a plausible liar. I find myself unable to concur in the opinion that this mistake amounts to an illegality, or that the objection founded upon it can be correctly described as an objection to the legality of the award. As an alternative to this contention the learned Counsel for the respondent relied upon the concluding words of paragraph 15 (1) (c). This clause gives it as a valid ground for setting aside an award its having been made after the issue of an order by the Court superseding the arbitration and proceeding with the suit, or after the expiration of the period allowed by the Court, or being otherwise invalid. These last words must, I think, be held to relate to some matter ejusdem generis with those preceding, and I come back in substance to the same opinion as I have already expressed upon the other contention put forward on behalf of the respondent. I do not see that an award can be said to be otherwise invalid, within the meaning of this particular paragraph, because it contains a palpable arithmetical mistake.

I ought perhaps to notice that, beside supporting the decision of the Court below on the grounds on which it has proceeded, the learned Counsel for the respondent asked us to take into consideration certain matters which in his opinion show that the arbitrator had left undetermined one of the points referred to him for arbitration. I do not think that this is a contention which can fairly be taken in the present appeal. It was at the request of the objector to the award, that is to say, of the party appearing as respondent before this Court, that the Court below confined its decision entirely to the second and fourth issues, and what we have to determine is whether we agree with or dissent from the decision on those two issues. It is not really open to the respondent to raise a fresh issue here. Moreover, I think that, as the matter was laid before us in argument, there did not seem to me to be any real reason for holding that the arbitrator had failed to determine any of the matters covered by the reference. For these reasons I would set aside the decision of the Court below and return the case to that Court, in order that it may proceed to determine the rest of the issues fixed by it and to enquire into the objections taken to the award on their merits.

WALSH, J.—I agree that this case must go back for a proper trial. It seems to me that the lower Court has wholly misconceived the functions of a tribunal which has to decide whether an award in a private arbitration should be filed or not, and has adopted in this case a procedure which much too frequently inflicts great hardship upon litigants, and is upon every ground to be deplored. We have listened this morning to arguments in support of this decree, which to put the matter succinctly invited us to ignore the principles which have been laid down for years by the Privy Council, and which are elementary and ought to be familiar to every legal practitioner. The respondent before us resisted the filing of this award by a document setting out his grounds of objection which amounted in number to no less than 17. The first of them went to the root of the transaction, if there was any substance in his case at all; and one would have thought that he would have put it, as he did in his enumeration of his grounds, in the forefront of the litigation. It alleged that the award was not the work of the arbitrator at all. The arbitrator, be it observed, was then dead. Having regard to the fact that the arbitrator set out in the award with great care his relationship with the parties, his personal intimacy with them, and the advantages which he enjoyed in his acquaintance with the lady members of the family as being the reason why he had been specially selected for this duty, it is to me absolutely unintelligible why the present respondent adopted the position that he did in the Court below unless he had no case, because all those recitals by the arbitrator would be shams and frauds if there is anything in his first objection. What he did was to invite the learned Judge to step into what I can only describe as a trap, and to decide as a preliminary point his so-called points of law, giving the go-by to the obvious fact that if his real answer were true, there would be an end both of the award and of any legal argument. The learned Judge has fallen into the trap, the fact, as I have said, is to my mind to be deplored and has allowed himself, although his duty was to try and decide the case raised by the parties, to wander off into these highly technical and unsubstantial points. And this is the reason above all others that I deplore the tendency to arrogate to themselves, as I think the lower Courts are too fond of doing, the functions of a Court of Appeal from the arbitrator. Nothing is easier than to be wise after the event, and for a trained lawyer weighing ingenious arguments by expert Counsel to pick holes in an elaborate document drawn up by a layman, a friend of the parties doing his best to carry out the request made to him by them and to give them a decision on a variety of complicated matters and so save them from prolonged litigation. That is the reason why the Legislature has always carefully provided that alike on matters of fact and on matters of law decided by an arbitrator there shall be no appeal, and the Privy Council in Indian cases and the House of Lords in English cases has almost exhausted itself in trying to make this clear to the trial Courts. The issues which were ultimately tried were, whether the arbitrator decided points not submitted to him and whether there was any illegality on the face of the award. As regards some of these points, to my mind they are so trumpery that they are difficult to answer. In one instance it is complained that the arbitrator set apart a provisional sum for payment to a third person out of the assets of the family. Of course that does not affect and could not affect the rights of the third party. How in the world it can be suggested that the arbitrator had no jurisdiction to make such a direction I am utterly at a loss to understand. The point was a foolish one and idle waste of time. Similarly with regard to the point—whether for reasons good, bad or indifferent does not matter in the least, because an arbitrator has a perfect right to go wrong—that he gave directions with regard to the jewellery of the daughter of a deceased brother of the family. Here he was deciding matters of fact in dividing property, and distributing the assets of the joint family. I am surprised to find it suggested that that was a matter outside the jurisdiction of the arbitrator. Then it is said about the poor man that he changed his mind in the course of consideration of some point before he came to his final decision about it. It is a perfectly childish complaint to my mind. The only point which gave me any trouble at all was the suggestion that an obvious mistake of arithmetic on the face of the award might amount to illegality. I agree with all that my brother has said about this matter. My only difficulty really arose from my acquaintance with the practice of the English Courts in such cases, but there again I am satisfied that English Courts have wider powers both as regards amending or remitting to the arbitrator an award, when there has been something of that kind, although be it observed that they have on a motion to set aside the award sometimes refused to interfere in such cases. The frequency with which these cases occur in which some one of the parties, dissatisfied with the decision by an arbitrator, endeavours to re open it by hook or by crook in the trial Court leads me to cite once more what the Privy Council has said upon the subject. Lord Macnaghten in Ghulam Khan v. Muhammad Hassan (3) says: "The time has long gone by since the Courts of this country shewed any disposition to sit as a Court of Appeal on awards in respect of matters of fact or in respect of matters of law." He is there referring to the English Courts and he cites the case of Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co. (4) of which Lord Halsbury says: "where the parties have selected their Judge in such cases, you have to show a great deal more than mere error on the part of the arbitrator in the conclusion at which he has arrived before the Court can interfere with his award. The parties had agreed to accept the arbitrator's decision upon the question of law as well as his decision upon facts." Lord Macnaghten in the case I have already referred to says: "They (arbitrators) may have erred in law, but arbitrators may be Judges of law as well as Judges of fact and an error in law certainly does not vitiate an award," a fortiori an error in fact, and, therefore, an error in arithmetic cannot vitiate an award.

I agree entirely with what my brother has said about the distinction to be observed between illegality on the face of the award, and misconduct by the arbitrator. There may, of course, be mistakes so palpable and gross that they afford strong evidence of misconduct, but speaking for myself at any rate in this case I hold strongly the view that the Court below ought not to allow any of the questions already raised and disposed of in this appeal to be raised afresh under the guise of a suggestion of evidence of misconduct by the arbitrator.

With regard to costs we think that the whole of this useless litigation, as it has been up to the present point, is due to the defendant's Counsel inviting the trial Court to discuss his so-called law points and contrary to the usual practice, the defendant must pay all the costs of the proceedings up to this stage together with the costs of this appeal, which in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

PIGGOTT, J.—I agree as to costs.

BY THE COURT.—The appeal is allowed, the case remanded to the Court below for decision on the merits. The appellant will get costs in this Court including fees on the higher scale.

HEMUMAL HARPALMAL—APPELLANT

THE COMMITTEE OF MANAGEMENT, HYDERABAD - RESPONDENT.

Bombay District Municipal Act (III of 1901), ss. 92, 160—Applicability of s. 160—Municipality acquiring land and obtaining possession by mistake—Mistake, whether of law or fact—Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 21—Compensation or price not fixed or paid—Sale, necessary ingredients of—Price not ascertainable, effect of—Suit for possession against Municipality, whether maintainable.

Defendant Municipality, purporting to act under section 92 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, offered plaintiff a certain price for a plot of land or to refer the matter to a Panchayet to fix the price. Plaintiff gave possession of the land, but the parties were unable to agree to the price and plaintiff was referred to the District Court to have the price fixed. Subsequently it was discovered that the defendant's action was not authorised by law and plaintiff brought the present suit to recover possession. The suit was dismissed on the ground that as the plaintiff had agreed to part with the land at a price to be fixed under section 160 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, there was a contract binding on him and that the mistake as to the right of the defendant to act under section 92 of that Act was a mistake of law, which under section 21 of the Contract Act did not invalidate the contract. Plaintiff appealed:

Held, (1) that the mistake of the parties in respect of the right of the defendant to acquire the land was one of fact and, therefore, did not fall under section 21 of the Contract Act; [p. 592, col 2.]

(2) that the contract between the parties was merely one for the sale of immoveable property which, under section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, did not of itself create any interest in, or charge upon, property; [p. 593, col. 1.]

(3) that the defendant had no power to act under section 92 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, and consequently section 160 of that Act did not apply; [p. 594, col. 1.]

(4) that inasmuch as the price is the essence of a contract of sale and the price in the present case was not ascertainable in the manner contemplated by the parties, there was no price promised within the meaning of section 50 of the Contract Act, there was no valid sale and the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession [p. 594, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Hyderabad.

Mr. Gopaldas Jhamatmal, for the Appellant.

Mr. Kundanmal Dayaram, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

FAWCETT, J. C.—This is a second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Hyderabad, confirming a decree of the Joint Subordinate Judge, Hyderabad, dismissing the plaintiff-appellant's suit with costs. The facts found are that the defendant respondent, purporting to act under section 92 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, gave the plaintiff notice to remove his "Thala," when he applied for permision to re-build on his plot under section 96 of the Act. They offered him Rs. 1-9-7 per foot as compensation and called upon him to accept this amount or refer the matter to a duly constituted Panchayet. The plaintiff in compliance with this notice appointed two arbitrators and a Panchayet was constituted, in accordance with section 160 of the Municipal Act. They could not agree upon the price, and so the plaintiff was referred to the District Court to have the amount of compensation fixed. The plaintiff also gave up possession of the "Thala," but whether voluntarily or under compulsion is not clear. Discovering subsequently that the defendant's action was not authorised by law (no street line having been fixed on that side of the street), plaintiff brought a suit to recover possession of the land. Both the lower Courts have held that, as the plaintiff had agreed to the Municipality having the land at a price to be fixed under section 160 of the Municipal Act, there was a contract binding upon him, and that the mistake in regard to the right of the Municipality to act under section 92 of the Act was a mistake in law, which under section 21 of the Contract Act did not invalidate the contract. These conclusions are questioned in this second appeal. The further point is taken that the lower Court erred in raising for the defence a case which had not been set up in the written statement.

It is no doubt true that the written statement does not specifically plead that there was a binding contract of the kind held established, but paragraphs 4 and 5, in my opinion, do sufficiently cover this point. The pleas there taken amount to saying that plaintiff's acquiescence in the taking of the land and the reference about its price precluded him from recovering its possession. It is also quite clear that the question ,of the alleged contract was tried and decided by both the lower Courts, and the second issue in the suit, viz., whether the plaintiff is not competent to maintain this suit as alleged in paragraph 4 of the written statement, sufficiently covers the point in question. It is not alleged that the plaintiff has, in any way, been taken by surprise, and his memo. of the appeal to the District Judge contained no objection of the kind now raised. Accordingly, I hold that the objection fails.

Coming to the main point in issue, it seems to me that the mistake of the parties in supposing that the Municipality had power to acquire the land under section 92 of the Municipal Act is really a mistake of fact and not a mistake of law falling under section 21 of the Indian Contract Act, as it has been held to be in the lower Courts. There was no mistake as to the effect of the provisions of section 92, but the mistake was in supposing that a street line had been fixed on the side of the street on which the plaintiff's building was, so that the Municipality could act under section 92. This is clearly a mistake about a matter of fact, and even if the mistake is one which depended upon a question of a mixed law and fact, it does not constitute a 'mistake of law' in the sense in which that expression is used in England. See Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume XX[, Article 7 at page 4, and Pollock and Mulla's Indian Contract Act, 3rd Edition, page 113, where it is said that there seems to be nothing to prevent the Indain Courts from following the same view. If that is so, then, in any case, the supposed agreement would seem void under section 20, for it can hardly be disputed that the mistake was one as to a matter of fact essential to the agreement. But as this point has not been taken or argued in the appeal, I do not base my judgment upon it.

Both the lower Courts have held, that the ruling in the Poona City Municipality v. Ramchandra (1) applies to this case. Mr. Gopaldas for the appellant contends that this is not so and I think he is right. In that case, the Municipality appealed from an order of the District Judge awarding compensation under section 160 of the Municipal Act, and it was contended amongst other things that there was no valid and binding contract by the Municipality to purchase the land. Apparently the possession of the land had not been taken, and the plaintiff in that case was virtually seeking specific performance of the alleged contract for the acquisition of the land. The High Court held that there was a contract to sell at a fair valuation, where the Court not only could provide, but under a special Statute was compelled to provide, the means of ascertaining the price, and that specific performance of such a contract was awardable. But the present case is a very different one. The positions are reversed and the mere fact that specific performance of the alleged contract might be granted to the Municipality, if they brought a proper suit for the purpose, is not a sufficient answer to the plaintiff's claim to get possession of the land as its rightful owner. This follows from the fact that the contract is merely one for the sale of immoveable property, which under the express terms of section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act does not of itself create any interest in or charge on such property. Accordingly, it was held in Kurri Veerareddi v. Kurri Bapireddi (2) that a contract for sale followed by delivery of possession does not, when there is no registered sale deed, create any interest in the property agreed to be sold and cannot, even if enforceable at date of suit or decree, be pleaded in defence to an action for ejectment by one having a legal title to recover; and that the most that the defendant in such a suit of ejectment can do is to institute a suit for specific performance of the contract and then apply to have the trial of the ejectment suit stayed pending the trial of his own suit for specific performance. This decision is strengthened by the remarks of the Privy Council in Maung Shwe Goh v. Maung Inn (3). In the Poona City Municipality v. Ramchandra (1) it was not necessary to consider section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, for the fact that specific performance could be granted was sufficient to defeat the plea on which the Municipality attempted to upset the order of compensation that had been passed by the District Judge. That fact, as already remarked, is not necessarily sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's claim for recovery of possession of the land. Therefore, the case is clearly distinguishable from the one dealt with in Poona City Municipality v. Ramchandra (1).

If, however, the value of the land is less than Rs. 100, then it might be contended that there had been a valid sale of the land by delivery of the property under the 3rd paragraph of section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. It seems possible that the value might be less than Rs. 100, having regard to the fact that the 'Thala' is stated in the plaint to measure 20 square feet and to be worth Rs. 80 while the Municipality offered compensation at Rs. 1-9-7 per foot. This was, I think, overlooked by Mr. Gopaldas in the arguments he addressed to us, for in that case the ruling in Kurri Veerareddi v. Kurri Bapireddi (2) is not conclusive in his favour. But Mr. Gopaldas further contends that there was no consent of the plaintiff to sell and that as the price is the essence of a contract of sale, there could be no real sale. Here again, I think, he is right. Sale, as defined in section 54, is a transfer of ownership in exchange for a price paid or promised or part paid and part promised, and as the essence of the contract lies in the exchange it is, in my opinion, very doubtful whether a transaction under which property is compulsorily acquired and a price is fixed on the basis of compensation, can be said to constitute a sale within the definition. The owner is obliged to part with the land, whether he wants to or not, and has not the freedom existing in an ordinary voluntary transfer of ownership. But, in any case, there must be a price paid or promised, or part paid and part promised. In this case there can only be said to be a price promised, on the basis of the maxim id certum est quod certum reddi potest. But is the price ascertainable within the maning of this maxim? In the case of Poona City Municipality v. Ramchandra (1) it had power to acquire the land and section 160 of the Municipal Act was, therefore, applicable. In the present case, the Municipality, admittedly, had no power to act under section 92 and the provisions of section 160 apply only in the case of a dispute regarding compensation, etc., which is directed by the Act to be paid, they cannot, therefore, come into operation. In Dinham v. Bradford (4), referred to in the Poona City Municipality v. Ramchandra (1), the Court could substitute itself for the arbitrators in the exercise of its jurisdiction as a Court of Chancery in a proceeding for the taking of a partnership account, which was pending before it and in the Poona City Municipality's case (1) the District Court had, as already remarked, power to fix the compensation and had in fact done so. But in the present case the District Court has no jurisdiction to fix the price, and accordingly the price, not being ascertainable in the manner contemplated by the parties, is not a price promised within the meaning of section 54 of the Contract Act. 'Promised' in that section has, of course, the meaning that it bears in the Contract Act, namely, proposed and accepted: see section 2 (b). What was proposed and accepted was that the price should be fixed in the manner specified in section 160 of the Municipal Act. But as that manner cannot be followed, there is in effect no agreement as to price, and the Court cannot ascertain the price in any other manner and enforce the contract with the price so ascertained, for that would be making a new contract for the parties, see Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume XXV, Article 496, foot-note (f) at page 292. I, therefore, hold that there has been no valid sale of the land to the Municipality and that the ground on which the lower Courts have dismissed the plaintiff's suit is legally unsustainable.

I would, therefore, reverse the decrees of the lower Courts and grant plaintiff possession of the land with costs throughout.

REYMOND, A. J. C.—I concur.

Jurisdiction of Civil and Revenue Courts—Suit by rent-free grantee to recover possession of land, whether cognizable by Civil Court.

A suit by a rent-free grantee for possession of land from which he has been wrongfully ejected by the Zemindar is cognizable by a Civil Court. [p. 595, col. 1.]

Appeal from the order of the Subordinate Judge, Cawnpore, dated the 14th March 1919.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff came into Court alleging himself to be the rent-free grantee of certain land. He stated that the defendants Zemindars had forcibly and unlawfully ejected him from possession and enjoyment of this land on the strength, of certain proceedings which they had taken behind his back in the Revenue Court; to which proceedings he had never been made a party. The suit was brought in the Court of a Munsif, who tried out all the issues on the merits and gave the plaintiff a decree. The decree was one restoring the plaintiff to the possession which he had previously enjoyed, that is to say, to the possession of a rent-free grantee, enjoying all the rights but subject to all the liabilities imposed on such garantees by Chapter X of the Local Tenancy Act (No. II of 1901). There was an appeal, which was heard by the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore. It appears that various pleas were taken on behalf of the defendants, but that they were all abandoned except one plea against the jurisdiction of the trial Court. The learned Subordinate Judge, referring to the decision in Nannhu v. Sri Thakurji Maharaj (1) and placing a certain interpretation on the plaint, held that this was a suit cognisable only by a Revenue Court. On this ground he reversed the decision of the first Court and dismissed the suit. The ruling referred to by the lower Appellate Court has no bearing on the facts of the present case. The plaintiff came into Court, alleging that he had been wrongfully ejected and seeking to be restored to the same possession which he had previously enjoyed. A rent-free grantee is not a tenant within the meaning of the definition in the Local Tenancy Act (No. II of 1901). There is no section in the Act and no Article in the Schedule, which provides for a suit by a grantee to recover possession as such, in the event of his wrongful ejectment, even though that ejectment may be the act of his Zamindar. Consequently if the present plaintiff had no remedy in the Civil Court he had no remedy anywhere. The decision of the lower Appellate Court is clearly wrong. As the plea of jurisdiction was the only one pressed in that Court, it follows that the decision of the Court of first instance on the merits must be restored. We accept this appeal, set aside the order appealed against and restore the decree of the first Court. The case has been heard ex parte, but the appellant must get his costs.

Defendant, the owner of land which formed an unrecognised division of a Narwa, mortgaged it but continued in possession under yearly leases. Plaintiff, the assignee of the mortgagee, sued to recover possession of the land on the ground that it had been based to defendant, and it was contended that the mortgage and lease were void under section 3 of the Bhagdari and Narwadari Act:

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Ahmedabad, in Appeal No. 402 of 1915, confirming the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Umreth, in Civil Suit No. 182 of 1915.

Mr. R. J. Thakor, for the Appellant.

Mr, G. N. Thakor, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued to recover possession of the plaint land on the ground that it had been leased to the defendant, and for Rs. 39 for rent.

He alleged the land belonged to one Marghabhai Babar, who leased it to defendant for one year for Rs. 39 by a lease dated 30th June 1914. The plaintiff was an assignee of the lease under a deed dated the 14th June 1915.

The defendant was the owner of the suit land which formed an unrecognised division of a Narwa. In 1895 he mortgaged it to Babar Solaidas, but continued in possession, first under a lease for ten years, then under yearly leases of a moiety, and finally under yearly leases of the whole. Merghabhai Babar and his nephew assigned their mortgage rights, a decree and the lease of the 20th June 1914 to the plaintiff in 1915, DEVIDAS DWARKADAS v. SHAMAL GOPAL.

At the trial defendant's Pleader contended that the mortgage and lease were void under section 3 of the Bhagdari and Narwadari Act, 1862. The learned trial Judge held that the mortgage, the lease and the assignment were all void and dismissed the suit.

In first appeal the learned Appellate Judge considered that the question whether the plaintiff could recover turned on the question whether he ever got possession and remanded the case for trial of issues as to when Margha got physical possession of the land.

The lower Court found that Margha did not obtain physical possession until after March 1905.

It was proved that the defendant mortgagor remained in possession after the mortgage under a lease for ten years. On the 11th August 1905 he passed a lease for a moiety of the land (Exhibit 27), although he said he remained in possession of the whole. Then for the monsoon of Sambat 1965 he passed a lease for the whole of the land, Exhibit 28. On the other hand the mortgagee said he personally cultivated the land in 1961 but took the defendant into partnership and got him to execute Exhibit 27, and pursued the same course for three or four years until Exhibit 28 was passed in 1965. After that the defendant passed a lease for the whole of the land.

On these findings the learned District Judge came to the conclusion that the vice of the original alienation had not been cured and the suit was not maintainable.

But from the decision in Javerbhai v Gordhan (1) it may be gathered that physical possession is not necessary. In that case the defendant mortgaged a house, which formed an unrecognized division of a Bhag, to the plaintiff in 1901 for Rs. 729. The deed of mortgage contained a covenant to pay compensation to the mortgagee in the event of there being any hindrance or obstruction concerning the house. The defendant continued in possession under yearly rent notes. At the determination of the rent note for the year ending July 1909 the defendant refused to surrender possession. On the 9th November 1910 the plaintiff sued to recover possession of the house or in the alternative for Rs. 729 as compensation. It was held that the mortgage and the rent notes were void under the provisions of the Bhagdari Act, that the consideration for the mortgage failed ab initio and a suit to recover the money as received for the plaintiff's use was barred under section 62 of the Indian Limitation Act, but it was open to the plaintiff to claim under the covenant, although the mortgage was void. But it was also held that the mortgagee was in adverse possession of the limited interest as mortgagee in possession and in assertion of that right held adversely to the defendant who continuously attorned to him. It would follow that if such adverse possession had continued for twelve years the plaintiff would have been able to recover possession as mortgagee. If that decision is correct, the plaintiff in this case would be entitled to recover as having been in possession for more than twelve years.

The real question is whether the mortgage was void. If it was, the lease for ten years and the rent notes would also be void.

The defendants can plead their illegality in answer to the plaintiff's suit. In Adam Umar v. Bapu Bavaji (2) it was held that possession acquired under an alienation made in contravention of section 3 of the Bhagdari and Nawadari Act, 1862, can become adverse and bar a suit for recovery by the individual alienor or his representatives-in-interest. In Jethabhai v. Nathabhai (3) the plaintiff obtained under a deed of compromise a portion of a Bhag or share in a Narva other than a recognized division of such Bhag or Narva. The Commissioner held that the alienation was void and put the defendant in possession. The plaintiff then filed the suit claiming to be entitled to succeed by adverse possession. Chandavarkar, J., said: "But it is of the essence of a title by adverse possession that it must relate to some property, which is recognized by law. But here there is no such property, since the Legislature has prescribed the kind of property on which the plaintiffs seek to found their title by adverse possession."

In Javerbhai v. Gordhan (1) Batchelor, J., distinguished this on the ground that the plaintiffs there contended that they held the land as forming part of the holding and as subject to all the incidents of the tenure. But it is difficult to see how a mortgagee can obtain a title to the mortgage by adverse possession. He is not in possession adversely to the mortgagor and the very essence of adverse possession is that it must be hostile to the interest of the real owner. What is meant, I suppose, is that the possession is hostile to any defence that may be raised by the mortgagor that the mortgage is void. Ramchandra Venkaji Naik v. Kallo Devji Deshpande (4) was a converse case. In 1909 the plaintiff sued to redeem property consisting of Watan Inam land which had been mortgaged by his grandfather in 1867. The defendants mortgagees contended that the mortgage became void under the Watan Act on the death of the mortgagor in 1873 and that they had been in adverse possession since then. It was held the mortgagee remained a mortgagee for the purpose of a redemption suit. Unless there was some definite indication on the part of the person in possession that he would from a certain date claim as owner and not as mortgagee, he could only acquire by adverse possession the limited interest to which he was entitled at the mortgagor's death, namely, that of mortgagee. That would be an authority in this case for holding that the defence that the mortgage was void ab initio was not available to the defendant. But the defendant and his assignor having attorned to the plaintiff, I do not think it is open to the defendant in this suit to contend that the plaintiff had no right to let out the property on rent, so that I think the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he claims. We have nothing to do with the question whether the defendant will be able hereafter to set aside the mortgage, nor with the powers which the Collector has under the Act to avoid the alienation. The appeal is allowed. The plaintiff must be put in possession of the plaint land, and there will be a decree for Rs. 39 with costs throughout.

HEATON, J.—I agree that the plaintiff must be awarded possession of the property and one year's rent. We need not, I think, in this case, express any definite opinion on the question of acquiring the rights of a mortgagee by adverse possession. It is a difficult question, and my mind is far from clear on the point. But for other reasons altogether, I think the plaintiff must succeed here. The defendant was in the position of a tenant, and it appears from the facts found by the Appellate Court that he was placed in possession of this land by the person, the plaintiff, who purports to be the landlord, and his possession since then has been continuously possession of a tenant under a landlord. Where these are the facts, I think that the principle of section 116 of the Indian Evidence Act must prevail, and it must be held that the defendant must surrender possession before he can place himself in a position successfully to plead that the tenancy is void.

NABIN CHANDRA SHAHA v. WAJID.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision on the ground that the Court below had no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from the order of the Court of first instance. What happened in this case was this. A house was sold by auction in execution of a decree and was purchased by the present applicant. He deposited one-fourth of the purchase-money as required by Order XXI, Civil Procedure Code, but he did not deposit the balance within the fortnight allowed. He, however, made an application to the Court, asking it to set aside the sale on the ground that the property was subject to encumbrances and he had been misled by the omission of encumbrances in the proclamation of sale into purchasing the property. This application was not justified by any of the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. The Court, however, set aside the sale and ordered the property to be re-sold. This order it was justified in making by the provisions of Order XXI, rule 84. Against this order the decree-holder appealed to the lower Appellate Court. That Court entertained the appeal under Order XLIII, rule 1, clause (j). The learned Judge in entertaining the appeal clearly committed an error, because the sale had not been set aside under rule 92 of Order XXI. The lower Appellate Court, therefore, acted without jurisdiction in sending back the case to the Court of first instance and awarding costs to the decree-holder against the present applicant. The order of the Munsif was a right order because it was the duty of the Munsif upon non-payment of the balance of the purchase-money to direct a re-sale and this is what the Munsif had directed. I am informed that the successor of the Munsif who made the first order has repeated the order for re-sale after the remand by the District Judge. The property has been re sold and has been purchased by some one else. The applicant has thus gained his object and this application only raises an academic question. However, as the order of the Court below was without jurisdiction, I must allow the application and set aside that order including the order directing the applicant to pay the costs of the decree-holder in the Court of first instance and in the lower Appellate Court. As to the costs of the application in this Court, I direct that each party do abide his own costs. The parties will pay their own costs in the Courts below.

APPEAL FROM APPELLATE DECREE No. 1206 OF 1917.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), Sch. III, Art. 3, applicability of—Dispossession by co-sharer landlord under kobala obtained from co-heirs of deceased tenant—Suit to recover possession—Limitation.

Plaintiff, one of the heirs of a deceased tenant, was dispossessed by the landlord on the latter obtaining a kobala from another heir of the entire estate; he brought the present suit for joint possession in respect of his share:

Held, that the suit was governed by the provisions of Article 3 of Schedule III to the Bengal Tenancy Act. [p. 600, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 4th Court, Mymensingh, dated the 1st of March 1917, affirming that of the Munsif, 1st Court at Kishoregunge, dated the 28th of February 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Gopal Chandra Das, for the Appellants.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of possession. The original tenant died leaving several heirs. One of the heirs sold the whole holding to the landlord and the landlords entered into possession. But the case in the plaint is that they were forcibly dispossessed by the landlord. I submit that there is a distinction between possession given by the Court to an auction-purchaser and forcible dispossession. I refer to the cases in Kamal Dhari Thakur v. Rameshwar Singh (1), Fani Bhusan Sarkar

(1) 19 Ind. Cas. 545; 17 C. W. N. 817.

v. Pulin Chandra Mandal (2). The view taken by the learned Judge is very narrow. In these cases the landlord was put into possession by the Court. In my case the landlord entered into possession himself. There are many cases on the point and there is really a conflict of decisions. While the plaintiffs were in possession of their raiyati holding, the landlords entered into possession themselves representing to the tenants that their rights had been sold to them by defendant No. 8. Here they were trespassers. They were not put into possession by the Court as in the case of an auction-purchaser. In those cases the dispossession is not by the landlords but by the Court. But in this particular case the dispossession is by the landlord and not by the Court.

Babu Santimoy Mozumdar for Babu Gurudas Sinha, for the Respondents.—I submit that there is really no distinction between a purchase by auction and a purchase by private sale. Here the landlord entered into possession under the bona fide belief that 16-annas share had been purchased. If a landlord claims to dispossess by virtue of a purchase at an auction sale, then his capacity as a landlord is gone. Article 3, Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, says that he must dispossess as landlord. My learned friend wants to draw a distinction between an auction-purchase and a private sale. I refer to Sen's Edition of the Bengal Tenancy Act, 3rd Edition, page 791. If your Lordships are disposed to apply the principles of dispossession by auction-purchase, I submit the principles apply equally to the case of dispossession by private purchase. The decisions in Kamal Dhari Thakur v. Rameshwar Singh (1) and Ram Kinkar v. Sthiti Ram (3) are in my favour. I submit Article 3 does not apply to the present case.

Babu Gopal Chandra Das, in reply.—There is a case reported as Aminuddin Munshi v. Ulfutunnissa Bibi (4). In that case it has been held that the principle of special limitation applies. The distinction lies in the person who dispossessed. Here it is the landlord, and not the Court as in the case of an auction-purchaser, by whom the dispossession was effected. Therefore, I submit that the case comes within Article 3, Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff and certain other persons were the heirs of one Rajabulla. The defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were the co-sharer landlords of the jote which was held by Rajabulla. On the death of the latter, the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 dispossessed the plaintiff from the land, they having secured a kobala of the entire land from defendant No. 8, one of the heirs of Rajabulla.

The plaintiff brought a suit for joint possession in respect of his share of the land and the question raised in the case is whether the suit is governed by the provisions of Article 3, Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

There is a divergence of judicial opinion with respect to the scope of Article 3, Schedule III, and in some cases it has been held that the article is inapplicable to a case where the dispossession is effected by the landlord not as landlord but an auction purchaser and under process of the Court. [See Abhoy Churn Mookerjee v. Shaik Titu (5), Brojo Kishore Mahapatra v. Saraswati Dassi (6), Mahomed Khalil v. Hirendra Nath Bhattacharya (7), Kamal Dhari Thakur v. Rameshwar Singh (1), Ram Kinkar v. Sthiti Ram (3)].

On the other hand a different view has been taken in the following cases, Aminuddin Munshi v. Ulfutunnissa Bibi (4), Fani Bhusan Sarkar v. Pulin Chandra Mandal (2), Satis Chandra Basu v. Nittya Gopal Haldar (8), Pitambar Mahapatra v. Bhagabat Lal (9) and Kunti Dai v. Jharu Lal Das (10).

Having regard to the difference of opinion on the point, the question was referred to a Full Bench in Peary Mohan Mukherjee v. Arunodoy Ghose (11), but it was held that the question referred did not arise in this case because the dispossession was subsequent to the symbolical possession delivered to the landlord and was made at a time when the plaintiff was in possession as tenant under the landlord. The cases cited above, except the case of Kunti Dai v. Jharu Lal Das (10), were all cases in which the question arose between the plaintiff and the landlord after the latter had purchased the property at an execution sale. In the present case, there is no question of an auction-purchase by the landlord.

It is contended, however, on behalf of the respondent that the principle laid down in the first set of cases would apply also to a case of a private purchase, because in both cases the purchase is made by the landlord not in his capacity as landlord but as a purchaser; and we have been asked to refer the case to a Full Bench having regard to the divergence of judicial opinion on the point.

We do not think, however, that the matter should be referred to a Full Bench; for the case of a private purchase does not stand on the same footing as a purchase at an execution sale. In the case of Ram Kinkar v. Sthiti Ram (3), already referred to, Mookerji, J., stated: "It is plain that Article 3 of the Third Schedule to the Bengal Tenancy Act has no application to the case before us. It is well settled that where a landlord in execution of a decree for arrears of rent puts the holding to sale, purchases it himself and obtains delivery through Court, such dispossession of the tenant is not dispossession within the meaning of Article 3 [Kamal Dhari Thakur v. Rameshwar Singh (1)]. Indeed so long as the sale remains in force, the possession of the landlord auction-purchaser cannot possibly be challenged by way of suit." It was also pointed out in the case of Kamal Dhari Thakur v. Rameshwar Singh (1) that although the landlord moves the Court to deliver possession and possession is delivered to him at his instance, he gets possession through the intervention of the Court; "the delivery of possession by which the dispossession is effected is an act of the Court, and when the landlord gets into possession by a process of the Court, we do not think it is an act of dispossession by the landlord within the meaning of the article, which contemplates a dispossession by the landlord by taking the law into his own hands and otherwise than in due course of law." A similar view was taken by Banerji, J., in the case of Brojo Kishore Mahapatra v Saraswati Dassi (6) where the learned Judge says: "That the dispossession here was in that capacity and under a process of Court issued to put the defendant in possession as auction-purchaser, has in effect been found by the Courts below and is not disputed." When the landlord purchases at a sale held in execution of a decree, possession is delivered to him by the Court as auction purchaser, i.e., on the footing that there is no longer any relation of landlord and tenant between him and the tenant and the possession of the landlord as purchaser cannot be challenged so long as the sale is not set aside or declared ineffective against the tenants. In the case of a private purchase such as the present, there is a relation of landlord and tenant between the plaintiff and the defendant and the mere fact that he obtained a kobala from one of the heirs of the original tenant cannot take the case out of the purview of Article 3, Schedule III.

Having regard to all these considerations we think that the case does come under Article 3, Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The appeal is decreed, and the suit must accordingly be dismissed. The appellant will be entitled to half the costs in all Courts.

Appeal decreed.

Prohibitory order Order passed in open Court presence of parties—Notice, whether necessary.

RAM PRASAD SINGH v. BENARES BANK, LTD.

An order prohibiting a party from alienating his property, made in open Court in the presence of the parties duly appearing before it, must be presumed to have been communicated to the party affected thereby, and it is no excuse for that party, if he disobeys such order, to urge that formal notice of the order had not been served on him personally. [p. 602, col. 2]

Letters Patent Appeal against the judgment of Mr. Justice Walsh.

Mr. Nihal Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. B. E. O'Conor, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Ram Prasad Singh appeals against an order passed by a single Judge of this Court under the following circumstances. The appellant was one of three judgment debtors in a decree obtained by the respondents (the Benares Bank, Limited), which decree was passed, ex parte, on 18th of August 1917, by the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Benares, Between November 1917 and April 1918, the Bank got the decree transferred for execution to Patna, the appellant residing within the jurisdiction of the District Court of that place, and immoveable property belonging to the appellant was attached in execution of the decree. On 23rd of June 1918 Ram Prasad Singh brought a suit against the Benares Bank in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Benares; the reliefs sought were that the decree of 18th of August 1917 be set aside and that the Bank be restrained from proceeding against the property of the plaintiff. After the institution of the suit, and before it came on for trial, Ram Prasad Singh applied to the Court for the issue of an injunction restraining the Benares Bank from proceeding further with the execution of the ex parte decree. This prayer the learned Subordinate Judge granted, but only on condition that Ram Prasad Singh should furnish security, to the full amount of the decree, for its due performance in the event of his suit being dismissed. Ram Prasad Singh appealed to this Court against the imposition of this condition. His appeal was admitted on 27th of July 1918 and registered as First Appeal from Order No. 119 of 1918. It had not yet been set down for hearing, when on 15th of November 1918 Ram Prasad Singh presented an application supported by an affidavit sworn the previous day. This application was presented, in the ordinary course of business, to a single Judge of this Court; it asked that the Benares Bank might be restrained from continuing the execution proceedings at Patna until the disposal of the pending first appeal from order. It was represented that there was no need for the taking of security from the petitioner, because the property taken in attachment by the Patna Court would remain under attachment and all that was asked was a postponement of the sale. The order passed was:—"Stay meanwhile, let notice go to the other side." The learned Judge who passed this order had not been informed that on 14th of November 1918, the very day on which the affidavit laid before him was sworn, the Court at Patna had struck the execution proceedings off its file by reason of some default on the part of the local agent or representative of the Benares Bank. When the agents of the said Bank sought to continue the execution proceedings, the Court at Patna held itself to be unable to take any action by reason of the ex parte order passed by this Court on 15th of November 1918, and refused even to renew the attachment. On this the Benares Bank presented a petition to this Court supported by affidavit on 7th of December 1918, representing that the ex parte order had been obtained from a Judge who was ignorant of an essential fact in the case and that the Bank was now left without any security. The only relief in terms asked for was that the hearing of Ram Prasad Singh's application of 15th of November 1918 should be expedited. This petition was laid before the learned Judge who had passed the order of that date, he pointed out that the Bank would not be protected against any alienation which Ram Prasad Singh might make of the property at first attached by the Patna Court, unless an injunction were issued restraining him from making such alienation. His order purports to direct the application of the Benares Bank to be amended in this sense, but no actual amendment was made. The important point is, however, that the Bank's prayer for the expediting of the hearing of the application of 15th of November 1918 was granted; that application was ordered to be set down for disposal on 9th of December 1918, along with the Bank's application of 7th of December 1918. The learned Judge after hearing both parties, and having no suggestion before him that either party desired an adjournment for any purpose, passed orders dealing with both the applications then before him, i. e., Ram Prasad Singh's application of 15th of November 1918 and the Bank's application of 7th of December 1918. In substance he ordered three things:—

(a) that the hearing of first appeal from order No. 119 of 1918 be expedited; this he could not do of his own authority, but he obtained an order from the Chief Justice to that effect,

(b) that the Benares Bank might proceed with the execution of their decree in the Patna Court so far as taking out attachment of Ram Prasad Singh's immoveable property, but should not take steps to bring any of his property to sale before the disposal of the aforesaid first appeal from order,

(c) that until the disposal of the said appeal or until this Court might see fit otherwise to direct, Ram Prasad Singh should not alienate any of the property which had been under attachment by the Patna Court prior to the 14th of November 1918.

This order was passed in the presence of both parties, duly represented by Counsel, and a formal injunction to the same effect was also issued for service on Ram Prasad Singh personally.

This injunction was eventually returned unserved, the ministerial officer reporting that he was unable to find that gentleman at his ordinary place of residence. Almost immediately after this ineffectual attempt at personal service, that is to say, on 3rd of January and 4th of January 1919, Ram Prasad Singh executed two sale-deeds by which he purported to convey certain property, including some of the property affected by this Court's order of 9th of December 1918, to one of his second creditors. These deeds were registered together on 4th of January 1919, and thus came to the knowledge of the agents of the Benares Bank.

On the application of the latter proceedings were taken against Ram Prasad Singh for breach of this Court's injunction of 9th of December 1918. The learned Judge who issued the injunction has inquired into the matter and heard both parties. He has ordered that Ram Prasad Singh be detained in a civil jail for a period of six months, and that his property remain under attachment for a period of twelve months.

A number of points have been argued:—

(a) It is contended that this Court's injunction of 9th December 1918 is ineffective for want of personal service on Ram Prasad Singh.

* * * * *

The circumstances under which the attempt to effect personal service failed are themselves suspicious, and we must agree with the learned Judge of this Court that it is not possible really to believe that the prohibitory order, passed in open Court, in the presence of a responsible legal adviser, was never communicated to the person principally concerned. Apart from the merits we cannot hold the appellant absolved from all liability merely because of the failure of the attempt to effect personal service. The prohibitory order was passed in open Court; it may not technically have the effect of a decree, but it was passed in the presence of both parties duly appearing before the Court, and it takes effect from the date of its delivery, just as much as a permanent injunction embodied in a judgment and incorporated in a decree of the Court.

These findings really dispose of all the pleas taken in the memorandum of appeal, except two objections of a technical nature which may be more briefly disposed of.

(b) It is contended that the learned Judge of this Court had no jurisdiction to issue any injunction against Ram Prasad Singh, as the latter does not reside within the jurisdiction of this Court. On the abstract question we were referred to two decisions of the Calcutta High Court, one on each side; Mungle Chand v. Gopal Ram (1) affirming the existence of such jurisdiction, and Vulcan Iron Works v. Bishumbhur Prosad (2) denying the same. The present case, however, seems to us a clear one. Ram Prasad Singh was an appellant before this Court, and he had himself invoked the jurisdiction of this Court to take interim proceedings pending the decision of his appeal. The orders passed on the 9th of December 1918 must be considered as a whole; so considered their effect is clear. Ram Prasad Singh got a portion of what he wanted; the Benares Bank was restrained from actually bringing to sale any of his property pending the decision of his first appeal from order. He got this subject to a condition, namely, that he should not alienate certain property in the meantime. It was clearly within the jurisdiction of this Court to impose such a condition. It has been suggested that, in any case, no procedure is provided for punishing any breach of the condition so imposed. This argument turns in part on the interpretation to be put on Order XXXIX, rule 2, clause (3), of the Civil Procedure Code. The drafting of the rule is a little clumsy, because it has followed mechanically the arrangement of sections in the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 but we are satisfied that the words "in case of disobedience" are wide enough to cover breaches of injunctions issued under Order XXXIX, rule (1), for which breaches no penalty is elsewhere provided. In any case this Court has unquestionably the power to punish contempt of its own orders. As regards the precise mode of execution of the order for imprisonment in the civil jail, that point may be considered when it arises. We should prefer to affirm the order without committing ourselves to the mode of execution suggested in the order under appeal. The provisions of section 136 of the Civil Procedure Code and of section 16 of Act No. V of 1871 require consideration. It may be that the proper mode of execution is for this Court to cause Ram Prasad Singh to be arrested and then to commit him to the civil jail in this place. This question is at present immaterial.

(c) Finally it is contended that, under the rules of this Court, no single Judge has authority to deal with an application for an injunction as such. No such point was taken before the single Judge whose order is under appeal. If it had been, we have no doubt he would have carefully considered whether, in order to give full effect to the spirit, rather than to the letter, of the rules, he would not allow Ram Prasad Singh an opportunity of arguing his case before a Bench of two Judges. Technically the plea has no force, because the Benares Bank had not applied for the issue of an injunction. We are satisfied that the learned Judge of this Court had jurisdiction in the matter, that his order was in effect one partly granting an application of Ram Prasad Singh's subject to a condition, and that he had jurisdiction to impose that condition.

We, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs, including fees on the higher scale, but we do so with the remark that while we affirm the order for Ram Prasad Singh's detention in a civil jail, we leave open the question as to the manner of execution of the said order.

Appeal dismissed.

Punjab Alienation of Land Act (Punj. Act XIII of 1900), s. 16—Execution of decree—Agriculturist, land belonging to, whether can be temporarily alienated.

Although section 16 of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act prohibits the sale in execution of a decree of land belonging to an agriculturist, it does not affect the power of the Court executing a decree to make a temporary alienation thereof. [p. 606, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

SHADI LAL, J.—The proposition of law, which has been referred to the Full Bench for determination, is whether a Court can, in execution of a decree, order a temporary alienation of the land belonging to a member of an agricultural tribe. It is clear that section 16 of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, XIII of 1900, while prohibiting the sale, in execution of a decree, of the land belonging to a member of an agricultural tribe, does not interdict a temporary alienation thereof. The answer to the question depends, therefore, upon the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, relating to the execution of a decree.

There can be no doubt that the Courts in this Province have for many years consistently followed the rule that a temporary alienation of the judgment-debtor's land is one of the modes in which a money decree can be satisfied, and have sometimes adopted it, in order to prevent a sale of the land, even when the sale could be effected without infringing any provision of the law. The enactment of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, which, as observed above, does not prohibit a temporary alienation, did not disturb the practice which the Courts had adopted as one calculated to benefit the judgment-debtor, without at the same time depriving his creditor of the fruits of his decree, when that judgment-debtor could offer nothing but his land in order to discharge his liability. Indeed, a Division Bench of the Punjab Chief Court in Badar Din v. Buramal (1), while dealing with the change brought about in the law by the provisions of section 16 of the aforesaid Act, pointed out that, though the land belonging to a member of an agricultural tribe could not be sold in execution of a decree, it could be attached and thereafter dealt with in the manner prescribed by section 326 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882, corresponding to section 72 of the new Civil Procedure Code.

(1) 4 P. R. 1903.

It was not until 1917 that a discordant note was struck by one of the Financial Commissioners in a revenue judgment, Ahmad Khan v. Parmanand (2), which, upon a consideration of the provisions of section 51 and section 72, Civil Procedure Code, reached the conclusion that a temporary alienation in execution of a decree is possible only under the conditions specified in section 72 and that that section postulates that the property attached in execution of a decree can lawfully be sold, and that it is with respect to a property of that kind that the Collector can intervene and make a proposal for a temporary alienation. If the property attached is not liable to sale, then no temporary alienation "can be made by the Collector under the authority" of section 72. This view has, however, been dissented from by his colleague in Saleh Mahammad v. Mehar Singh (3).

This divergence of opinion between the two final revenue authorities has placed the subordinate revenue officers in a difficult position, the result being that there is at present considerable uncertainty as to whether or not it is permissible to order a temporary alienation of agricultural land in execution of a decree against a member of an agricultural tribe. Having regard to the importance of the question, and in view of the divergence of opinion referred to above, this Court has considered it necessary to examine the matter de novo, more especially because the judgment in Badar Din v. Buramal (1), though containing a dictum on the subject, does not profess to discuss the question.

A perusal of the judgment in Ahmad Khan v. Parmanand (2) shows that the correctness or otherwise of the conclusion reached therein depends practically upon the interpretation to be placed on section 72, Civil Procedure Code. Now, that section is in the following terms:—

"Where * * * the property attached consists of land, or of a share in land, and the Collector represents to the Court that the public sale of the land or share is objectionable, and that satisfaction of the decree may be made within a reasonable period by a temporary alienation of the land or share, the Court may authorise the Collector to provide for such satisfaction in the manner recommended by him instead of proceeding to a sale of the land or share."

Before examining the argument deduced from the wording of the section, it is necessary to point out that the Collector, when acting under section 72, does not perform any judicial function, but is merely a ministerial officer who in the matter of carrying out orders of the Civil Court relating to the execution of a decree against land takes the place of an ordinary ministerial officer charged with the duty of executing decrees. If he makes any such representation as is referred to in section 72, he does so, not in any judicial capacity, but as an officer of the Court. It is perfectly within the discretion of the Court to accept, or to decline to accept, such representation, vide Huro Prosad Roy v. Kali Prosad Roy (4) and Darya Singh v. Mehtab (5). In the event of the Court declining to accept the representation it would be the Collector's duty to sell the land, assuming, of course, that there is no special law prohibiting such a sale.

Now, the ratio decidendi of the judgment in Ahmad Khan v. Parmanand (z) appears to be that the power to order a temporary alienation of land comes into existence only when the Collector makes a representation to that effect, and that, if such a representation cannot legally be made, for example, when the property attached is not liable to sale, then the Court itself has no power to order a temporary alienation, because there is no other law which authorises the Court to do so. A superficial reading of the section may lead to that conclusion, but if the relative functions of the Court and the Collector are properly understood, it will be seen that this view cannot be sustained. As pointed out above, the Collector is merely a ministerial officer, and it is a mistake to suppose that it is the intervention of a ministerial officer that brings into existence a power which the Court did not originally possess. When the Court upon a representation made by the Collector for a temporary alienation authorises him to provide for the satisfaction of the decree in the manner suggested by him, it seems to me that the power to order a temporary alienation resides not in the Collector but in the Court. Suppose, in a case against a judgment-debtor, who is not a member of an agricultural tribe, the Court considers it objectionable to sell his land, and thinks that the decree may be satisfied by a temporary alienation, it would be absurd to suggest that in order to do that the Court should adopt the wholly unnecessary procedure of first asking the Collector to sell the land, and then upon receiving a representation from him make a temporary alienation of the property. Why should not the Court carry out its intention without resorting to this act of supererogation? And suppose the Collector does not think fit to intervene on behalf of the judgment-debtor, is it seriously suggested that the Court is then helpless and cannot order a temporary alienation which it considers to be desirable in the interests of both the parties?

Take a converse case. The Court directs that the land of the judgment-debtor, who is not protected by the Alienation of Land Act, should be sold, but the Collector suggests a temporary alienation, is the Court bound to accept that advice? There can be no doubt whatever that the Court can reject the representation and direct the Collector to sell the land.

The above discussion makes it clear that it is not the Collector but the Court that possesses the power to order a temporary alienation. The power does not emanate from the Collector but resides in the Court. If, as I hold, the power resides in the Cout then it seems to me that it exists independently of any action which may be taken by its ministerial officer. It may remain dormant until the Collector intervenes in the interest of the judgment debtor, but it cannot be held that it is brought into existence by that intervention. It is already there, and the Collector's intervention furnishes only an occasion for its exercise. The Court, which alone is the repository of the power, has the discreation to exercise it, and the Collector's intervention is not a condition of the exercise thereof, that is to say, it can do so without making any reference to the Collector or after making a reference but without receiving any representation from him.

I am accordingly of opinion that the assumption contained in the judgment in Ahmad Khan v. Parmanand (2), that the power to make a temporary alienation is created by the Collector's proposal to that effect is unwarranted by any principle of law. The language of section 72 when carefully examined does not bear this construction: indeed such an interpretation must inevitably lead to some absurd results. I consider that the section, while prescribing the mode in which a sale of the land can be prevented by the Collector by suggesting an alternative method of execution, impliedly recognises the Court's power to direct a temporary alienation. The exercise of the power is not confined to the circumstances described in the section, and the Court is at perfect liberty to use it whenever it thinks fit to do so.

Our attention has been invited to section 51, Civil Procedure Code, which enumerates the powers of the Court in regard to execution; and it is argued that the powers in the matter of execution are circumscribed by the provisions of that section, and that a temporary alienation, which finds no place in that section, can only be ordered subject to the conditions and limitations imposed by section 72. Now ex concesso the Court has under section 51 the power to sell the property, and if the Court possesses the power to transfer the entire bundle of rights constituting ownership, surely it has the lesser power of transferring some of those rights. Dominium or ownership, as defined by Austin, denotes a right—indefinite in point of user—unrestricted in point of disposition—and unlimited in point of duration—over a determinate thing. It seems to me that when the Court has the authority to transfer the plenary right as defined above, it has also the jurisdiction to transfer a right which is limited in its operation. The power to sell includes the power to make a temporary alienation, and it was probably for this reason that the latter power was not expressly mentioned, though, as I have stated above, section 72 implied that the Court possesses an authority to make a temporary alienation.

It will be observed that section 52, Civil Procedure Code, expressly provides that the Court can order execution by appointing a Receiver, and there can, therefore, be no doubt that it can appoint the decree-holder himself as the Receiver of the judgment-debtor's land and can authorise him to receive the rents and profits thereof for a specified period in satisfaction of his decree. If the Court can do this, there is no reason why it should not be able to achieve the same result by ordering a temporary alienation, because the object aimed at in both the cases is the same, namely, the realisation of an adequate sum of money from the produce of the land in order to satisfy the decree against the owner of the property.

Upon an examination of the relevant sections of the Code in the light of the general principles of the law, I am of opinion that the Court executing a decree has authority, not only to sell the land of the judgment-debtor, but also to make a temporary alienation thereof; and that the latter power is not confined to the case in which a representation is made by the Collector as contemplated by section 72. If the judgment-debtor happens to be a member of an agricultural tribe, then section 16 of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act comes into operation, and while that section prohibits the sale of the land, it does not affect the Court's power as to temporary alienation.

I would, therefore, answer the question referred to the Full Bench in the affirmative.

LEROSSIGNOL, J.—My view completely coincides with that of my learned brother. A provision like section 16 of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, which trenches on the usual jurisdiction of the Civil Courts, must be very strictly construed and it leaves intact every power of the Civil Courts except that which it expressly takes away. Consequently the power held by the Civil Courts of ordering a temporary alienation of the judgment-debtor's land is unaffected by that section.

The representation of the Collector referred to in section 72 of the Code appears to me to be but an unessential incident and the cardinal portion of the section is that which confers authority on the Court to direct the Collector to take action.

BROADWAY, J.—I concur.

Answered affirmatively.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

CIVIL MISCELLANEOUS APPLICATION
No. 447 OF 1919.
February 16, 1920.

Present :—Justice Sir George Knox, KT.

Syed ALI AKHTAR—PETITIONER

versus

THE PEOPLE'S INDUSTRIAL BANK, LD. (IN LIQUIDATION)—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Companies Act (VI of 1882), ss. 130, 136—Suit against company being wound up—Leave of Court—Court, proper.

A suit or application against a company being wound up under the Companies Act, 1882, can only be instituted or made with the leave of the Court, and the only Court which has jurisdiction to deal with the matter is the principal Court having original civil jurisdiction at the place in which the registered office of the company is situate.

Miscellaneous application under section 171 of the Indian Companies Act (Act No. VII of 1913).

Mr. Mukhtar Ahmad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. S. A. Haidar, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—Syed Ali Akhtar, who represents himself as having been a minor when the matter in question was first agitated, has asked this Court to permit him to proceed with the suit which he has instituted in the Court of the Munsif of Fyzabad and in which a decree was obtained ex parte against him. This decree, when the Bank applied for execution, was transferred to Jaunpur. He objected to the execution of the decree and it was refused. The next step that he took was that on the 14th of December 1918 three months' time was given to him to file a regular suit. This regular suit he filed before the Munsif of Jaunpur and it is there as Suit No. 162 of 1919. The defendant is the People's Industrial Bank in Liquidation through their Official Liquidator. A legal objection was raised by the said Bank through the Liquidator that no suit was maintainable without the permission of the High Court. This is hardly accurately stated, but I believe it was the way in which the petitioner understood the objection to run. Upon the objection being raised the Munsif directed the deponent to move this Court. It cannot be questioned and it is not questioned that the People's Industrial Bank is in liquidation and that an Official Liquidator has been appointed. The petitioner is met by section 284 of Act No, VII of 1913, and reading that section I have no doubt as to its requiring that every company in which the winding-up has been commenced before the commencement of this Act and is still pending shall be wound up in the same manner and with the same incidents as if Act No. VII of 1913 had not been passed and for the purposes of winding-up the Indian Companies Act of 1882 shall be deemed to remain in full force. The learned Vakil for the petitioner contended that this being a question of procedure he is entitled to take advantage of this Act, but the words of the section are so emphatic that no room for doubt in this matter is left. He then contended that his suit was not one connected with this section and that this section refers strictly only to winding up of companies. This contention is without weight and we are thrown back upon section 136 of Act No. VI of 1882. The application or suit that the petitioner has to make must be made with the leave of the Court as defined in Act No. VI of 1882 and subject to such terms as that Court may impose. Section 130 fixed a separate meaning to the words "the Court" as used in this part of the Act, namely, Part IV (Winding-up of Companies). The only Court that has jurisdiction to deal with the matter is the principal Court having original civil jurisdiction at the place in which the registered office of the company is situate.

I am told that that is the District Judge of Allahabad.

This application is dismissed with costs as certified.

Application dismissed.

OUDH JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

FIRST CIVIL APPEALS NOS. 104 AND 114 OF 1918.

June 17, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Wazir Hasan, A. J. C.

SHEO DAYAL—DEFENDANT NO. 14—APPELLANT

versus

LALTA PRASAD—PLAINTIFF—AND RAM BALI AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS NOS. 1 AND 2—RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Jointness, presumption of—Strangers in possession under transfers, position of—Burden of proof—Admissions in previous suits, value of.

Plaintiff brought the present suit for separate possession by partition of a half share in certain properties against his step-brother, defendant No. 1, who was the manager of the family. In this suit he impleaded as defendants a large number of transferees of defendant No. 1, of whom the present appellant was one. The appellant's defence was that when defendant No. 1, purchased the property of which the appellant was the transferee, defendant No. 1 was not a member of the joint Hindu family with the plaintiff and that, therefore, the plaintiff could not have that property partitioned. In the plaint the plaintiff alleged that he and defendant No 1 were members of a joint Hindu family, that the plaintiff had lived separately for the last nine years, that the immoveable property of the joint family was not divided between them and that he now wanted to obtain a partition of everything through Court:

Held, (1) that in view of the pleadings, the true nature of the suit was for a de facto division and not for a division of title which had already taken place about nine years ago and the plaintiff could not, therefore, rely on the ordinary presumption of jointness; [p. 610, col. 2; p. 611, col. 1.]

(2) that the appellant not being a member of the family but an utter stranger to it and being in possession of the property in dispute, the plaintiff must establish his title independently of any presumptions before he could hope to succeed in ejecting appellant; [p. 611, col. 1.]

(3) that the property in dispute having been acquired by defendant No. 1 after the division between him and the plaintiff, it was his separate property and the plaintiff had no title to it. [p 616, col, 2.]

The mere fact that certain admissions made in previous suits constituted a good defence to the suits in which they were made, cannot lead to the conclusion that they were untrue. [p. 611, col. 2; p. 612, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Barabanki, dated the 17th August 1918.

Messrs. A. P. Sen, Hyder Husain and Syed Jafar, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mumtaz Husain, for Respondent No. 1,

JUDGMENT.—Bhawanidin was the common ancestor of the plaintiff and the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 in this suit. For the purpose of elucidating the points, which have been argued in these appeals, it is desirable to give a short pedigree here:—

BHAWANIDIN.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Hausi Ram, died childless. | Ram Adhin, | Ram Autar, died childless. |
| | Ram Bali, defendant No. 1. | Lalta Prsad, plaintiff. |
| | Thakur Prasad, defendant No. 2. | |

The family till quite recently was in affluent circumstances and was certainly so at the death of the last manager of the family, Ram Autar, who died in the year 1904. Previous to him the karta of the family was Hausi Ram. It is not clear from the record as to when did Ram Adhin die, but it may be safely assumed that he died sometime before the death of Hausi Ram, who, as just now mentioned, was the immediate predecessor of Ram Autar in the management of the family affairs. It is also clear that Ram Bali, the step brother of the plaintiff, turned out to be the prodigal son of the family since he stepped into the shoes of his uncle, Ram Autar deceased, as the head of the family. Ram Bali made a large number of alienations of the family property and incurred great debts. It was only natural on the part of Lalta Prasad to have resented this reckless conduct of his brother, Ram Bali, and to have taken steps to deprive him of the powers on the strength of which he treated the family property as if it exclusively belonged to him. Up to this point there is no serious conflict. The controversy arises as to the effect and significance of the events thereafter, and I will deal with them at their proper places.

The plaintiff, Lalta Prasad, brought the present suit in ejectment, impleading a large number of persons as defendants on the ground that every one of them was an alienee under the transfers made from time to time by Ram Bali, the defendant No. 1. To his plaint Lalta Prasad appended three lists which have been described throughout the proceedings as lists A B, and C. The relief which the plaintiff asked for in respect of these lists is contained in paragraph 11 of the plaint, and it is as follows:—That the plaintiff prays that a decree for separate possession by partition of the properties entered in lists A, B and C be passed in his favour or if it be impossible to award possession to the plaintiff over any of the properties in dispute, the value thereof to the extent of the plaintiff's share be awarded with costs of the suit. Coming to the lists themselves, the description given to list A is to the following effect. List A of property belonging to the joint family, half of which is in the plaintiff's possession. In the fifth column of this list which gives the name of the person in possession, we invariably find entries to the effect that half is in possession of Lalta Prasad and the other half in possession of either Ram Bali or his transferee. List B is described as comprising joint family property which is not in possession of the plaintiff and of which possession is claimed by partition. In the fifth column of this list also, the entry against every item of property is that the said item is in possession of one or the other of the alienees of Ram Bali, except Item No. 5 as against which Ram Bali is shown to be in possession List C relates to moveables sought to be partitioned but, as a matter of fact, it contains only three items, two of which are registered deeds of mortgage without possession, one in the name of Ram Bali and the other in the name of Ram Autar, and the third relates to a pro note in favour of Ram Bali. The learned Subordinate Judge of Barabanki decreed the suit of the plaintiff as against all the defendants, with the condition in in favour of the defendant No. 14 that the plaintiff was "not to get possession of the half share of the houses in possession of the defendant No. 14 unless he pays to that defendant half of the amount of Rs. 2,717 with interest at the rate of the mortgage-deed (Exhibit N), that is, at Re. 1 per cent. per mensem up to the date of the sale deed obtained by defendant No. 14, that is, the 25th June 1910 (Exhibit N 4)." Except the defendant No. 14, Sheo Dayal, and the defendant No. 15, Sant Prasad, all other defendants have submitted to the decree of the Court below. These two defendants have preferred separate appeals from the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge: Sheo Dayal's Appeal is No. 104 and that of Sant Baksh No. 114 of 1918. The properties with which these two defendants are concerned are comprised in list B of the list attached to the plaint. Item No. 4 in that list is the subject-matter of the former and item No. 3 in the same list is the subject-matter of the latter appeal.

The findings of the learned Subordinate Judge, so far as they are material for the disposal of these appeals, may be shortly stated as follows:—(1) That the plaintiff, Lalta Prasad, and the defendants, Ram Bali and Thakur Prasad, have throughout constituted a joint Hindu family; (2) that since the death of Ram Autar, Lalta Prasad acted as the manager of the family; and (3) that the family was possessed of sufficient nucleus to enable Ram Bali to make acquisitions from time to time and that properties acquired in his name consequently belonged to the whole family and are not exclusively owned by Ram Bali. On these findings he naturally decreed the suit, as stated before.

In this judgment, I propose to deal with Appeal No. 104 of 1918. The history of the property which is the subject-matter of this appeal is a short one. It is situate in the town of Lakhimpur, though the ancestral residence of the parties is in Rudauli in the District of Fyzabad. Tulsi Ram and Behari Lal of Lakhimpur, the previous proprietors of the houses and shops in dispute, made a mortgage of them to Ram Bali on the 12th May 1909 for a sum of Rs. 5,000. On the 8th July 1909 Ram Bali purchased the proprietary interest of his mortgagors by a sale deed of that date for a sum of Rs. 500. On the 6th September 1909 Ram Bali mortgaged them to one Mahabir Prasad for a sum of Rs. 3,600 and on the 25th June 1910 he sold them to Sheo Dayal, the appellant, by executing a sale-deed on that date for a sum of Rs. 3,800. Sheo Dayal's chief plea in defence, with which I am concerned now in this appeal, was that on the 8th July 1909 when Ram Bali acquired these properties, he was not a member of the joint Hindu family and consequently the properties in dispute are not subject to partition as belonging to the plaintiff and Ram Bali constituting that family. This brings me at once to the consideration of the main question argued before me as to whether on that date the family was joint, or as alleged in defence Lalta Prasad, the plaintiff, had separated, and thus the joint character of the family had been broken. It follows that if my finding on this question of fact is in favour of the appellant, the plaintiff's suit with regard to the properties purchased by Sheo Dayal must fail.

In relation to this question of fact a good deal of controversy arose in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, and has been strenuously maintained on both sides before me, as to the interpre'ation of the several allegations which the plaintiff made in his plaint. I am in complete agreement with the Counsel for the parties that the decision of this case to a very large extent depends upon the view which may be taken of the pleadings of the plaintiff. On a very careful consideration of the several averments made in the plaint and of other circumstances throwing light on them, I am led to the conclusion that the attitude which was taken on behalf of the plaintiff with regard to the nature of his suit, most probably during the course of arguments before the learned Subordinate Judge, was not warranted by the pleadings in the case. Paragraph 1 of the plaint sets out the pedigree, which I have placed at the top of this judgment, and as the paragraph says, the intention of setting out that pedigree was to show the relationship of the plaintiff with the defendents Nos. 1 and 2. Paragraph 2 is of supreme importance in this connection and it is desirable that it should be reproduced in extenso. It is this: that the plaintiff and the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were the members of a joint Hindu family, that the plaintiff lives separate for the last nine years and that the immoveable property of the joint family has not been divided between the plaintiff, on one hand, and the defendants Nos. 1 and 2, on the other, either through Court or privately. Paragraph 6 is to the effect that the plaintiff had to fight several cases on account of the extravagance of the defendant No. 1 and that it was with great difficulty and heavy expenditure that he, the plaintiff, had been extricating himself from them, but now the plaintiff has determined to obtain a batwara (partition) of everything through Court as against the defendant No. 1. The points to be noted in these two paragraphs are: (1) that the family was joint till some time previous to nine years before the date of the plaint, (2) that the plaintiff commenced living separately from the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 at about the same time, (3) that the immoveable properties which belonged to the joint family have not been partitioned, and (4) that on account of misconduct of the defendant No. 1 he (the plaintiff) now desires to obtain a division through Court of everything, in other words, of the immoveable property which remained undivided nine years ago. To my mind there can be no room for doubt that this is the correct import of the allegations with which the plaintiff came into Court. This conclusion is strongly supported by other allegations made in paragraphs 7 and 11 of the plaint. In the former paragraph the plaintiff stated that he was entitled to have his share to the extent of one-half in the entire property entered in the lists separated by partition; in other words, what the plaintiff desires by this suit is to have a complete partition by metes and bounds and a separate allotment of his half share to him. The description of the lists and the remarks in the 5th column of each of them are almost conclusive, to my mind, on this question. What the description is and what those remarks are I have already adverted to in the earlier part of this judgment. The true nature of the suit, therefore, was a claim for division of property, and not also a division of title which had already taken place about nine years ago. By this suit, therefore, the plaintiff sought the aid of the Court, not for the purpose of ascertainment of the respective rights of the two brothers, but for the division and separation of his share in so far as it had not been effected till now. The definition of the plaintiff's right did not in the least depend either upon the consent of his brother or upon the decree of Court, but the actual division did. The state of pleadings being as they have been shown by me and the true nature of the suit being one for a de facto division, the plaintiff cannot rely upon the ordinary presumption of jointness. The appellant is not a member of the family but is an utter stranger to it and is in possession of the property in dispute. The plaintiff must establish his title independently of any presumptions before he can hope to succeed in ejecting the appellant. In the case of Bannoo v. Kashee Ram (1) Sir Montague Smith, in delivering the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council, observed as follows:—"In the case of an ordinary Hindu family who are living together, or who have their entire property in common, the presumption is, that all that every member of the family is found in possession of belongs to the common stock. That is the ordinary presumption, and the onus of establishing the contrary is thrown on the member of the family who disputes it. Having regard, however, to the state of this family when the present dispute arose, their Lordships think that that presumption cannot be relied upon as the foundation of the plaintiff's case, and, therefore, as he seeks to recover property which was in the possession of Ram Dayal and was ostensibly his own at the time of his death, it lies upon him to establish by evidence the foundation of his case, viz., that the property was joint property to which he and his brother Keshe Ram, as surviving members, were entitled." The question of fact which I have set forth in an earlier part of this judgment must, therefore, be decided on the evidence in the case. Nor do I think there is any room left for invoking the presumption upon which the plaintiff relies, because both sides have given evidence which they would have wished to give in the case.

It may be mentioned at the outset that the oral evidence, in this case, excepting the statement of the plaintiff himself, is quite useless on the point under consideration. It is uncertain, discrepant and indefinite. The decision of the case mainly depends upon documentary evidence and the circumstances ranging over a long period of time. It appears that one Lala Gobind Prasad brought a suit against the plaintiff and his step-brother Ram Bali for the recovery of Rs. 3,277-9-9 on the basis of a promissory note, apparently executed by Ram Bali. Lalta Prasad lodged his defence to that suit by a written statement dated the 14th April 1910. Paragraph 13 of that statement is to the effect that he had separated from his brother in the month of May 1908 (Exhibit N-8).

It further appears that in 1912 one Lala Bisheshar Prasad brought a suit against Ram Bali, Lalta Prasad and Thakur Prasad, son of Ram Bali, for the recovery of a sum of Rs. 1,108-9-0 on the basis of three promissory notes again executed by Ram Bali. To that suit Lalta Prasad filed a written statement on the 24th February 1913, paragraph 13 of which is as follows:—

"The defendant No. 2 (Lalta Prasad) and the defendant No. 1 (Ram Bali) are step-brothers. The defendant No. 2 on attaining discretion and the understanding of his affairs separated himself in May 1918 on account of mismanagement and the extravagance of the defendant No. 1, and that the defendant No. 2 obtained mutation in respect of all the Zamindari properties to the extent of his share." (Exhibit N-9.) These statements are absolutely unequivocal and explicit. It will be remembered that the plaintiff stated in paragraph 2 of his plaint in the present suit that he had been living separately for about nine years. This allusion to the period of time clearly refers us back to the point of time given in paragraph 13 of the written statement just referred to, the date of the plaint being the 30th August 1917.

These statements throw a flood of light on the question under consideration and are to my mind of great evidential value if not quite conclusive. I regard them not merely admissions but in view of the other circumstances in the case as true statements of facts. In the first place, they are in accord with the allegations with which the plaintiff now comes into Court and, in the second place, they are also consistent with certain antecedent events of great importance to which I will refer in their proper places. It was argued by the learned Counsel, who appeared for the respondents, that these admissions were made in the interests of the particular suits in which the written statements containing them were filed and were consequently not true in fact. The mere fact that they constituted a good defence to the suits in which they were made cannot lead to the conclusion that they were untrue. Besides as they are in harmony with the case which the plaintiff has now set up, I can attach no importance to the explanation now offered. In the case of Chandra Kunwar v. Chaudhri Narpat Singh (2) Lord Atkinsons, in considering the effect of such admissions, observed as follows:—"The proof of this admission shifts the burden, because, as against the party making it, as Baron Parke says in Slatterie v. Pooley (3)—'What a party himself admits to be true may reasonably be presumed to be so.' No doubt, in a case such as this, where the defendant is not a party to the deeds and there is, therefore, no estoppel, the party making the admission may give evidence to rebut this presumption, but unless and until that is satisfactorily done, the facts admitted must be taken to be established. The law upon the point is clear. In Heane v. Rogers (4) Bayley, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court lays it down that—'There is no doubt but that the express admissions of a party to the suit, or admissions implied from his conduct, are evidence, and strong evidence, against him; but we think he is at liberty to prove that such admissions were mistaken or were untrue, and is not estopped or concluded by them unless another person has been induced by them to alter his condition. In such a case the party is estopped from disputing their truth as against that person (and those claiming under him) and that transaction, but as to third parties he is not bound.'

"In Newton v. Liddiard (5) Lord Denman approved and adopted this statement of the law, and Morgan, Ex parte; Simpson, In re (6) and Trinidad Asphalte Company v. Ozryat (7) in effect illustrate the same principle. There is here no suggestion of mistake. And the question for decision of their Lordships in effect resolves itself into this:—Has Makund Singh proved satisfactorily that the admissions contained in the deeds to which he was a party are untrue in fact? In the opinion of their Lordships that question must be answered in the negative." In this case I have already answered that question in the negative.

The plaintiff Lalta Prasad went into the witness-box and deposed to some important facts in this connection. He said that in the year 1908 he asked for the papers relating to the accounts of Ram Autar's time and to the shop at Lakhimpur, that he took those papers from the box in which they were kept and told Ram Bali that he had taken them and that he did so because he found that Ram Bail's conduct was "going bad." The plaintiff has filed a large number of documents in this case, some of the time of Ram Autar and others of Ram Bali. They are Exhibits III to XXIII and XLIV to XLVIII. He further stated that "there has been no separation of the house between Ram Bali and me. I am living in the house and Ram Bali is living in the Thakurdwara. He is keeping all his things there. He is living there for the last 10 years or so. The Thakurdwara is 25 or 30 paces from my house. I do not visit Ram Bali there." Here again is a clear reference to the events of 1908 and it furnishes an index of the truth of the allegations made in paragraph 2 of the plaint. He has also deposed to his complete distrust of Ram Bali's dealings with the family property. It is contended that the motive which impelled Lalta Prasad to do all this was to save the family property and not to effect a separation in status from Ram Bali.

That there was a quarrel between the two brothers early in the first half of the year 1908 is not only perfectly clear from the evidence on the record, but it is admitted on both sides that it was so. It is also to be remembered that Ram Bali was not the own but only a step-brother of Lalta Prasad, and that the latter extremely resented the reckless conduct of the former which had brought the family almost to ruin. I agree with the learned Counsel for the respondent that under these circumstances there existed sufficiently strong reasons for Lalta Prasad to take effective steps for the preservation of the family property. But nothing could be more effective and more natural for the purpose of attaining that object than to strike a blow against Ram Bali's dominion over the family property, and this could be easily done by a bare exercise of volition on the part of Lalta Prasad in separating himself from his brother. I may here quote the remarks of Lord Atkinson, which he made in delivering the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Parbati v. Chaudhri Naunihal Singh (8) in connection with a similar question and which seems to be highly appropriate to the case before me. His Lordship observed:—"The most natural and effectual way, however, of terminating such disputes would have been to divide the property between the different members of the family in definite shares, each member becoming entitled to the profits and bearing the losses of his allotted share, substantially as the law would have done. This is precisely what this settlement purports to effect. The High Court fail altogether to explain how the empty form of getting the applicants' names entered in the village papers as Lambardars of different Mauzas—the property remaining joint and continuing under the management of Dalip Singh—would have conduced to the settlement of any disputes, or how the desire which they attribute to the two widows to appropriate large portions of the income of the property could be gratified by such means, unless the partition was a real transaction, intended by the widows and Dalip Singh to be operative from the first." I, therefore, hold that whatever Lalta Prasad did at that time was clearly with the intention of separating himself from his brother.

It is to be noted that Lalta Prasad in his written statement of the 14th February 1913 (Exhibit N-9) distinctly referred to the entry of his name in the revenue papers in respect of his share as a sequel to the separation of 1908. This brings me to the most important part of the case in relation to the question of separation. It is common ground that Lalta Prasad moved the Revenue Authorities, most probably in the first quarter of the year 1910, the precise date is not known, for the purpose of bringing his name on the khewat in respect of his share in the Zemindari properties. The petition with which he went before the Revenue Court is not on the record, but we have his statement which he made in those proceedings. This is Exhibit J-20. It is necessary that it should be reproduced here in full. "Ram Bali and I are own brothers. He and I mess together. The entire 16 annas of Lalwapur stand recorded in the khewat in the name of Ram Bali. I am a co sharer in that to the extent of 8 annas and the other 8 annas belong to Ram Bali. Accordingly I pray that by means of the correction of the khewat the 8 annas share, should be entered in the khewat in my name. I am in possession of my 8-annas share. As our mess in still joint (ekjai) all the affairs are managed by my elder brother, Ram Bali. I am co-sharer to the extent of 8 annas, therefore, 8 annas should be entered in my name in the khewat" Exhibit J. 21 shows that the entry in the khewat was effected as desired by Lalta Prasad showing 8 annas against the name of Ram Bali and the other 8 annas against that of Lalta Prasad. If this change in the khewat had stood by itself, I should have been disposed to attach little or no weight to it, but as I have shown before there were antecedent circumstances and strong probabilities which make it absolutely impossible for me to hold that the mutation was anything other than a step towards realisation of an intention to separate previously expressed by Lalta Prasad. In a joint Hindu family it would be impossible to predicate of any one member owning any specific share in the family property, much less the possession of such share. The learned Counsel for the respondent laid emphasis on that part of Exhibit J-20, which recited that Lalta Prasad and Ram Bali had a joint messing, and that Ram Bali was managing the affairs.

A similar argument was advanced on behalf of the respondent in the case of Balkishen Das v. Ram Narain Sahu (9) which was repelled by Lord Davey in the following words:—"Learned Counsel for the respondent relied on the passage which gave liberty to any of the parties either to live together as a member of the joint family as before or to separate his own business as being inconsistent with a separation in estate. But there is no inconsistency, and the clause conferred on the parties no larger liberty of choice than they would have had without it. They might elect either to have a partition of their shares by metes and bounds or to continue to live together and enjoy their property in common as before. Whether they did one or the other would affect the mode of enjoyment, but not the tenure of the property or their interest in it."

In my opinion such a condition of things would be quite consistent with tenancy-in-common which would have been effected between the two brothers by an expression of intention to separate in an unambiguous language on the part of either of them. I find it impossible for me to reconcile the specification of share and still more the possession of that specific share with the status of Lalta Prasad as a member of the joint Hindu family. It is to be noted that this mutation of names did not follow on the death of any member of the family, nor could it be regarded as an arrangement by way of convenience only, because the mutation was made to deprive Ram Bali of every insignia of exclusive dominion over the family property. In the well known case of Appovier v. Rama Subba Aiyan (10) Lord Westbury laid down the following dicta, which in view of the facts of this case are of great importance. His Lordship said:—"According to the true notion of an undivided family in Hindu Law, no individual member of that family, whilst it remains undivided, can predicate of the joint and undivided property that he, that particular member, has a certain definite share. No individual member of an undivided family could go to the place of the receipt of rent, and claim to take from the collector or receiver of the rents a certain definite share. The proceeds of undivided property must be brought, according to the theory of an undivided family, to the common chest or purse, and then dealt with according to the modes of enjoyment by the members of an undivided family. But when the members of an undivided family agree among themselves with regard to particular property, that it shall thenceforth be the subject of ownership, in certain defined shares, the character of undivided property and joint enjoyment is taken away from the subject-matter so agreed to be dealt with; and in the estate each member has thenceforth a definite and certain share which he may claim the right to receive and to enjoy in severalty, although the property itself has not been actually severed and divided." Again at page 92 appears the following passage:—"Then, if there be a conversion of the joint tenancy of an undivided family into a tenancy-in common of the members of that undivided family, the undivided family becomes a divided family with reference to the property that is the subject of that agreement, and that is a separation in interest and in right, although not immediately followed by a de facto actual division of the subject-matter. This may at any time be claimed by virtue of the separate right." These passages have been referred to and quoted by Lord Atkinson in the judgment in the case of Parbati v. Chaudhri Naunihal Singh (8). These proceedings must have the effect which I give to them unless I hold that Lalta Prasad intended to play a farce, which I cannot do in view of his deliberate intention to rescue the family property as much as he could from the reckless career of Ram Bali. The same effect was given to a similar petition in mutation proceedings by Lord Atkinson in the case already referred to.

As has already been pointed out by me mutation in the khewat was the result of what had happened between the two brothers about the middle of 1908. Reliance was placed by the learned Counsel for the respondent on a recent decision of the Privy Council in Nageshar Bakhsh Singh v. Ganesha (11). As I read it the judgment of Lord Shaw in that case is far from suggesting that a change of entries in a khewat can be no indication of separation under any circumstances. I will here quote a portion of the judgment of his Lordship:—"Records of that character take their place as part of evidence in the case. They do no more. Their importance may vary with circumstances and it is not any part of the law of India that they are by themselves conclusive evidence of the facts which they purport to record. It may turn out that they are in accord with the general bulk of the evidence in the case; they supply gaps in it; and they may, in short, form a not unimportant part of the testimony as to fact which is available. But to give them any higher weight than that might open the way for much injustice, and afford temptation to the manipulation of records, or even of the materials for the first entry." These observations of their Lordships are in harmony with what was laid down by the same Tribunal in the case of Net Ram Singh v. Musammat Tursa Kunwar (12). Mr. Ameer Ali, in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in that case, says as follows: "Their Lordships, however, observe that the learned Judges in the Court below have not rested their judgment merely on entries which, standing by themselves, may be regarded as inconclusive. They have drawn inferences from the acts of the brothers which are consistent only with the hypothesis of separation." If Lalta Prasad instead of going to the Revenue Authorities had gone to the Courts of Civil jurisdiction asking for a declaration that he had an 8-annas share in the family properties while Ram Bali and his son had the other 8-annas share the result would have been exactly the same as is, in my opinion, of his statement in the mutation proceedings already referred to. That he had an 8-annas share is undisputable, that his brother and nephew had the other 8 annas share is equally clear, and that such a specification of shares would have effected in the eyes of law a separation cannot be doubted. The leading case on the subject is the Appovier's case (10) already referred to. In Suraj Narain v. Pandit Iqbal Narain (13) Mr. Ameer Ali, in delivering the judgment of their Lordships, enunciated the principle in the following terms:—"The principle applicable to cases of separation from the joint undivided family has been clearly enunciated by this Board in Rewun Persad v. Radha Beeby (14) and the well known case of Appovier v. Rama Subba Aiyan (10). What may amount to a separation or what conduct on the part of some of the members may lead to disruption of the joint undivided family and convert a joint tenancy into a tenancy-in common must depend on the facts of each case. A definite and unambiguous indication by one member of intention to separate himself and enjoy his share in severalty may amount to separation. But to have that effect the intention must be unequivocal and clearly expressed." His Lordship had again an occasion to lay down the principle of law applicable to such questions in the case of Girja Bai v. Sadashiv Dhundiraj (15). At page 161* the following observations occur: "It appears to their Lordships that the Appellate Court has in this case confused the two considerations to which reference has been made above, namely, the severance of status, which is a matter of individual volition, with the allotment of shares, which may be effected by different methods, by private agreement, by arbitrators appointed by the parties, or in the last resort, by the Court." Later in the judgment his Lordship quotes the following observation of Lord Westbury in Appovier's case (10):—

"At another place he (Lord Westbury) adds: 'it is necessary to bear in mind the two fold application of the word "division." There may be division of right, and there may be 'a division of property.'" About the end of the judgment (page 162*) the following passage occurs, which to my mind amply supports the reasoning and the grounds upon which I have reached the conclusion that there was a separation between the two brothers: "The intention to separate may be evinced in different ways, either by explicit declaration or by conduct. If it is an inference derivable from conduct, it will be for the Court to determine whether it was unequivocal and explicit. In Joy Narain

Giri v. Girish Chunder Myti (16) their Lordships regarded the conduct of one of the two co-sharers who constituted the joint family 'when he left the joint residence and withdrew from commensality as indicating a fixed determination henceforward to live separately from his cousin,' and treated 'the fact of his borrowing money for his maintenance, as well as making a Will, as indicating, at all events, that he himself considered that a separation had taken place.' The conclusion was based on the inference of intention derivable from the acts and declarations of the member who, it was alleged, had separated himself, and not from the conduct or attitude of any other party." In a later case of Kewal Nain v. Budh Singh (Parbhu Lal) (17) their Lordships of the Privy Council had to decide a similar question and in delivering the judgment Viscount Haldane said: "By his plaint he had claimed a fifth share of the family property, and their Lordships entertain no doubt that the claim amounted to an intimation to the defendants, his co-sharers, of the unequivocal desire of the plaintiff for separation from the joint family. If this be so, the judgment of the Judicial Committee in the recent case of Girja Bai v. Sadashiv Dhundiraj (15) renders it beyond question that the commencement of this suit for partition effected a separation from the joint family. It is immaterial, in such a case, whether the co-sharers assent. A decree may be necessary for working out the result of the severance and for allotting definite shares, but the status of the plaintiff as separate in estate is brought about by his assertion of his right to separate, whether he obtains a consequential judgment or not."

We find, however, that in spite of Lalta Prasad's firm determination to separate and the unequivocal expression of it Ram Bali tried to cling to his former rule of exclusive owner of the family property. He executed in rapid succession a number of deeds hypothecating the family property to raise loans for his personal use, i. e., F-2, dated the 8th July 1909, J-14, dated the 20th October 1909, J-15, dated the 20th October 1909, E 4, dated the 4th November 1909, and E 31, dated the 31st July 1911. But this conduct of Ram Bali could not undo what Lalta Prasad had already accomplished, that is the severance of his status as a member of the joint family. In this connection I may again refer to the judgment of Lord Davey in the case of Balkishen Das v. Ram Narain Sahu (9). His Lordship observes as follows:—

"If the learned Judges meant that the legal construction or legal effect of an unambiguous document like the ikrarnama could be controlled or altered by evidence of the subsequent conduct of the parties, their Lordships cannot agree with them and they do not think that the case of Baboo Doorga Pershad v. Musammat Kundun Koonwar (18) cited by the learned Judges is any authority for such a proposition." Ram Bali's conduct, therefore, is not of much importance. But what is of importance is the fact that every time that a creditor of Ram Bali tried to seize the family property, Lalta Prasad entered his protest on the ground of his antecedent separation (vide Exhibits XXVI, XXVII and XXXIII, judgments in several litigations). I am not much concerned with the findings of the Courts in those cases, because they would depend upon the measure of proof or no proof at all adduced in those particular cases. My finding, therefore, is that Lalta Prasad separated in May 1908 from his step brother, Ram Bali.

Three other points were advanced in support of the appeal by the learned Counsel, who appeard on behalf of Sheo Dayal, appellant. They were: if separation is not proved (1) that the sale in question is justified by legal necessity; (2) that the appellant is protected by the provisions of section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882); and (3) that in case a decree for ejectment is passed against him, he should be compensated for the improvements which he has effected on the property in dispute purchased by him. In view of my finding recorded above, it is not necessary to decide these questions.

I allow the appeal and, modifying the decree of the Court below, dismiss the plaintiff's suit with regard to item No. 4 in list B of the lists attached to the plaint. The appellant will get his costs in this Court and in the Court below.

In view of the above finding the questions raised in the cross-objections do not arise. They are, therefore, dismissed. I make no order as to the costs of cross-objections.

In conducting an application for an inquisition under the Lunacy Act there ought to be a careful and thorough preliminary inquiry and the Judge ought to satisfy himself that there is real ground for an inquisition; he should seek some personal interview with the alleged insane to satisfy himself that there is real ground for supposing that there is something abnormal in the mental condition of the person which might bring him within the Lunacy Act. Ordinarily, an application for an inquisition should be supported by affidavit or by the applicant tendering himself for examination to the Judge on oath in support of the allegations in his application. JUDGMENT.—We agree with a great deal of the criticism that has been passed upon the proceedings in this matter in the Court below. It is not necessary to examine all of them in detail. They may be not unfairly summed up in this way, that the learned Judge, having somewhat hastily and without sufficient cause, ordered what he called proceedings in inquisition, proceeded to repent of it and got rid of those proceedings by a sort of half inquisition which was really never properly conducted. If the brother's application was bona fide (and it is quite true that the mere fact that he was prepared to deposit Rs. 600 to pay for the Civil Surgeon's fees, is a sign that he had some belief in his case), it is a hardship upon him that all these proceedings should have taken place for nothing. But holding the view that we do that no inquisition ever ought to have been ordered upon the materials before the learned Judge in the first instance, we should be ourselves committing an illogicality if we allowed this appeal. There will be nothing to prevent the appellant, the brother, making a fresh application, and that application ought not to be prejudiced by anything which has happened in this case for an inquisition. We propose to make one or two suggestions, not applicable merely to this case but to all applications of this kind, to guide the learned Judges before whom these applications come. It is true that nothing is contained in the Act itself to direct or guide a Judge as to how he shall conduct applications for an inquisition and probably no rules exist for dealing with the matter, but ordinary common sense would appear to dictate to a tribunal before whom such an application comes that care should be exercised in a painful matter of this kind, namely, an enquiry into a man's or woman's state of mind; specially in the case of people in comfortable circumstances who merely wish to lead a quiet life, care should be exercised that they are not suddenly flung without sufficient reason into an elaborate inquisition which after all is nothing more or less than a trial involving sometimes the history of a person's life back for many years, medical evidence, and all sorts of family witnesses. An enquiry of that sort once started must be prosecuted to the bitter end and has all the attributes of an ordinary trial on an issue of fact, and, therefore, when a person is alleged to be insane, before his or her family are cast into an elaborate proceeding of that sort, there ought to be a careful and thorough preliminary enquiry and the Judge ought to satisfy himself that there is a real ground for an inquisition. It is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rule, but in the first place it is essential that the person making the application should support it ordinarily by affidavit or by tendering himself for examination to the Judge on oath in support of the allegations in his application. The learned Judge would naturally want to know what relationship existed, what previous association had existed between the applicant and the alleged insane person, how long the illness was supposed to have lasted, why no previous steps had been taken and what were the present symptoms and actual causes which had induced the applicant to make the application as and when he did. Certainly in England and in a place like Cawnpore (one hesitates to say it generally about these provinces), an application of this kind ought to be supported by some medical evidence in the nature of a certificate of some doctor, lady or otherwise, who has had a reasonable opportunity of seeing the condition of the alleged invalid. If no medical evidence is forthcoming of more recent date than eight years before the application, so much the worse for the applicant. In many cases, and we think that this case is probably one, it would be very desirable that the Judge should seek some personal interview with the alleged insane, not with a view to forming a final opinion as to her real condition but to satisfy himself in the ordinary way, in which a layman can do, that there is a real ground for supposing that there is something abnormal in her mental condition which might bring her within the Lunacy Act. Of course it cannot be done without the consent of the person, but in this case if she really is able to manage her affairs, as two lady doctors have assured the Judge that she is, she would probably have no objection to coming with her husband, and her brother could be present if he so desired, to Court and sitting in purdah in the Judge's Chamber where the Judge could have some rational conversation with her if possible. In this case there was no evidence before the learned Judge of any sort or kind except ex parte statements in paper applications, which of course are worth little or nothing, and the three medical certificates. But there are matters in the objector's application which are far more specific than the rather vague statements in the application of the applicant, which it would be well for the learned Judge to examine the applicant about on oath. If it be the fact that this woman was divorced many years ago and has been married for some years to her present husband and that for many years also last past the applicant has been fighting with her about property in several Courts up to the High Court, there would probably be good ground for treating the application as merely another attack upon her and her husband. If the medical certificate stood alone, and there was nothing else in the case, we should have no hesitation in saying that at whatever stage he did it, whether in rejecting the application or deciding the inquisition in the negative, the learned Judge would have been quite justified. We entirely dissent from the view, which the learned Judge seems to have expressed somewhat hastily, of a lady in the position of Miss O'Brien, who is a Bachelor of Medicine and a Bachelor of Science of the London University, one of the highest medical qualifications in the world, who had been a medical officer in charge of Dufferin Hospital in Lucknow, and is now the Principal of the Female Medical School at Agra, and who had written a very careful, scientific and trustworthy account of her recollection of the general state of health and in particular the state of mind of this alleged insane person who was under the treatment of Miss O'Brien in hospital for a very serious complaint. It is really looking at the thing from the wrong angle of vision altogether, and is not fair to a woman of Miss O'Brien's positior, to suggest that, because she had formed an opinion that in 1918 the lady was sane and in her right mind, and capable of managing her affairs, she, Miss O'Brien, is not to be trusted to form a reliable scientific opinion about the woman's present condition of health and mind. As a matter of fact this disease is sometimes very difficult to diagnose and almost always progressive. A person who has a previous experience of the patient, her general constitution and habit of mind, is probably better qualified from the medical point of view than anybody else to express a reliable opinion. Indeed it would be very desirable in the face of that certificate, if it can be done without putting an unnecessary burden upon the family, that no final order should be passed without Miss O'Brien's opinion being taken on the subject. With these observations we dismiss the appeal with costs, including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Reference made by the Commissioner, Rohilkhand Division.

JUDGMENT.

FERARD, S. M.—[December 23, 1919.—I have heard parties in this reference under section 185, Tenancy Act, by the Commissioner of Rohilkhand.

The applicant for revision is the landlord; opposite parties are the ex proprietary tenants. The latter, after loss of their proprietary rights, put in an application in March 1917 to the effect that Rs. 230 be fixed as the ex-proprietary rent on 12 bighas 5 biswas and recorded in the papers. The application was attested before the Tahsildar by the tenants and the landlord, and the Tahsildar sent it to the Assistant Collector, 1st class, for sanction. The latter accepted the Tahsildar's report and directed that entry in the papers be made of Rs. 230 rent. The Assistant Collector did not consider the fact that only three of the four fields were sir or khudkasht of over 12 years and did not recognise the obligation resting on him of examining the suitability and legality of the rent fixed, which as a matter of fact was exorbitant. The landlord afterwards sued for rent on the basis of the rent thus entered. The Assistant Collector decreed it. The Collector in first appeal held that the agreement was void because the rent recited in it and subsequently entered in the papers was far above the rent which was permissible under section 10 (1), Tenancy Act. He, therefore, accepted the appeal and directed that proceedings for fixation of ex-proprietary rents in accordance with section 10, Tenancy Act, be taken under section 36, Land Revenue Act. The landlord applied for revision of this order to the Commissioner, who relying on a latter decision of the High Court than that relied on by the Collector has in this reference recommended that the Collector's appellate decision be set aside and the Assistant Collector's decree restored.

I have examined the High Court rulings referred to in the lower Court's orders. In a civil appeal under section 10 of the Letters Patent, Pirag v. Sital Pershad (1), the High Court held thata proprietor cannot contract himself out of his right to become a tenant of his sir, etc., or, out of his right to become an ex proprietary tenant with all the rights of such tenant including the right to hold at the rent rate mentioned in section 10, Tenancy Act, namely, 4 annas in the rupee less than the rate paid by the non occupancy tenants for similar land.

In a later decision which the Commissioner refers to, Jahangira v Karrar Husain (2), the High Court considered the subject on a somewhat different set of facts and the effect of their judgment, as I read it, is that ex-proprietary rent fixed by a Court under section 36, Land Revenue Act, upon an agreement between parties which does not go beyond the law, cannot be challenged afterwards in a rent suit between the parties. In the body of the judgment it is accepted as obvious that the provision of section 10 Tenancy Act, fixes a maximum rent, though there is nothing to prevent the parties concerned from contracting for the payment of a lower rent.

The bearing of these two rulings of the Hon'ble High Court on the subject-matter of the present reference seems to me identical. A proprietor cannot contract himself out of his ex-proprietary right in his sir and khudkasht of over 12 years or out of his right to hold it at a rate of not more than 4-annas in the rupee below the prevailing non-occupancy tenant rate. This accords with the view held by the Board in Musammat Ram Kuari v. Badri Singh (3) and is, in my opinion, good law expressing the intention of section 10, Tenancy Act. The Assistant Collector in 1917 failed to fix rent under section 36, Land Revenue Act, in accordance with law and the Collector is right in directing that this be done now. I would, therefore, return the record without acceptance of the Commissioner's recommendation to set aside the Collector's appellate order which, in my opinion, is correct and should stand.

I would let parties pay their own costs.

HARRISON, J. M.—I agree.

Inasmuch as sir land necessarily implies land cultivated by the proprietor, that is, the land-holder, grove land cannot be regarded as sir of the proprietor.

Therefore, on a sale of grove land the proprietor does not acquire ex-proprietary rights therein.

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Shahjahanpur, dated the 19th July 1917.

Mr. Lakshmi Narain, for the Appellants.

Mr. Iqbal Ahmad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We are of opinion that the decision of the Court below is correct. The plaintiffs brought the suit which has given rise to this appeal, for recovery of the value of the branches of certain trees which the plaintiffs had cut down but which the defendants had removed and misappropriated. They also asked for an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with the trees. The trees appertained to a grove No. 872 which has been found to have been the muafi of the defendants. They as such muafidars and as grove-holders mortgaged it to the plaintiff. The plaintiff obtained a decree for sale on the basis of the mortgage and in execution of the decree purchased the grove. After this auction purchase he became the sole owner of the grove. The defendants contend that the land was their sir and that they had acquired the rights of ex-proprietary tenants in respect of it and that consequently they were entitled to appropriate the timber of the trees existing on the land. As it is admitted and as it has been found that the land was the muafi of the defendants, they could not have any sir rights in respect of this land. It was not land which was held by them for agricultural purposes but was admittedly a grove. As a grove it could not have been their sir land, which necessarily implies land cultivated by the proprietor, that is, the land-holder. It is true that at the time of settlement in 1305 the land was recorded as sir, but it is manifest from the facts which have been found by the Court below that that entry was erroneous and that in reality the land was only the grove of the defendants, and not their sir land. Under these circumstances the defendants cannot be held to have acquired a right to the trees as the holders of an ex-proprietary holding. The plaintiff has acquired all the rights which the defendants had as grove holders. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

OF THE CITY OF BOMBAY—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Land acquisition proceedings—Parties agreeing as to amount of compensation—Agreement, whether enforceable.

The Municipal Commissioner of Bombay negotiated with the defendant Company for the acquisition of their premises on behalf of the Municipal Corporation; having failed to arrive at any agreement as to the price to be paid for the premises, the Municipal Commissioner moved Government to compulsorily acquire the property on behalf of the Municipal Corporation under the Land Acquisition Act. Negotiations, in the meantime, were resumed, and an offer was made to the Company to take the premises for Rs. 1,45,517-12-0. After this offer was made, the Government issued a notification, under the Land Acquisition Act, for the acquisition of the property. The Directors of the Company resolved to accept the offer and, through their Secretary, informed the Engineer of the Corporation that "the Company was willing to accept without prejudice the sum of Rs. 1,45,517-12-0" for the property, and this was approved by the Municipal Commissioner. A meeting was held before the Collector, and the agreement was recorded. Subsequently, the Company withdrew the offer made, and put in a claim for Rs. 5,71,660 as compensation for compulsory acquisition. The Municipal Corporation thereupon brought the present suit for a declaration that there was a contract binding on the Company and that the Company was not entitled in the proceedings before the Collector to any sum in excess of Rs. 1,45,517-12-0. The Company contended that there was no contract between the parties; that their letter to the Municipal Engineer was not a proposal as to what they were willing to accept but was an invitation to the Corporation to make a proposal on terms which the Company were prepared to deal with; that if there was an agreement it was void and of no effect; and that neither party was bound by it. The trial Court decreed the claim for the declaration prayed for and the Company appealed:

Held, that the claim had been rightly decreed: that there was an agreement binding on the Company as to the amount of the compensation to be paid for their premises; that the Municipal Corporation were entitled to make such an agreement before the Collector had made his award, and that the agreement could be specifically enforced against the Company. ### JUDGMENT.

MARTEN, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant Company from the judgment of Mr. Justice Macleod, dated the 24th February 1919, in favour of the plaintiffs, the Bombay Municipality. The case arises out of proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, for the compulsory acquisition of the defendants' land by the Bombay Municipality for public purposes. The real points before us are whether in law a binding agreement as to the amount of the compensation can ever be made between the Municipality and a landowner, before the Collector has made his award. If so, has such an agreement been made in the present case, and how is it to be enforced?

The agreement relied on by the Municipality is contained in two documents of the 12th September 1917, the first being what is alleged to be an offer on behalf of the defendant Company, and the second being an acceptance by the Municipality of that offer, which acceptance was subsequently communicated to the defendants at a meeting before the Collector on the 14th September. The precise terms of these documents are, I think, material. The first document is a letter written by the Secretary of the defendant Company to the Executive Engineer of the Municipality, and omitting formal parts, is as follows:—

"Acquisition of Company's Property, Armenian Lane, Fort.

With reference to the interview our Engineer Mr. Vakde had with you, I have the honour to state that the Company is willing to accept without prejudice the sum of Rs. 1,45,517, inclusive of 15 per cent. for compulsory acquisition, and cost of the chimney. The amount will be subject to deductions of the capitalized dues to the Collector and of the easements of the neighbouring properties if any."

The acceptance of the Municipal Commissioner is as follows:—

"Discussed with E. E. Compared figures with the original estimate. I approve of the case being settled on the conditions stated in the last letter from the Fort Press Company for Rs. 1,45,517."

The plaintiffs allege in paragraph 18 of the plaint that these documents amount to a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, "that the defendants shall not claim a sum more than Rs. 1,45,517 as compensation for their said premises in the said land acquisition proceedings, and that the plaintiffs shall pay to the defendants, that amount for compensation only, whatever award is made in the said proceedings. and that the plaintiffs shall pay the said amount to the defendants even if the award awards a less sum for compensation." The trial Judge has accepted this view, and has granted consequential declaratory relief, but has not granted any injunction.

I should explain that the words "without prejudice" in the letter of the 12th September 1917 were withdrawn before the Collector on the 14th September and may be disregarded: and that the reference to the cost of the chimney is made clear from previous correspondence and may also be disregarded. The reference to "deductions.....of the easements" refers to the fact that any adjoining owner who could establish an easement over the property would, under the Land Acquisition Act, be entitled to be paid an appropriate sum out of the total compensation for the property. It would appear, however, from the Collector's notes that all claims but one have been disposed of and that in that one case the adjoining owner would prefer to retain his easement of light rather than be compensated for its loss. The "15 per cent. for compulsory acquisition" refers to the amount payable under that heading, by virtue of section 23 (2) and section 15 of the Land Acquisition Act. The reference "E. E." in the memo. of the Municipal Commissioner is to the Executive Engineer.

At the meeting before the Collector on the 14th September 1917, both parties were represented, and the Collector's notes show that the solicitor for the Municipality put in as Exhibit C the above letter of the 12th September, "showing that the Company has agreed to receive Rs. 1,45,517 inclusive of the 15 per cent. for compulsory acquisition and the Government claim if any by the holder of adjoining properties." Mr. Vakde (the Company's Engineer) explains that the term "'without prejudice' occurring in the letter has no longer any force as the Municipality has accepted the proposal." At that point, therefore, the parties would seem to have been in complete agreement. The Company at any rate thought so, as their resolution of 22nd September speaks of the amount of Rs. 1,45,517 having been "fixed" in accordance with an arrangement made by their Engineer with the Executive Engineer and that "an official letter was written on the 12th September to the Executive Engineer conveying acceptance of the said offer on behalf of the Company. The same is hereby noted."

It was not till the 23rd October that the Company by its solicitors sent the following letter of withdrawal:—

> "Re: Acquisition of the property of the Fort Press Company Ltd., situate at Armenian Lane.
> With reference to the letter dated the 12th September last from the Secretary of our client the Fort Press Co. Ltd. to you, we are instructed by our clients to withdraw on their behalf the offer made by them in that letter for the sale to the Municipality of their property situate at Armenian Lane at Rs. 1,45,517 and accordingly beg to do so hereby."

I regard this letter as very material in considering what view of the matter the Company took at the time as opposed to the various contentions which their Counsel have since put forward.

Meanwhile, one other meeting before the Collector had been held on the 10th October and further meetings were held on the 31st October, 22nd and 29th November, and 17th December, apparently without formal repudiation by the Company of the alleged agreement. At the meeting, however, before the Collector of the 29th January 1918 the Company was represented by Counsel and contended that no agreement had been arrived at: and that even if there had been, that was not the proper place to decide that matter: and that they were entitled to lead evidence as to value. They also on the same day made a formal claim for Rs. 5,71,660 as compensation, and objected to the measurement made under section 8 of the Act. Thereupon, after some discussion, the proceedings were adjourned by the Collector.

On the 12th March 1918 the present suit was instituted by the Municipality. It will be noted that in paragraph 12 of the written statement, the defendants pleaded that the agreement, if any, "is void and of no effect. Neither party is bound by such an agreement." As to this, the learned trial Judge, in dealing with the issues, says:

"It will be noted that the defendants no longer contended that if there was an agreement it was void or that the agreement set up by the plaintiff was an agreement for the sale of the property in question."

Out of the eight issues raised at the trial, the first six depended on whether there was an offer and an acceptance by the plaintiffs and the defendants or their duly authorized agents. Before us, Mr. Desai for the appellants only relied on issue No. 1. He admitted that if the Company's letter of the 12th September amounted to an offer, the remaining five issues Nos. 2 to 6 (inclusive) would be decided against him, as would also be issue No. 8. On this point I entertain no doubt whatever that the Company's letter is an offer and not a mere invitation to make offers. The theory of an invitation is hopelessly inconsistent with, amongst other things, their own resolution of 22nd September and their own solicitors' letter of 23rd October. It accordingly follows that on this point I entirely agree with the judgment of the learned trial Judge, and that consequently the defendants fail on issues Nos. 1 to 6 and No. 8.

This leaves only issue No. 7, viz., whether the agreement, if any, was merely arrived at for the purpose of proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act, and if so, whether such an agreement can be specifically enforced by the plaintiffs against the defendants. But before dealing with this issue, I will, by way of warning, add that one must dismiss from one's mind the practice and procedure in England under the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with its ample facilities for landowners to come to binding agreements with the promoters both before and after notice to treat has been served. To an English lawyer familiar with that Act, the question which I have referred to could have but one answer. But the Land Acquisition Act has been framed on such entirely different lines that it requires careful consideration before one determines what is and what is not permissible under it: and in particular whether the object of the Indian Legislature was not to keep all control in the hands of Government, and to prevent any financial agreements between a landowner and a local authority being arrived at unless the express consent of Government was obtained.

I think, therefore, it is material to consider what were the respective positions of the parties at the date of the agreement. Under the City of Bombay Municipal Act, 1888 (Act III of 1888), the Municipality have wide powers of acquiring land. Only section 517 was cited to us but, I think, other sections are material. Under section 61 (m) it is the duty of the Municipality to make adequate provision for (inter alia) the construction and improvement of public streets. This should be read with section 296, which give wide powers to the Commissioner, subject to the provisions of sections 90 to 92, to acquire land for such purposes and to dispose of the same. Section 87 also gives a general power to the Corporation to acquire and hold land. In the present case, the defendants' land is required for what is usually known as the Church Gate Street Improvement. This, as will be seen on looking at the plan, Exhibit H to the plaint, involves widening of Church Gate Street and the construction of a new street between it and Meadows Street, to relieve the great congestion of traffic in this locality.

Subject to certain restrictions, the entire executive power for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Act vests in the Municipal Commissioner (see section 64) and he enters into contracts on behalf of the Corporation (see section 69). Under section 90 any land to be acquired for the purposes of the Act may be acquired by the Commissioner on behalf of the Corporation by agreement subject to the approval of the Standing Committee. In the present case negotiation for that purpose began as long as August 1916, but no agreement was arrived at.

Section 91 I will quote in full, viz.,

(1) "Whenever the Commissioner is unable to acquire any immoveable property under the last preceding section by agreement, Government may, in their discretion, upon the application of the Commissioner, made with the approval of the Standing Committee, order proceedings to be taken for acquiring the same on behalf of the corporation, as if such property were land needed for a public purpose within the meaning of the Land Acquisition Act, 1870."

[This reference is now to the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, see that Act, section 2 (3)].

That such an application was made by the Commissioner is pleaded in paragraph 3 of the plaint and not denied in the written statement.

Sub section (2) of section 91 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act is as follows:—

"The amount of compensation awarded and all other charges incurred in the acquisition of such property shall, subject to all other provisions of this Act, be forthwith paid by the Commissioner and thereupon the said property shall vest in the Corporation."

This sub section does not say whether the Commissioner is to pay this sum to the Collector or to the landowner direct, but if the latter, it varies section 31 of the Land Acquisition Act under which the Collector is the person to pay the compensation, and in any event it would seem to vary section 16 of that Act, which provides for the land vesting absolutely in Government free from all incumbrances.

Section 92 gives power to dispose of property. Section 517 (h) gives wide powers to compromise. The financial provisions will be found in Chapters VII and VIII. Section 111 provides for the establishment of a municipal fund, and section 139 for certain taxes to be levied by the Corporation.

I think I have now stated enough to show that the Bombay Municipality have wide independent powers, as indeed one would expect in a Corporation of their importance: and that the intervention of Government is only necessary to enforce an acquisition, and even then it is the Municipality which pays and the Municipality which gets the land.

Turning next to the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, it is formally the Government which acquires the land [see sections 6 (3) and 7] and it vests in them (see section 16). Further, although the land is acquired at the expense of the Municipality (see section 50), still it is the Collector who pays the compensation directly (see section 31). As I have already indicated, the above provisions are or may be modified in the present case, having regard for section 91 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act. Then under section 11 of the Land Acquisition Act it is the Collector who has to determine, in the first instance, the amount of compensation which in his opinion should be allowed for the land. Further, he has to apportion the compensation between the various persons entitled [see section 11 (3)] unless they agree amongst themselves as to how this shall be effected, in which case he accepts such agreement (see section 29). He also may have power to make arrangements with landowners [see section 31 (3) and (4)].

Even when the Collector has made his award, that is not final. It only amounts to an offer by Government [See section 31 and Ezra v. Secretary of State (1) and Ezra v. Secretary of State (2).] If that offer is not accepted, any person interested may require the matter to be referred to the Court (see section 18). But the local authority is not entitled to demand this reference [see section 50 (2)]: and if the applicant has made a claim to compensation, the amount awarded to him by the Court is not to exceed the amount so claimed or be less than the amount awarded by the Collector (see section 25). Further, there is a very important power given by section 48 to Government to withdraw from the acquisition of any land of which possession has not been taken, subject to paying compensation for any damage thereby caused [see section 48 (2)].

The appellants say that this section 48 enables Government to withdraw from

(1) 30 C. 36; 7 C. W. N. 249.
(2) 32 C. 605; 9 C. W. N. 454; 1 C. L. J. 227; 7 Bom. L. R. 422; 2 A. L. J. 771; 32 I. A. 93; 8 Sar. P. C. J. 779.

the compulsory acquisition altogether, should they find the award too expensive, and provided of course possession has not been taken. They further rely on this section as shewing a want of mutuality in the alleged agreement.

Under these circumstances, I think that at the date of the agreement in question, the position of the parties was as follows: The defendants had to part with their land having regard to the Government Notification of 23rd July 1917 for compulsory acquisition. The Municipality was to get the land and also to pay for it. The only questions were the amount of compensation, and the positions of third parties. Possibly an ordinary agreement for sale could have been arrived at, and the Government Notification withdrawn qua that land. But then the Municipality would not have got the benefit of the Land Acquisition Act and the clean title thereby obtained free from all incumbrances. It would, therefore, seem reasonable from a business point of view for the parties to complete the transaction through the medium of the Act and in that way deal with the claims of third parties: but that this method of completion should not as between the Municipality and the Company affect the figures agreed on. Otherwise why trouble to agree as to the figures at all?

What then is the effect of the agreement? According to the present contention of the defendants, the agreement means nothing. It is a nullity. So, also, are the five resolutions of the Company dated the 1st June, 14th July, 31st August, 7th and 22nd September 1917. This contention seems to me wholly inconsistent not only with their own Solicitors' letter of the 23rd October 1917 but also with the desire of the law to give such business efficacy to business transactions, as both parties must have intended it should have. Thus in The Moorcock (3), Lord Justice Bowen said as follows:—

"The implication which the law draws from what must obviously have been the intention of the parties, the law draws with the object of giving efficacy to the transaction and preventing such a failure of consideration as cannot have been within the contemplation of either side; and I believe if one were to take all the cases, and there are many, of implied warranties or covenants in law, it will be found that in all of them the law is raising an implication from the presumed intention of the parties with the object of giving to the transaction such efficacy as both parties must have intended that at all events it should have. In business transactions such as this, what the law desires to effect by the implication is to give such business efficacy to the transaction as must have been intended at all events by both parties who are business men, not to impose on one side all the perils of the transaction, or to emancipate one side from all the chances of failure, but to make each party promise in law as much, at all events, as it must have been in the contemplation of both parties that he should be responsible for in respect of those perils or chances."

If then the agreement was not a nullity, it seems to me that it was either (1) an agreement to make mutual admissions as to value, but that nevertheless the Municipality should give and the Company should accept whatever sum the Collector or the Court might eventually award, or else, it was (2) an agreement definitely fixing the compensation as between the parties themselves, whatever sum may ultimately be awarded by the Collector and with an obligation on either party to refund any excess or make good any deficiency as the case might be. In my judgment the latter is the true view. I think the intention of the parties was to arrive at a definite figure for better or for worse: and not to leave the matter open to the costs and uncertainty of future litigation before the Collector or the Court. Apart from the interests of possible third parties, this would present no difficulty, and in the present case the claim of the only third party seems to be mainly for an easement of light to some privy windows.

Put, therefore, in another way, the agreement amounts in effect to a sale, as stated in the Company's letter of the 23rd October, but with this special feature, viz., that the purchase money was to be subject to a possible deduction for easements in favour of a third party, the amount of such deduction, if any, to be ascertained by the Collector or the Court under the Act. Or, again, if all this be written in full, the result is in substance what is pleaded in paragraph 18 of the plaint and asked for by way of declaration in prayers 2, 3 and 4.

It was urged that the terms so pleaded as being the effect of the agreement are not expressly stated in the agreement. It seems to me, however, that these terms may be fairly implied from the language actually used and the surrounding circumstances, and that they ought to be so implied. I have already referred to "The Moorcock" (3) as an illustration of an important implication being made. I may also refer to the Butterley Company, Limited v. New Hucknall Colliery Company, Limited (4), where in a lease of a lower seam of coal the Court implied a license to cause subsidence to the upper seam as otherwise about seventy per cent. of the coal in the lower seam would have been left unworked, assuming the ordinary method of working, viz. the long wall system, were adopted. There was no such express license in the lease, and the case was of the greatest importance in the coal mining industry as it governed many others and large sums depended on whether the implication could and ought to be made in favour of the mining lessees. In the present case, the implication we are asked to make is to prevent what the Company at one time called "an offer...for sale...Rs. 1,45,517" being turned into what they now say is a nullity or alternatively a non-binding admission as to value.

Then, again, if one tests the matter under the Indian Contract Act, I think we have a "contract" within the meaning of sections 2 and 10 of the Indian Contract Act. As I have already held, there is here a proposal and an acceptance. I think there is also consideration within the meaning of section 2 (d) and (e). For instance, I think there are reciprocal promises to admit that the true value is Rs. X. This, I think, relieves either party from the expense of calling evidence of value before the Collector, at any rate so far as his opponent is concerned. In this connection, I may refer to section 50 (2) of the Land Acquisition Act, under which the local authority are entitled to appear before the Collector and adduce evidence for the purpose of determining the amount of compensation.

If a similar matter arose in a suit for damages and the parties agreed on the damages, the Court under Order XXIII, rule 3, would record such agreement and pass a decree for damages in accordance with the agreement arrived at. No doubt the Collector is not a "Court," but on any appeal from him to this High Court, the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code would apply so far as not inconsistent. (See section 53 of the Land Acquisition Act.) Consequently, it seems to me that if this agreement had been made after the award of the Collector and after a reference made to the Court under section 18, it might have been open to the Municipality to apply that the Court should record the agreement and act upon it in accordance with Order XXIX, rule 3, provided of course the interests of the other parties were not prejudicially affected. What real difference in principle is there then between such an agreement after the award and one before it? No doubt, when the Collector makes his award, that fixes the minimum, though not the maximum, under the Act. But that seems to me only a matter of degree.

As regards the consideration, so far as the Municipality is concerned, I see nothing unlawful in what they have agreed to do. It did occur to me whether, if the award was less than the sum agreed on, it would be ultra vires for the Municipality to pay more than the sum which the Officer appointed by the Act had fixed as the appropriate sum payable under that Act. But having regard to the wide powers of the Municipality which I have referred to, it seems to me that this point cannot fairly be maintained. Under section 91 (2) the direction to pay the "compensation awarded" is to be "subject to all other provisions of this Act," and I think this preserves (inter alia) the power to compromise given by section 517. Be that as it may, the Company gave up in the Court below its contention that the agreement was void: and I see no express allegation that this agreement was ultra vires the Municipality. It seems to me, therefore,

Under the above circumstances, I think the agreement here was for a lawful consideration and for a lawful object and was consequently a "contract" within the meaning of section 10 of the Indian Contract Act, provided it was enforceable at law.

Now, putting aside for a moment the question of specific relief, why should not this agreement, if necessary, be enforced in law by damages? If, for instance, the defendants proceed as they did on the 29th January 1918, and in defiance of this agreement insist on a claim for some five and three-fourth lacs, and if they eventually succeed in that claim, why should not the Municipality be entitled to claim from them the difference between the compensation actually awarded and the amount which the defendants agreed with them to accept? I recognize that such an award might be due to other causes than the increased claim, but I will assume a case where it would be due to such a claim. I quite agree with the learned trial Judge that the question at the present moment is premature, because until the amount is finally fixed by the Collector or the Court under the Land Acquisition Act, the actual damages (if any) cannot be ascertained. But there is no difficulty in testing the matter now in that way in principle. It seems to me, therefore, that damages would in certain events be obtainable by the Municipality, and similarly, if the award was less than the sum agreed on, I think the defendants might recover the difference from the Municipality. It seems to me, therefore, that this contract is enforceable at law, namely, in damages.

It is, however, said that the power of withdrawal given by section 43 to Government might render the whole proceedings nugatory, and that consequently there is no mutuality. Counsel, however, for the Municipality, after due consideration, stated in Court that even if the Government withdrew, the Municipality would be obliged to pay the sum agreed on. It may be that the Municipality cannot now improve their position by this admission, if that was not the true legal position at the date of the agreement. But even supposing that the agreement is determinable in a certain event, that does not necessarily make it void now. One can, for instance, enter into a perfectly valid agreement for the sale or purchase of property, but with the proviso that the agreement should be void if the sanction of the High Court is not obtained within six months, or alternatively, if any land acquisition notice be issued within a specified time.

Accordingly, I do not think that section 48, even if it applies here, prevents the agreement being a good one.

As regards the unreported case—Appeal No. 32 of 1917—relied on by the appellants, I respectfully agree with the criticism of the learned trial Judge. The point there before the Court was entirely different: and the observations quoted are obiter. The case is, I think, of no real assistance in the present dispute.

The next and last point brings us to the actual relief which the learned Judge has granted, namely, the declaratory relief set out in the decree under appeal. In one sense I think that the precise relief to be granted at the present moment—apart of course from the first declaration as to the existence of an agreement—is a matter of small importance. I should imagine that any tribunal required to assess a money value would readily accept the sum arrived at by the parties after a year's hard bargaining. I should have thought also that it would be open to the Collector to say that, in view of the agreement arrived at and the admission thereby made, he would decline to allow the parties to adduce evidence in contradiction of that admission, at any rate unless they could first show that they had been misled by fraud or by some very extraordinary circumstances. But there is not a hint in the proceedings as to anything of that sort. Nor, indeed, is there any explanation offered of the Company's startling claim for nearly $5\frac{3}{4}$ lacs as against the previous agreement for under $1\frac{1}{2}$ lacs. Supposing, therefore, that no further declaratory relief is granted, the probabilities would seem to be that the Collector would base his award on the figures of the agreement, and that if any appeal was brought by the defendants from that award, it would be unlikely to succeed. But that is a matter of speculation. On the whole, therefore, I think it is right to provide for contingencies however remote, and to define clearly the views of the Court as to what the rights of the parties are under the agreement. In that view of the case, I think the declaratory relief is substantially correct and that it is no objection that substantive relief is not also given. [See Dyson v. Attorney-General (5) and Specific Relief Act, section 42.]

But to aviod any misunderstanding, I wish to say that the decree of the Court must not be understood as interfering in any way with the Collector. We are merely determining whether there was an agreement, and what are the rights of the parties under it. It is for the Collector to decide in his own way what the true compensation is and to be complete master of the proceedings before him. In this connection, it may be noticed that Mr. Justice Macleod expressly declined to grant an injunction, and I respectfully agree with the view he took in respect of that. Consequently, I think that we are not really infringing that very salutary general principle that where the Legislature has provided a special tribunal for determining a particular dispute, the parties shall resort to that tribunal and not bring the matter to the High Court, at any rate until the tribunal designated by the Legislature has given its decision. [See Grand Junction Waterworks Company v. Hampton Urban District Council (6).]

I think, however, that the decree as eventually drawn up is open to possible misconstruction as to the intention of this Court not to interfere with the proceedings before the Collector. I think, therefore, that the last three declarations should be varied and run as follows:—

"And this Court doth further declare that upon the true construction of the said agreement and as between the parties thereto, (a) the defendants are not entitled to claim in the proceedings before the Collector under the Land Acquisition Act any sum for compensation other than Rs. 1,45,517 or to proceed in the said proceedings on any other footing, and (b) the defendants are not entitled to any compensation in the said land acquisition proceedings beyond Rs. 1,45,517, after allowing thereout for deductions of the capitalized dues to the Collector and of the easements of the neighbouring properties, if any, and (c) that if the Collector awards as compensation a sum more or less than Rs. 1,45,517, the excess or deficiency will have to be adjusted as between the plaintiffs and defendants on the basis of the figures and terms agreed upon in the said contract and the sum found due as the result of such adjustment will have to be paid or made good to the defendants or the plaintiffs, as the case may be."

The rest of the decree should stand. I have suggested the variation of the original wording of the third declaration, as I am not satisfied that it is arithmetically correct in all contingencies, e. g., if the value of the easement varies with the value of the defendants' property.

In the result, I am of opinion that the decision of the learned trial Judge is right and, in the view I take and subject to the formal variations I have mentioned, this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

In conclusion I would add by way of warning that this case seems to me an exceptional one, and that, in my opinion, it must not be taken as encouraging the parties to come to the High Court over disputes in matters pending before the Collector under this Act. Nor do I see any adequate reason why the Collector should necessarily adjourn this proceeding pending such a High Court suit. No doubt he has done so in the present case out of courtesy, but one can imagine cases where important works might be thereby delayed to the great detriment of the general public.

HEATON, J.—I need not recapitulate the facts which are fully stated in my learned brother's judgment. Two explanations are possible to account for the real meaning and intent of the acts of the parties. The first is that accepted by my Lord the Chief Justice who heard the case, and by my brother Marten, that there was a binding contract. The second is that the parties agreed as to the value of the property and left everything else to be dealt with by the award of the acquiring officer. In other words that there was not a contract, but merely a mutual admission of the value of the property. My mind inclines to this

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 10—Suit for joint possession decreed—Appeal pending in Privy Council—Subsequent suit for profits, whether can be stayed.

Where it is shown that an appeal is pending before His Majesty in Council, an order for stay of a subsequent suit can be made without any reference to the nature of the relief claimed in either suit. It is only necessary that there should be in both suits or in the suit and the appeal some matter which is directly and substantially in issue in both cases. [p. 629, col. 2; p. 630, col 1.]

Plaintiffs obtained a decree in a Civil Court for joint possession of certain lands with defendants execution of which was carried out. Defendants appealed to the Privy Council. Subsequently plaintiffs filed a suit to recover profits from the defendants in the Revenue Court. In this latter suit a question of title was raised which was also in issue in the appeal before the Privy Council:

Held, that the subsequent suit could be stayed under section 10 of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 629, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Assistant Collector, 1st Class, Hardoi, dated the 18th October 1919.

Messrs. Shahanshah Husain Rizvi and Ali Mohammad, for the Applicants.

Messrs. H. Husain and Ghulam Husan, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—These applications have been presented here in revision on behalf of two sets of plaintiffs against the same set of defendants. It appears that a number of suits have been filed in the Court of a First Grade Assistant Collector of the Hardoi District, in which the plaintiffs are claiming profits from the defendants under section 108 of the Oudh Rent Act.

In the Court below one of the pleas taken for the defence was that the plaintiffs had no title to any share of the villages in respect of which the suits were brought and consequently their suits were liable to be dismissed. Another plea raised for the defence was that at the present moment there is pending before His Majesty in Council an appeal in which these parties are represented and in which the question of the proprietary title of these two sets of plaintiffs is one of the matters in issue.

It seems that certain litigation, which took place in the Civil Courts and in which these plaintiffs were successful up to this Court, terminated in an order made by this Court directing that the successful plaintiffs should be put into joint possession with the defendants in respect of these lands, and this order has been carried out. Now after the order has been executed in favour of these plaintiffs, they have brought these suits for profits. The lower Court has applied the provisions of section 10, Civil Procedure Code, and has directed the trial of the suits to be stayed. The case as put in the lower Court's order is that as the question of title has been raised in the Court below and as the question is also directly and substantially in issue in the appeal which is now before His Majesty in Council, section 10, Civil Procedure Code, requires that the hearing of these suits in the Revenue Courts should be stayed.

To me it seems that the order of the Assistant Collector is a perfectly proper one. It has been argued that one of the conditions which must be fulfilled before the hearing of the suit can be stayed under section 10 is that the prior litigation should be pending in a Court having jurisdiction to grant the relief claimed. These words of qualification do not, however, apply to the last six words of section 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it seems to me that the correct view is that where it is shown that any appeal is pending before His Majesty in Council, the order for stay can be made under section 10 without any reference to the nature of the relief claimed in either suit. It is only necessary that there should be in both suits or in the suit and the appeal some matter which is directly and substantially in issue in both cases. It cannot be contended now that the question of the plaintiffs' title is not directly and substantially in issue before their Lordships of the Privy Council. I am satisfied, therefore, that it is not possible to argue that the order of the Court below is without jurisdiction or that the Court has acted wrongfully or with any illegality or material irregularity. The applications are dismissed with costs accordingly.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 152—Amendment of decree—Small Cause Court decree—Revision—Court, proper to amend decree.

The decree of a Small Cause Court is final and though in certain circumstances it may be set aside or modified by a High Court acting in virtue of its revisional powers, it must remain the decree of the Court which originally passed it, when the High Court declines to interfere with it on the revision side.

Therefore, in such a case an application for amendment of the decree must be made to the Small Cause Court, and not to the High Court.

Civil revision from the decree of the Registrar, Small Cause Court, Lahore, dated the 7th April 1919.

Mr. Ghulam Muhammad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Niaz Muhammad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—On the 31st October 1918 the Judge, Small Cause Court, Lahore, passed certain decrees in favour of plaintiffs, Khuda Bakhsh and Nur Muhammad, and in his judgment directed that "the decree will be capable of execution either on the joint application of the plaintiffs, or, if Nur Muhammad fails to join, on Khuda Bakhsh's application alone, for the benefit of the mosque to which these shops belong." This direction was omitted from the decrees which were drawn up in joint favour of both plaintiffs.

Khuda Bakhsh applied to the Small Cause Court to amend the decrees by inserting therein the said direction, but the Court, while apparently of opinion that the decrees should be amended as prayed, held that it had no power to grant the application inasmuch as defendants had applied to this Court to revise the decrees of the Small Cause Court and that consequently the decrees had merged in the orders passed by this Court (which had, however, rejected the petitions for revision in limine) and had become the decrees of this Court. This principle, no doubt, applies to orders passed on appeals, and there is ample authority for the proposition that the decree of a Court, when it comes before an Appellate Court on appeal, becomes the decree of the latter Court, even in those cases where the Appellate Court's decree merely affirms the decree of the lower Court. But no appeal lies from the decree of a Small Cause Court. Such decree is final and though in certain circumstances it may be set aside or modified by a High Court acting in virtue of its revisional powers, it must remain the decree of the Court which originally passed it, when the High Court declines to interfere with it on the revision side.

I accordingly accept this petition and direct the Small Cause Court to deal with the petitioner's application for amendment of the decrees in accordance with law and the foregoing observations. Respondents will pay costs throughout these proceedings (i.e., for amendment of the decrees) up to date.

Where a claimant applies under section 18 of the Land Acquisition Act for a reference to the Court as to the adequacy of the amount awarded by the Collector, it is not necessary, nor does the Act require, that he should state in detail the grounds upon which he claims a larger sum.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge of Howrah, dated the 22nd of August 1918.

Dr. Jadu Nath Kanjilal, for the Appellant.

Babu Ram Ch. Mitter, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We think that this matter ought not to have been decided in the way in which it has been done by the learned District Judge.

We are not inclined to attach much weight to the case of Land Acquisition Act, In the matter of (1) with reference to this question. It has always to be remembered that in cases of this kind petitions are put in by persons without any legal aid. It is evident from the petition before the Court that the claimants were complaining that the award was extremely inadequate and that they were claiming Rs. 5,000 per bigha. There is nothing in the Land Acquisition Act which requires a claimant to state the grounds in detail upon which he claims a larger sum. Unfortunately the claimant has mixed up another matter with this claim, namely, about some land which he wanted to be acquired. This cannot clearly be a matter of reference. It also refers to another plot of land, and that matter was not asked to be referred to the Court but was for determination by the Collector.

We think that the reference ought to be heard and decided on its merits, namely, as to whether the award is inadequate and whether the claimant is entitled to the amount per bigha he claims.

Costs of this appeal will be costs in the reference. We asses the hearing fee at three gold mohurs.

Punjab Court of Wards Act (II of 1903), s. 31 (3)—Execution of decree—Property of Ward of Court attached—Court, power of, to order sale.

Where the property of a person which is under the superintendence of the Court of Wards has been validly attached, the executing Court has power, under section 31 (3) of the Punjab Court of Wards Act, to order the sale of that property without the consent or concurrence of the Court of Wards. [p. 632, col. 1.]

Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Amritsar, dated the 6th July 1917.

Mr. Shiam Das, for the Appellant.

Mr. Duni Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is a sequel to the Miscellaneous First Appeal No. 3158 of 1916, Balwant Singh v. Mahindar Singh (1), which was disposed of by my judgment dated 23rd April 1917 [Balwant Singh v. Mahindar Singh (1)]. What was decided in that judgment was that since the respondents had filed with their application for execution, dated the 25th April 1916, a certificate from the Deputy Commissioner to the effect that they had notified their claim to him as required by section 23 of the Court of Wards Act, II of 1903, the executing Court had every power, under sub-section (3) of section 31 of the said Act, to order the attachment of the property of the then appellant, Sardar Balwant Singh.

The question whether the Court executing the decree could, after the property of the judgment-debtor had been duly attached, proceed to sell it in execution without the concurrence of the Court of Wards did not arise in that case and was left undecided. Since my judgment was passed, the executing Court has made an order for the auction sale of the property which had been attached; and this order has been made without the concurrence of the Court of Wards. The question for decision in this appeal is whether that order is bad in law; and after hearing the appellant's Pleader I have no hesitation in answering the question in the negative. Under section 31, sub-section (3) of the Court of Wards Act, when the decree-holders filed with their application for execution a certificate to the effect specified in sub-section (2) of the said section, the executing Court had power to issue any attachment or other process in execution of the decree; and it is nowhere laid down in the Act that the property under the control of the Court of Wards, which has been duly attached, cannot be sold in execution without the consent or concurrence of the Court of Wards being first obtained.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of the lower Court is correct and I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Separation—Arbitration—Award precluding separate claim for partition, binding effect of—Suit for separate possession, whether maintainable.

Where after the disintegration of a joint Hindu family the members thereof refer matters in dispute to arbitration and an award is made whereby each of the parties is precluded, during his lifetime, from claiming separate possession by means of a partition by metes and bounds over any of the property of which he and the other members are joint owners, such award is binding on the members of the family and a suit by one member for separate possession of his share is not maintainable. [p. 635, col. 2.]

First appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Mainpuri, dated the 15th of June 1916.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru and Babu Priya Nath Banerji, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Pandit Moti Lal Nehru and Pandit Baldeo Ram Dave, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiff Rup Singh is suing his sole surviving brother, Bhabhuti Singh, and the three minor sons of a deceased brother Ratan Singh, for separate possession by partition in respect of a one-third share of certain properties, moveable and immoveable, specified at the foot of the plaint. He also asks for the cancellation of a certain award, dated the 28th of February 1912, made by two arbitrators, Bijai Singh and Mihin Lal, under circumstances to be noted presently. The plaint recites that the joint family consisting of the plaintiff, his brothers and his nephews "was divided and made separate in food" about the year 1909 or 1910 A. D. From this time the plaintiff and another nephew, a major, by name Hukam Singh, son of a deceased brother named Sarup Singh, each continued to utilize the family property to the extent of their respective one-fourth share. Hukam Singh has now secured separate possession of his share after a complete partition by metes and bounds and the plaintiff, being now the owner of an undivided one-third share in the property formerly belonging to the joint family, left in the hands of himself and the defendants, seeks a partition of his own share in the same manner.

He is conscious, however, that there is one obstacle in his way. He admits that on the 3rd of February 19 2 he had signed, along with his brothers, Bhabhuti Singh and Ratan Singh, a reference to arbitration, by which the arbitrators already named were empowered to settle all disputes between them and to make arrangements for the management of the property. The arbitrators delivered an award on the 28th February 1912, and got it registered on the day following; but the plaintiff says that the terms of the said award had only come to his knowledge within the "last few months." He admits that by the terms of this award he purports to be compelled to "remain under the control of and look to the defendants for support," which is an indirect way of admitting that the award purports to leave the management of the family property with Bhabhuti Singh and Ratan Singh and to bind the plaintiff not to seek separate possession of his share by partition. He attacks the award upon three distinct grounds :—

(i) Because the plaintiff's signature on the agreement of reference had been obtained by undue influence, at a time when the plaintiff was being prosecuted on a criminal charge brought against him by, or at the instigation of, Bhabhuti Singh and Ratan Singh.

(ii) Because the arbitrators had been guilty of misconduct and had returned an unjust award by collusion with the aforesaid brothers of the plaintiff.

(iii) Because the terms of the award are in themselves illegal, beyond the powers of the arbitrators and not binding on the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, therefore, seeks, as his first relief, a declaration that the said award is "null and void," this relief being apparently sought as a preliminary to the claim to separate possession by partition which follows.

The defendants, while admitting that Hukam Singh had separated from the rest of the family, pleaded that the status of membership of a joint undivided Hindu family still subsisted as between themselves and the plaintiff. They contended that the latter had joined in the reference to arbitration "of his own accord and will, without any unlawful compulsion," that the proceedings in arbitration and the delivery of the award had taken place with the full knowledge of the plaintiff, and that there had been no misconduct on the part of the arbitrators. They pleaded, further, that any claim to have the award set aside was now barred by limitation and that the award was binding on the plaintiff "by the principle of res judicata." As to the terms of the award, they pleaded that these were altogether lawful and within the competence of the arbitrators under the terms of the agreement of reference; but they contended further that even if for any reason any particular provisions of the award should be found to be illegal or ultra vires, this would not invalidate the award as a whole, and the plaintiff remained bound by the provision that he should not seek for separate possession by partition.

The trial Court fixed a large number of issues, but decided only those of them which required to be determined in order to justify the dismissal of the plaintiff's suit. As regards the terms of the award it is assumed that the plaintiff would be bound by the provision forbidding him to seek for separate possession by partition, unless he could get rid of the award on the ground that his signature on the agreement of reference to arbitration had been obtained by undue influence. It is found that the plaintiff had become aware of the existence of the award and of its terms, if not from the date of the execution of that document, then at any rate before the 7th of March 1912, a date more than three years anterior to the institution of the suit. From this the learned Subordinate Judge goes on to hold that the claim to have the award declared invalid, either on the ground of undue influence or on that of misconduct on the part of the arbitrators, is time-barred under Article 91 of the First Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act. Incidentally he has also found that the award had been acted upon and that the plaintiff had received money under it. The trial Court has nevertheless proceeded to determine the question whether the plaintiff's consent to the agreement of reference to arbitration had been obtained by undue influence; it finds in the negative.

The memorandum of appeal to this Court challenges the decision of the Court below on each point. It seems most convenient to reserve the questions of law raised, or sought to be raised, and to deal first of all with the plaintiff's attack on the validity of the award on the ground of undue influence brought to bear upon him, or of misconduct on the part of the arbitrators. The allegations of misconduct against the arbitrators are vague and flimsy; the trial Court has recorded no clear finding on the issue specifically raised on this point. In the memorandum of appeal before us the plea appears in the form that the award should be held to be vitiated by "partiality on the part of the arbitrators." This really amounts to saying that the arbitrators have decided the questions referred to them in a manner unfavourable to the plaintiff and favourable to his brothers, the sort of plea which might be taken by any person who had submitted a dispute to arbitration and was dissatisfied with the result. If it is intended to suggest that, apart from the terms of the award, it is proved that the arbitrators displayed undue bias or partiality, it seems almost sufficient to remark that there is really nothing in the evidence which can be used to support such a plea.

[The judgment then discusses the circumstances relied on to support the plea of undue influence and proceeds:—]

We agree, therefore, with the trial Court in holding that the agreement of reference to arbitration is not void, or unenforceable, or liable to be set aside on the ground that the plaintiff's signature to the same was obtained by undue influence. Nor has any adequate case been made out against the award on the ground of misconduct on the part of the arbitrators.

The question whether any attack upon the award on either of the above grounds would not have been barred by limitation on the date on which this suit was instituted is a mixed question of fact and of law. The learned Subordinate Judge is probably right both as to the facts and as to the law; but it is not necessary for us to record a finding, the attack on the award having failed on the merits.

There remains the question whether the award is or is not on the face of it a nullity, either as going beyond the terms of the reference, or as embodying conditions which it was not legally in the power of the arbitrators to impose. In argument on behalf of the defendants-respondents it was strenuously sought to support the document as a whole. We were taken back to the defendants' original plea that the parties were, on the date of the agreement of reference members of a joint undivided Hindu family. The contention is that Rup Singh was then claiming a partition in the sense that he was threatening to enforce his right to separate; he was, however, willing to refer to arbitration the question whether there should be a partition, or whether (in the alternative) the arbitrators should make some arrangement for the management of the joint family property which should at the same time provide for the discharge of existing debts for which all the members of the family were liable, protect the property from waste or mismanagement, and secure to Rup Singh the enjoyment of a reasonable income out of the joint family funds. We were asked by the respondents to treat the award as a fair and equitable attempt on the part of the arbitrators to carry into effect the latter of the two alternatives.

The difficulties in the way of the full acceptance of this contention are considerable.

There is force in the argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellant, to the effect that the kernel of the dispute between Rup Singh and his brothers is to be found in the fact that Rup Singh has no male issue, but has daughters and daughter's sons: his separation from his brothers involves a change in the devolution of his share in the joint family property after his death. The award itself frankly recognizes the importance of this consideration, though it is fair to add that the arbitrators evidently accepted the contention of the other two brothers that Rup Singh is a poor man of business and not likely to prove an efficient manager of any property over which he obtains complete control. The object of the award is to prevent him from obtaining such control; but at the same time the arbitrators seem to have attempted to re-create, by means of their award, all the incidents of a status of jointness as between Rup Singh and his brothers. The appellant seems to be on strong ground when he contends that this is more than the arbitrators had power to do. Presumably Rup Singh and his brothers could have come to a binding agreement to remain joint at the time when the integrity of the joint family was broken up by Hukam Singh's separation, or could have agreed to re-unite after the event; but such an agreement would require to be evidenced by a document absolutely clear and unambiguous in its terms. On the whole, it does not seem to us possible to treat this agreement of reference and the award which followed thereupon as having this effect. The question which we have to determine, however, is a much narrower one. For the purposes of this suit the point for determination is simply whether Rup Singh personally is bound by the provisions of the award not to claim, during his lifetime, separate possession, by means of a partition by metes and bounds, over any of the property of which he himself and the defendants to this suit are joint owners, in the sense that they possess the same as "tenants-in-common" within the meaning of that phrase in English Law. In order to determine this question it does not seem necessary to cite the somewhat voluminous case law referred to before us during the argument. Mr. Justice Trevelyan in his book on Hindu Law has correctly summed up the general effect of the decided cases, when he says that except in the Bombay High Court the authorities generally are agreed that members of a joint undivided Hindu family can bind themselves for their own lifetime not to claim their right to partition. But the point to be noticed here is that all the arguments in support of this proposition apply a fortiori to the case of members of such a family after the integrity of the joint family has been broken up by the ascertainment of shares, after (in fact) the parties have become 'tenants-in-common" of the property concerned. Indeed it may be doubted whether the Bombay decisions relied upon by the appellant have any application to such a state of facts. The point to be emphasized is that the appellant cannot have it both ways: he is either a member of a joint undivided Hindu family with the respondents, or he is not. It is the case for the respondents, and not the case for the appellant, that Rup Singh, Bhabhuti Singh and Ratan Singh were still members of a joint family when the agreement of reference to arbitration was entered into. If we had accepted the case of the defendants on this point, other considerations would have arisen. We are now dealing with the case set up by Rup Singh himself that the jointness of the family had been definitely broken up when Hukam Singh separated. To take the simplest possible case, suppose two brothers, who have ceased to be joint, to remain owners in equal shares of a certain dwelling house. Can it seriously be contended that one brother would not be bound, for his own lifetime at any rate, by an agreement that he would, in return for good consideration, leave the other brother in sole possession and enjoyment of the house and refrain from claiming a partition by metes and bounds and the separate possession of his own share? But what is true of a single item of property must be true of all property owned by the brothers in equal shares, and whatever could be effected by a lawful agreement for consideration can equally be effected by a reference to arbitration followed by an award. The main difference is that in the case of an award the question of consideration does not arise: the settlement of a pending dispute and the avoidance of litigation are themselves good consideration for an agreement of reference to arbitration.

In our opinion, therefore, the Court below has rightly held that Rup Singh personally for his own lifetime is bound by the directions in the award forbidding him to claim a partition by metes and bounds or separate possession over his own share.

We accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

Where a decree-holder files a certificate from the Deputy Commissioner under section 28 of the Punjab

Miscellaneous second appeal from the order of the District Judge, Amritsar, dated the 2nd May 1917.

Mr. Sham Das, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Tek Chand and Duni Chand, for the Respondant.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal from the order of the District Judge, Amritsar, dated the 7th May 1917, by which he dismissed an appeal from the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Amritsar, dated the 16th August 1916, which was passed in the course of execution proceedings relating to a decree obtained by the respondent, Balla Mal, against appellant No. 2, Sardar Balwant Singh. As pointed out by the District Judge, the facts of the case are very similar to those of the case dealt with in my judgment in Civil Appeal No. 3158 of 1916, [Balwant Singh v. Mahindar Singh (1)] the only difference being that whereas in the last mentioned case a certificate from the Deputy Commissioner to the effect specified in sub-section (2) of section 31 of the Court of Wards Act had been filed by the decree-holder with the application for execution, in the present case such certificate had been previously filed in connection with another application for execution which was dismissed, on account of certain formal defects on the 20th of April 1916.

The contention of the appellant's Pleader before me is that under sub-section (3) of section 31 of the Act each fresh application for execution must be accompanied by a fresh certificate from the Deputy Commissioner as required by sub section (2), and that the fact that the requisite certificate had been filed on a previous occasion with another application for execution, does not cure this defect. This argument is in no way supported by the language of the sub-section relied upon, according to which the filing of a certificate to the effect specified in sub-section (2) is a condition precedent to the executing Court issuing any attachment or other process in execution of the decree. That condition is satisfied once the requisite certificate is filed by the decree-holder with an application for execution or in the course of proceedings relating thereto; and in my opinion the executing Court has every power to take action upon a subsequent application for execution without a fresh certificate from the Deputy Commissioner being filed by the decree-holder. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

KHARDAH COMPANY, LD.—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

DURGA CHARAN CHANDRA—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. II, r. 2—Cause of action—Plaintiff entitled to two reliefs—Omission to sue for one relief, effect of.

Plaintiff instituted a suit against the defendant company claiming damages for the demolition of a house standing on land which, he alleged, belonged to himself and the company jointly: he also alleged that he had been dispossessed from his share in the property by the company who had appropriated the materials. He obtained a decree. During the pendency of the suit on appeal, he brought the present suit for a declaration of his title to his share in the land and for partition of that share by metes and bounds:

Held, that as the cause of action in both the suits was the same, the present suit was barred by Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code. [p. 638, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Alipore, dated the 5th February 1917.

Sir B. C. Mitter (with him Babu Ambicapada Chowdhury), for the Appellants.

Babu Sarat Chandra Roy Chaudhuri (with him Babu Dwarkanath Chakravarti and Babu Kali Kinkar Chakrawarti), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The property in dispute in this appeal is eight bighas of land at Khardah. The plaintiff Durga Charan Chandra, sues for a declaration of his title to a 19/80ths share of the land and for partition of that share by metes and bounds. The Subordinate Judge has given him a decree, and the Khardah Company, Limited, the defendants, have appealed.

The facts of the case which are not in dispute are as follows: The property originally belonged to one Asutosh Roy Chowdhuri, who left it by Will to his mother Sivakali absolutely, appointing her sole executrix. Sivakali obtained Probate of the Will in due course. On 10th September 1906, Sivakali made a gift of 19/40ths of the property in equal moieties to Ram Chandra Banerjee and Khetra Mohan Banerjee. On 10th December 1907, Ram Chandra purported to sell his 19/80ths to one Bepin Behari Haldar for Rs. 1,000 (Exhibit 3). The plaintiff's case is that Bepin Behari Haldar was his benamidar and that this was really a sale to him. On 25th December 1907, Ram Chandra, who had been ill and bedridden for some months, died. On 13th March 1908, Sivakali sold the 21/40ths remaining in her to the defendant company for Rs. 6,300. On 10th April 1908, Bepin Behari Haldar executed a release of the 19/80ths conveyed to him by Exhibit 3 in favour of the plaintiff. On 24th April 1908, Khetra Mohan Banerjee conveyed his 19/80ths to the defendant company for Rs. 3,000. On 22nd September 1908, the four sons of Ram Chandra Banerjee purported to sell to the defendant company for Rs. 2,000 the 19/80ths share which had belonged to their father, and which was the subject of the conveyance Exhibit 3. In October 1908, the defendant company, having entered into possession of the land, demolished the house standing thereon. On 4th November 1908, the plaintiff, Durga Charan Chandra, filed a suit (No. 1287 of 1908) in the 1st Court of the Munsif at Sealdah valuing the house at Rs. 8,000 and claiming Rs. 1,900 (i. e., 19/80ths of the value) from the defendant company as damages for demolition of the house and appropriation of the materials. On 21st November 1910, the Munsif gave the plaintiff a decree for Rs. 712-8 0 with proportionate costs. On appeal to the District Judge, that decision was reversed and the plaintiff's suit dismissed on the ground that the sale by Ram Chandra of the 19/80ths was a benami transaction without consideration, and that the plaintiff had, therefore, no interest in the property. A second appeal to this Court was heard by a single Judge (Coxe, J.), who upheld the decision of the lower Appellate Court. The plaintiff filed an appeal under the Letters Patent, which was heard by Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., and N. R. Chatterjea, J. They set aside the decree of Coxe, J., and sent back the appeal for re-hearing by the District Judge. The then District Judge after admitting some further evidence upheld the decision of the Munsif, and against that a second appeal (No. 512 of 1916) has been filed, with which we will presently deal.* On 8th December 1914, while the Letters Patent appeal was pending, the present suit was filed. Two points arise for determination in this appeal: (i) whether the present suit is barred by the provisions of Order II, rule 2 of the Civil Procedure Code, and (ii) whether the purchase of 10th December 1907 in the name of Bepin Behari Haldar was a bona fide transfer in favour of the plaintiff or a mere benami and sham transaction. On the point of law the question is whether the plaintiff has not split up his cause of action, and having omitted without the leave of the Court to sue in the first suit for one of his remedies, is not now debarred from doing so. The suit for damages having been filed before 1st January 1909, the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 apply. In section 44 the words now to be found in Order II, rule 4 (e), do not occur. But if the cause of action is the same, this is of no importance: see Giyana Sambandha Pandara Sannadhi v. Kandasami Tambiran(1) and Ganesh Dutt Thakoor v. Jewach Thakoorain(2). The expression "cause of action" has been defined by different Judges in slightly varying terms. In Jibunti Nath Khan v. Shib Nath Chuckerbutty (3) White, J., said: "In deciding the question whether this suit is barred by the former suit, we must see if the cause of action is the same in both suits. A cause of action consists of the circumstances and facts, which are alleged by the plaintiff to exist, and which, if proved, will entitle him to the relief or to some part of the relief prayed for, and is to be sought for within the four corners of the plaint." Adopting this definition we have only to compare paragraphs 7, 9 and 11 of the present plaint with paragraphs 5, 6, 8 and 9 of the plaint in the former suit, to see that the cause of action in both suits is one and the same, and that it arose and was complete in October 1908. The present claim, therefore, could and ought to have been preferred along with the claim for damages in the former suit. The learned Subordinate Judge in deciding this issue has contented himself with saying that the cause of action in the two suits is not the same. He appears to have confused the cause of action with the relief claimed, an error against which Lord Watson uttered a warning in Ohand Kour v. Partab Singh (4). The cause of action (he said) does not depend upon the character of the relief prayed for by the plaintiff. It refers entirely to the grounds set forth in the plaint as the cause of action, or, in other words, to the media upon which the plaintiff asks the Court to arrive at a conclusion in his favour." We hold that the cause of action in the present suit being the same as that in the former suit, plaintiff is by Order II, rule 2, precluded from suing for the relief which he now claims.

In this view of the law, it is really unnecessary to go into the facts of the case, but as we are not prepared to agree with the learned Subordinate Judge in his view of the facts, it may be well to state shortly the reasons which have led us to this conclusion.

[Their Lordships eventually held that the alleged sale to the plaintiff on the 10th December 1907 was a sham transaction, and accordingly allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit with costs in both Courts—Ed.]

Punjab Alienation of Land Act (XIII of 1900), ss. 2 (3), 16—Trees standing on agricultural land, whether land—Execution of decree—Trees, whether can be attached.

Trees belonging to a member of an agricultural tribe and situated on agricultural land are included in the definition of "land" in the Punjab Alienation of Land Act and are, therefore, not liable to sale in execution of a decree against an agriculturist. [p. 639, col 1.]

Revision from the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Hoshiarpur, dated the 26th August 1918.

Mr. Nizr Muhammad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Faqir Chand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the decree-holder has, in execution of his decree, applied successfully to the lower Courts for the sale of a share in a grove of mango trees belonging to a member of an agricultural tribe and situated on agricultural land. The lower Appellate Court has held that such trees cannot come under the definition of land and are liable to attachment and sale. Against this decision a second appeal has been preferred.

I have recently decided a similar case in Civil Revision No. 775 of 1918 [Rulia Ram v. Sultan Khan (1)] and in that I have held that the definition of "land" in the Punjab Alienation of Land Act includes the trees standing thereon. The arguments of Counsel in the present case in no way make me in any way doubtful of the correctness of the decision referred to. The only contention to which I need refer specifically is that it is urged that in other sections of the Alienation of Land Act the word "land" obviously does not include trees. For instance, under section 3 there are wide restrictions placed on the sale of land by a member of an agricultural tribe to a non agriculturist, and it is contended that the word "land" as used in that section cannot possibly include trees and that their sale is always competent without the sanction of the Collector. This argument is undoubtedly a plausible one, but I do not think it has any real bearing on the case. It is true that members of agricultural tribes commonly sell timber without the sanction of the Collector. It is possible also that sales may take place of standing trees with the intention that the purchaser shall continue to reap the fruit therefrom. It is by no means clear, however, that such sales are permitted by the Act. For instance, dates are just as much the produce of the land as wheat and under section 15 no alienation of the produce of the land is lawful for more than one year. I do not consider, therefore, that the Legislature intended to give permission to members of agricultural tribes to sell trees, except as timber apart from the land. It could not have been intended that a member of an agricultural tribe owning a thickly planted grove of mango trees could sell the trees to a non-agriculturist with a view to the purchaser enjoying the permanent benefit of the fruit. In such cases the land itself is of no value, as no crops can be grown and a sale of the permanent rights of the trees would be for all practical purposes a sale of the land, and in my opinion such a sale would be prohibited not only by section 15 but also by section 3.

I, therefore, find no reason to differ from my previous decision and accepting the application for revision, set aside the order for the sale of the trees. I give applicant his costs of these proceedings in all Courts.

Revision accepted.

After the death of a Hindu his uncles deposited a sum of money with a Nattukottai Chetty firm, with instructions to pay to the widow a certain sum every year for her maintenance, and she never claimed to be entitled to any more. On her death the next reversioner of the deceased husband brought a suit to recover the amount of the deposit together with interest thereon as forming part of the estate of the deceased:

Held, that the suit must succeed, as owing to the widow not having claimed the interest on the deposit she must be deemed to have acquiesced in the interest being treated as part of, and as incorporated with, her husband's estate. [p. 640, col. 1.]

The period of limitation prescribed by Article 60 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act applies to a suit to recover a deposit with interest thereon, which interest by agreement of the parties is not to be payable until demanded but is to be added to the deposit as an increment thereto. [p. 640, col 2.]

A "Thavanai" deposit with a Nattukottai Chetty firm means that the understanding between the parties is that at the end of each Thavanai period the interest for that period, instead of being payable in cash to the creditors, should be added to the deposit so that both should be treated as fresh deposits. JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, C. J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Sivaganga in a suit brought by the next reversioner of the deceased Raman Chetty, to recover from the defendants, who are members of a Nattukottai Chetty trading family, a certain sum which they alleged to have been deposited after Raman Chetty's death by Raman Chetty's uncles as forming part of the estate. The Subordinate Judge has decreed the suit in part.

The first point taken by Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer for the defendants is that although the plaintiff as reversioner may be entitled to recover the principal, he is not entitled to recover the interest which accrued due during the lifetime of the widow, as that formed part of her estate and was descendible to her heirs in the absence of any intention having been manifested on her part to incorporate it with the estate of her deceased husband. The evidence is that after her husband's death his uncles deposited the money with another firm of Nattukottai Chetties, who closed their business, and that the deposit with them was transferred to the defendants' firm, and the evidence is that they were instructed to pay Rs. 50 a year to the widow for her maintenance, which sum she admittedly received. Now there is no evidence that she ever claimed to be entitled to any more; whether it was so or not, the evidence shows that the intention of the uncles was that the whole sum should go to her son if she adopted one, which she never did. In these circumstances, the inference appears clear that the widow rightly or wrongly acquiesced in the interest on this sum being treated as part of her husband's estate and as incorporated with her husband's estate descendible to his heirs. She never even claimed to receive it. The case, therefore, is clearly distinguishable from the cases to which we have been referred, Subramanian Chetti v. Arunachelam Chetti (1), Isri Dutt Koer v. Hansbutti Koerain (2), Saodamini Dasi v. Administrator-General of Bengal (3), Viraraghava Reddi v. Kota Reddi (4) and Veekrama Deo Garu v. Vikrama Deo Maharajulu Garu (5), which were cases in which the income from the husband's estate had come into the possession of the widow and she had disposed of it in one way or other. In Isri Dutt Koer v. Hansbutti Koerain (2) she manifested her intention that it should be incorporated with the husband's estate and it was held that she could not go back on this. In the other cases it was held that she had manifested her intention to treat it as her own separate property descendible to her own heirs. In the view we take of this case, it was unnecessary to consider what would be the rule applicable if the evidence merely were that the widow had failed to collect the interest on money forming part of her husband's estate. On the one hand, there is a dictum of the Privy Council in Isri Dutt Koer v. Hansbutti Koerain (2) which might be relied on. On the other hand, there is the elaborate discussion of Sir Subrahamania Iyer, J., in Subramanian Chetti v. Arunachelam Chetti (1) which treats the statement of the Privy Council as a mere obiter dictum but is also itself obiter. For the purpose of the present case, it is enough to say that the widow clearly acquiesced in the interest being treated as part of her husband's estate.

The next question is one of limitation. This Court in recent years on several occasions had to consider what was the nature of the deposits with Nattukottai Chetties on what are called Thavanais, and in a case in Muthiah Chettiar v. Ramanatham Chettiar (6) this Court held that such cases were governed by Article 60 both as to principal and interest. In the present case Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer has taken the point that so far as interest is concerned, these transactions are governed by Article 63—"for money payable for interest upon money due from the defendant to the plaintiff." It is said in Muthiah Chettiar v. Ramanatham Chettiar (6) with reference to Thavanai transactions that "the idea is that the money should remain until demanded and the interest should be added at the expiration of each Thavanai." As I understand it, that means that the understanding between the parties is that, at the end of each Thavanai period, the interest for that period instead of being payable in cash to the creditor should be added to the deposit so that both should be treated as a fresh deposit; and if that be so, then the article applicable continues to be only Article 60 and not Article 63 which is "for money payable for interest," and the starting point under that article is when the interest becomes due. As I understand it that means when the interest becomes actually payable. If the agreement between the parties is that the interest is not to be payable until demanded but it is to be added to the deposit as an increment to the deposit, then I think that Article 63 does not apply and Article 60 does. That is the view which has hitherto been taken in this Court and this is the first time that any one has suggested that Article 63 would be applisable. I think that very serious consequences would result if that article were held applicable, because very large amounts of money have been deposited with Nattukottai Chetties on these terms and nobody has ever thought that it was necessary to make constant demands upon them.

Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer also argued that it was not within the competence of the managers of the joint Hindu Nattukottai Chetty trading families to accept money on deposit on Thavanai terms, that it is not competent for them to do one of the most ordinary things in the transaction of their business. The position isquite untenable.

For these reasons I think that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Defendants shipped certain bales of jute, before the outbreak of the war between Great Britain and Germany, to two firms in London: the goods were carried in ships and were destined to ports which, after the outbreak of the war, became enemy ships and enemy ports. Against these goods defendants drew 20 bills of exchange to the order of themselves upon the London firms The defendants indorsed the bills to the plaintiff bank, who discounted them in Calcutta and together with the shipping documents transmitted them to their London office. One bill reached London on the 4th August 1914 and was presented to the drawee on the 7th, who refused acceptance and the bill was returned to the plaintiff bank on the 20th August, who gave notice of dishonour on the 2 st to the defendants. The remaining 19 bills arrived in London on the 14th August, they were presented for acceptance the same day, but were returned dishonoured on the 18th August. On the 29th October 1914 all the bills were presented to the defendants for payment, and payment having been refused, the present suit was brought to recover on the dishonoured bills. The trial Court decreed the claim and the defendants appealed:

Held, that the bills were foreign instruments, and as they were made payable in a different place from that in which they were made and endorsed, under section 135 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the Law of England determined what constituted dishonour and what notice of dishonour was sufficient; that having regard to the outbreak of war and the King's Proclamation against trading with the enemy, and having regard to the nature of the contracts, the drawees were under no obligation to the drawers t accept the bills. [p. 643, col. 2; p. 644, col. 1; p. 647, col. 2]

Under section 50 (2), clause iv of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, where there is no obligation on the drawee to accept a bill, notice of dishonour is unnecessary, and as under section 42 of that Act the giving of notice of dishonour is an important part of the "treatment" referred to in that section, where such notice of dishonour becomes unnecessary the mere fact that bills are left with the drawee more than the customary time, is no bar to a suit by an indorsee from recovering on the bills. ### JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Chaudhuri, J., by which he gave judgment for the plaintiffs in respect of the amount of certain bills of exchange and interest.

The plaintiff Bank is a company incorporated under the English Companies Acts and has a branch office in Calcutta and the defendants carry on business in Calcutta.

The bills sued on were 20 in number, 19 were drawn by the defendants to the order of themselves upon Messrs W. F. Malcolm & Co., London, and were payable three months after sight, and one bill was drawn by the defendants to the order of themselves upon Messrs. C. J. Hambro & Son, London, six months after sight. The bills were drawn against bales of jute which were shipped before the outbreak of war, but the goods were carried in ships and were destined to ports, which, it was assumed on the hearing of the appeal, became after the the outbreak of war on the 4th August 1914 enemy ships and enemy ports and the goods were covered by German policies.

The defendants endorsed the bills to the plaintiffs, who discounted the bills in Calcutta and received the shipping documents, which together with the bills were in due course transmitted by them to their office in London.

The bills were drawn by the defendants upon Malcolm & Co. in pursuance of a contract whereby according to the evidence of Mr. Morley, the defendants were under a liability to insure against war risks.

As regards the bill drawn upon Messrs. Hambro & Son the position is not clear. There appears to have been a letter of credit from the Boehmische Bank, Prague, in favour of Malcolm & Co. in London for a sum of £2,970 on six months' sight for the account of Mr. Joseph Etrick of Jaromer (see Mr. Bagster's evidence, page 53): there was no other letter of credit except this which would entitle the defendants to draw on Hambro & Son, and inasmuch as the letter was in favour of Malcolm & Co., and not in favour of Hambro & Son, there is nothing in the evidence to show that Hambro & Son were under any obligation to accept or pay the bill.

On the 1st August 1914, i. e., before the outbreak of war, the plaintiffs in Calcutta wrote to the defendants and asked for confirmation that the goods had been fully covered against war risk. The defendants sent no answer, and it was only in reply to a further letter of the 5th August 1914 that the defendants wrote on the 5th:—

"From

Sukh Lall Chandanmull.

To

The Eastern Bank, Ld.

5th August 1914.

Dear Sirs,

When our cargo was shipped there was no talk of war, so we have not taken out any war risk, and now the insurance agents refuse to take any war risk on Western ports. We expect only a very small quantity of drafts remain unaccepted. Possibly in the ss. "Westmark" which steamer is likely to be detained this side of the canal As regards C. and F. sales, we can give you no information, but think all drafts have been accepted.

Yours faithfully,

Sukh Lall Chandanmull."

It was not therein alleged that the insurance could not have been effected if steps had been taken on or about the 1st August 1914. In this connection it is material to refer to the letter of defendants' Solicitors of the 27th August 1914, in which they write: "with reference to our senior's interview with you on the 25th instant, the drafts would appear to have been refused acceptance as the consignments were not covered by war risk. We have now before us the contracts under which these goods were shipped, and as they are C. I. F. contracts the consignee was presumably justified in refusing acceptance under the circumstances." So that it was apparently admitted that in respect of all the bills the consignees were justified in refusing acceptance on the ground that the goods were not covered by war risk. The bill drawn on Hambro & Son arrived in London on the 4th August 1914. That day and the 5th and 6th were Bank holidays and the bill was presented by the plaintiffs for acceptance on the 7th, and, according to Mr. Bagster's evidence, perhaps on the 7th but at all events on the 8th, it had been noted by Hambro & Son that acceptance was refused. It was not, however, returned to the plaintiffs until the 20th August. It was noted on the 21st and notice of dishonour was given to the defendants on the 21st August 1914.

The bills drawn on Malcolm & Co. arrived in London on the 14th August. They were presented by the plaintiffs for acceptance on the same day and they were returned to the plaintiffs dishonoured on the 18th August. They were noted on that day, and notice of dishonour was given to the defendants on the 21st August.

Meanwhile, on the 12th August 1914 there was an interview in Calcutta between Mr. Jones and Mr. Andrews, representing the Bank, and Sukhlall, at which Mr. Jones asked if Sukhlall had covered the war risk. He said he had not, but that the bills would be accepted by his friends in London, and if not he would remit the money to secure acceptance.

No such remittance, however, was made and on the 14th August 1914 the plaintiffs wrote as follows:—

"Exhibit A.—(contd.)

'Eastertide.'

14th August, 1914.

Messrs. Sukhlall Chandanmull, Calcutta.

Dear Sirs,

War risk on goods shipped by German and Austrian steamers relative to bills negotiated by us per mails of 16th and 23rd July 1914.

With reference to our conversation of the 12th instant, since you have not covered the above shipments against war risk as requested in our letters of 1st and 5th instant, we shall be glad if you will repay us the amount of the bills. We may say that our other clients at our request have taken the precaution of covering their shipments en route against war risk and we, therefore, feel we have no option but to ask you to repay us the amount of the bills in question. A detailed statement is enclosed.

Yours faithfully,
Manager."

To this no reply was forthcoming. All the bills were protested on the 25th September 1914 and on the 29th October 1914 the bills were presented to the defendants for payment together with full sets of documents: which documents obviously included the bills of lading and invoices, as appears from the letter of plaintiffs' Solicitors of 6th February 1915. Payment of the bills has not been made.

The first point which was relied upon by the appellants was that the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, applied to this case, and that as the plaintiffs had allowed the drawees more than 24 hours, exclusive of public holidays, to consider whether they would accept the bills, the appellants were discharged from liability to the plaintiffs in respect thereof under the provisions of section 83. On the other hand, it was contended for the plaintiffs that the bills were foreign bills and were made payable in London and that by reason of section 135 of the Negotiable Instruments Act the law of England determines what constitutes dishonour and what notice of dishonour is sufficient, and, further, that there was a custom in London by which in the case of such bills as those in question, known as "jute bills," a longer time than the customary 24 hours was allowed for acceptance. Apparently no definite time was alleged, but it was stated that "jute bills" were in some cases allowed to remain for acceptance from 2 to 7 days, or, in exceptional cases, even more. The bills were drawn and endorsed in Calcutta: the drawees' address is given in the bills as London: they were consequently foreign instruments and they were, in my judgment, made payable in a different place from that in which they were made and endorsed. Section 135 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, therefore, applies, and the law of England determines what constitutes dishonour and what notice of dishonour is sufficient.

As to the alleged custom, it is to be noted that no such custom or trade usage was pleaded; but in view of the 3rd issue raised by the plaintiffs at the trial, this matter was investigated and the learned Judge decided in the plaintiffs' favour on this point.

In my judgment, in the first place, the alleged practice is too indefinite and uncertain to be accepted as a custom or trade usage, and in the second place, the evidence is by no means sufficient to establish it: and, therefore, even if the law of England as to dishonour and notice of dishonour is to be considered as applicable to this case, the customary period of 24 hours would apply. As to the conditions prevailing in England immediately after the outbreak of war, the evidence of Mr. Martin Holland shows that there was no custom in the sense of established practice during that time. In the case of all the bills the abovementioned customary period was greatly exceeded, and if the matter rested there, this would afford an answer to the plaintiffs' claim, inasmuch as the claim is based upon the bills of exchange only, and no claim has been included for money had and received by or for money paid to the defendants.

The matter, however, does not rest there, for an issue was raised at the trial as to whether the drawees of the bills in suit, or of any of them, were under any liability to accept them.

As already mentioned, the defendants' Solicitors in the letter of the 27th August 1914 appear to have assumed that the drawees were justified in refusing acceptance, the contracts being C. I. F. contracts by reason of the goods not being covered against war risks.

There remains the further question, whether, having regard to the outbreak of war and the King's Proclamation against trading with the enemy, and having regard to the nature of the contracts in question, the drawees were under any obligation to the drawers to accept the bills.

The facts as to the position of the ships and their destination at the outbreak of war were not clearly proved, nor was it proved what happened to the ships and goods thereafter; but it was assumed for the purpose of the argument in this Court that after the outbreak of war the goods were in enemy ships and destined for enemy ports.

It was conceded by Sir B. C. Mitter, for the appellants, that the drawees could not receive the goods or the documents of title to the goods by reason of the outbreak of war, and I think this must be so, for, apart from the question as to the contract of affreightment being dissolved or determind by the outbreak of war, the goods being in enemy ships and destined for enemy ports, a dealing in such goods would have involved a trading with the enemy, and consequently the further performance of the contract became impossible.

The learned Counsel, however, argued that it would not have been illegal for the drawees to have accepted the bills.

In my judgment any further step in the performance of the contract was rendered impossible by the outbreak of war, and further it might also be said that acceptance of the bills by the drawees, under the circumstances of this case, would have amounted to a trading in goods destined for enemy ports and would come within the meaning of the prohibition of the Proclamation, for the acceptance would in effect have been an undertaking to pay for the goods destined to enemy ports. The drawees, therefore, were under no obligation to the appellants, the drawers, to accept the bills.

It was contended, however, on behalf of the appellants that section 42 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, applies to this case, and that inasmuch as the bills were not accepted within the customary time, viz., 24 hours, the plaintiffs were bound to treat the bills as dishonoured by non-acceptance; that the plaintiffs did not treat the bills as dishonoured and that they consequently lost their right of recourse against the appellants who were the drawers of the bills. By section 50 (2) clause (ii) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, notice of dishonour is dispensed with as regards the drawer where the drawee is, as between himself and the drawer, under no obligation to accept the bill. Consequently in this case the further performance of the contract having become impossible and there being no obligation on the drawees to accept, the plaintiffs were not bound to give notice of dishonour.

But it was contended on behalf of the appellants that even if the drawees were under no obligation to accept the bills and if the plaintiffs were not obliged to give notice of dishonour, still the plaintiffs were debarred from recovering on the bills, inasmuch as, by leaving the bills with the drawees for more than the customary time of 24 hours, they had not treated them as dishonoured and had thus lost their right of recourse against the appellants.

In my judgment, if we were to adopt this argument, it would be to put an unreasonable construction on the section: the giving of notice of dishonour is an important part of the "treatment" referred to in section 42, and in the circumstances of this case, where such notice of dishonour became unnecessary, the mere fact that the bills were left with drawees more than the customary time cannot debar the plaintiffs from recovering on the bills. The section, in my judgment, assumes that the bill is capable of being accepted or dishonoured by the drawees and does not cover the bills in this case.

For these reasons, the plaintiffs were, in my judgment, entitled to succeed in their claim on the bills, subject to the question next to be considered.

It was urged on behalf of the appellants that the plaintiffs could not recover on the bills without returning the goods which had not been dealt with by the plaintiffs or the documents of title to the goods and without rendering an account of the goods which had been dealt with by the plaintiffs.

As regards the first of these points, the documents of title to the goods were tendered to the appellants when the bills were presented to them for payment. Payment was then refused, and consequently the documents of title remained with the plaintiffs. In my judgment, it is not open to the appellants now to rely on the fact that the plaintiffs had not returned the goods or the documents of title, as a defence to the suit.

As regards the question of the account, it appears that the dealings with the goods by the plaintiffs were in accordance with the letter of the 8th February 1915 and other correspondence between the respective Solicitors since the institution of the suit, and the Advocate-General, during the course of the hearing of the appeal, offered on behalf of the plaintiffs to render an account of the goods dealt with by the plaintiffs.

Under these circumstances the rights of the parties must, in my judgment, be dealt with as they existed at the date of the institution of the suit, viz., the 30th November 1914. The bills were presented for payment on the 29th October 1914 together with the full sets of documents; these the appellants then refused to take, and the plaintiffs were only prevented from handing them over at the date of the decree by reason of the arrangements made subsequently to the institution of the suit.

If an account is not rendered, as offered by the Advocate-General, it is not disputed that the appellants would be entitled to obtain such an account by means of a suit.

It was further alleged by the appellants that the plaintiffs had been paid wholly or in part in respect of the bills by reason of the realisation of some of the goods in question.

The learned Judge seems to have thought that the evidence showed that a small portion of the goods had realised £1,691 19-7, as against which the plaintiffs claimed £3,418-14-7 by way of costs and expenses.

With respect to the learned Judge, I think this is a mistake. The account at pages 174 and 175, together with the evidence of Mr. Andrews, shows that the sum of £1,691-19-7 is the net balance after deducting the sum of £3,418-14-7,

With regard to this allegation of payment, the same answer applies to this as to the question of accounts. If this sum of £1,691 19-7 is in the hands of the plaintiffs, it is by reason of the arrangement made after the institution of the suit and already referred to, and it must, if necessary, be the subject of a separate account.

In conclusion, I think it necessary to mention that considerable difficulty was caused to us by matters having been raised in the suit, which were not referred to in the pleadings, and no amendment of the pleadings was made. The parties were asked in this Court whether they wished to apply for a remand for any further evidence or consideration. Both parties, however, declined a remand, and asked for a decision upon the materials which were before this Court.

For the abovementioned reasons, the appeal should, in my judgment, be dismissed with costs.

WOODROFFE, J.—Before the outbreak of the present war the defendant firm drew one bill of exchange on a London firm, Messrs. Hambro & Son, and nineteen bills on the London firm of Messrs. Malcolm & Co. The bills were secured by bills of lading relating to certain jute said to have been sold by the defendant firm to the drawees. The defendant firm discounted the bills with the plaintiff Bank, endorsed the bills and received cash and made over the documents of title covering the goods. By agreement with the latter, the defendant firm was bound to cover the consignments against war risk. The goods were shipped by enemy vessels. Both before and after the outbreak of war the defendants were called upon to insure, but they did not do so. It is said that at one time the defendants could not get a policy, but, however this may be, the answer does not apply to requests made before them on the 1st August. In consequence of the failure of the defendents to do what they had agreed to do, they are now in the position which they find themselves. War broke out. Malcolm & Co. refused to accept on the ground that the goods, in respect of which the bills were given, were not insured. Messrs. Hambro refused to accept because the bill drawn on them was not in order. There is no evidence that they were under any liability to accept. The uncontradicted evidence is, that the defendant firm on the 12th August, when asked whether they had covered war risk, replied that they had not done so, but gave their word to the Bank that the bills would be accepted by their friends in London and, if not, they would remit the money to secure acceptance. This they have not done. The drafts were not accepted and on the 27th August the defendants' Solicitor wrote that the consignees were presumably justified in refusing acceptance as the consignments were not covered by war risk in accordance with the terms of the contract with Messrs. Malcolm & Co. As regards the bill against Messrs. Hambro & Son, it does not appear what the relations between the defendants and that firm were so as to make it incumbent on the latter to accept bills drawn on them. The letter of credit given by the Bohmische Escompte Bank on Hambro & Son in favour of Malcolm & Co. says that insurance will be attended to by the shippers, but nothing is said about war risk. The goods in this case were, however, covered by a German policy and carried in a German vessel. The Hambro bill reached London on the 4th August 1914, the date the was broke out. This and the two following days, the 5th and 6th, were Bank holidays. The bill was presented on the 7th. From the evidence of Mr. Bagster on behalf of Hambro & Son it appears that so far as that firm was concerned, it had refused to accept on the 8th but the bill was left with them and the plaint says that the plaintiffs treated it as dishonoured on the 20th August when the holders got back the bill, which was noted, and of which notice of dishonour was given on the 21st August.

The other bills reached London on the 14th August, were presented on the same day, and were, according to the plaint, returned or taken back dishonoured on the 18th August. It was noted the same day and notice of dishonour was given on the 21st August. All bills were protested on the 25th of the month following. It will be observed that in each case the period of 24 hours is surpassed, in the latter case by three, and in the former case by twelve days.

On the 29th October 1914 the plaintiff Bank wrote to the defendant firm presenting for payment the dishonoured bills and full sets of documents. These were not taken back, nor was the sum claimed paid. At an earlier period the defendants' Solicitor had asked the Bank to take steps to secure the goods over which they had a lien. There have been some dealings with the goods, and the defendant firm alleges that the plaintiff Bank has received full or partial satisfaction of the amount of the bills through such dealings.

The plaint sues upon the dishonoured bills. The written statement pleads that the defendants are discharged because the Bank allowed the drawees more than 24 hours to consider whether they would accept the bills. It further pleads that there was no due notice of dishonour and that by the usage of business in Calcutta, and according to the understanding of the parties, the plaintiff Bank was not entitled to sue for the full amount on the bills but only for the deficiency, if any, after realising the value of the goods, which it was further contended could not be recovered in this suit.

Some difficulty arises owing to the form of the plaint, which does not raise any question as to the liability to accept either by reason of the goods not being covered by insurance, or by reason of the fact that the goods were being carried in enemy vessels destined for enemy ports. It states only a case of presentment, dishonour and notice; and the dishonour being stated to have occurred after 24 hours, it was sought on the evidence to excuse the delay on the ground that business was in confusion on account of the outbreak of war and that more than 24 hours were allowed in respect of this class of jute bills arising from abroad. No custom or usage was, however, pleaded. On the other hand, whilst the written statement alleges a full or partial satisfaction of the bills it does not ask for an account, but that the suit should be dismissed. On the other hand, an issue was raised at the trial by the plaintiffs whether there was any liability to accept the bills, and though the learned Judge does not find as to the liability to accept the bills he holds that the war having broken out before the documents were tendered, the drawees would have been justified in refusing acceptance of goods destined to enemy ports. As both the bills and the goods were connected, this necessarily implies a finding as to the bills also. He has found against the plaintiffs on the question of insurance, but I think erroneously. There is an admitted obligation to insure against war risks as regards the Malcolm bills and goods, and if after the outbreak of war there was a difficulty in getting such insurance, the defendant firm were asked to insure in terms of their agreement before that. He has, I think, rightly decided against the contention raised in issues Nos. 5, 6 and 7. The defendants have given no evidence in support of the case raised in paragraph 6 of the written statement. The provision in the general deed of hypothecation was meant to meet such objection. On the other hand, the defendants were permitted to raise issue No. 8, "whether the defendant was entitled to credit for the amount realised by sale of the goods." It has been contended before us by learned Counsel for the appellants that the plaintiffs should not have been allowed on their pleading to enter into the question of liability to accept. However this may be, it is too late to take such an objection. No such objection was taken at the trial. If it had been, and if it had been sustained, the plaintiffs might have asked to amend. Further, the question of insurance and carriage in enemy vessels was known to the parties, was alluded to in the evidence, and the defendants' Solicitor's letter before action admitted that non-insurance justified non-acceptance by the consignees. On the other hand, no objection was taken to the raising of issue No. 8 by the plaintiffs who, however, contended that they were entitled to a decree on the bills without bringing in the goods. This may be; but nevertheless in a suit on the bills the defendants might plead that the plaintiffs had been paid, in whole or in part, the value of the bills by sale of the goods securing them, of which they are mortgagees in possession and against whom there might be an account. In my opinion, both parties are, having regard to the issues, entitled to raise their respective contentions abovementioned. Whether the defendants are entitled to the relief asked is discussed later.

The question then is, were the defendants discharged from liability on the bills by reason of the delay and grounds stated in the written statement and whether, if so, the suit should be dismissed, for it is a suit on the bills only without any alternative claim for the relief on the ground of money paid to the defendants. Secondly in the event of the plaintiffs' claim as endorsees of the note being maintainable, whether the defendants are entitled to the account which they claim as regards dealings with the security for the bills, the subject of the action. Neither party asked for a remand, but a decision on the facts on the record.

The bills were, in my opinion, made payable in London. The rule is that no more than 24 hours should be given to the acceptor to determine whether he will accept a bill, however that 24 hours be calculated. In the present case the delay was much over 24 hours. In this matter we are not concerned with equitable considerations, but with the question what is the law. The period is well established. I am unable to agree with Chaudhuri, J.'s finding and the grounds therefor on this point. No special trade-usage is pleaded or proved. The result is, that the bills were left with the acceptor for such a time as would have discharged the defendants if there were nothing more. But in the present case there is the question of the non-liability of the drawees to accept the bills both by reason of the outbreak of war and the other reasons mentioned. The argument, however, is that section 42 of the Bills of Exchange Act applies to discharge the defendants from all liability on the bills (whatever other cause of action the plaintiffs may have), because the bills were not treated as dishonoured within the customary period of 24 hours, even if there were no obligation to accept them and to give notice of dishonour. To hold this would be, I think, to take a view of this section of the English Act contrary to common sense, seeing that notice of dishonour is part of "treatment" and such notice is not nesessary where there is no liability to accept. Moreover, the effect of the proclamation of war was to render the further performance of the contract evidenced by the bills impossible, and section 42 must presuppose a bill capable of being both accepted and rejected; and the provisions relating to treatment of a bill as dishonoured assume, I think, such a bill. In my opinion, the plaintiff Bank are, under the circumstances, entitled to recover as endorsees against the drawers.

The last question is, whether the defendants are entitled to an account in this suit of the plaintiffs' dealings with the goods. The written statement does not ask for such an account, but, nevertheless, if the application could be supported on other grounds, I would not have considered this omission in the way, for as in the case of the plaintiffs on another point, the omission is remedied by the issues. There are, however, practical difficulties in the way. Thus, though the defendants' Solicitor applied for the Bank's assistance before institution of the suit, the arrangements under which the plaintiff Bank appears to be now dealing with the goods are contained in correspondence passed since the institution of the suit. Nor is it clear that it is possible, on the materials now available, to take such an account, seeing, amongst other things, that no communication is possible with enemy countries, nor is it feasible to get other material information at present. There is the less necessity for a decree directing an account in that the Advocate-General on behalf of the Bank has offered to give it, so far as the information received by the Bank allows it to do so. It is further conceded that if an account is not given, the defendants have their remedy to enforce such an account by suit. Had the decree not been executed, this would, I think, have been a case in which the decree on the bills should be stayed pending an account on the security. But this is not necessary, as the defendants have already paid the Bank the money due on the bills.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree on the bills, and that unless the parties can agree on the question of an account as to the security, that matter should be the subject of a separate suit. On these grounds I hold that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

CIVIL APPEAL No. 323 OF 1918.

December 3, 1919.

Present:—Justice Sir Abdur Rahim, KT., and Justice Sir William Ayling, KT.

T. SUBRAMANIA AIYAR AND OTHERS —DEFENDANTS NOS. 1 TO 3 —APPELLANTS

MESSRS. SHAW WALLACE AND CO., MADRAS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 139—Surety, liability of, when discharged—Taking additional securities, whether absolves surety—Hindu Law—Joint family—Son, liability of, during father's lifetime in respect of obligation incurred by father as surety.

A surety who seeks to be relieved of the obligation imposed upon him as surety and to be absolved from liability must not only show that the creditor has, by his acts or conduct, either prevented the debtor from doing the things which he undertook to do, or has connived at the debtor's omission to do those things, or has enabled him to do something which he ought not to have done, he must also show that the creditor has done some act inconsistent with the rights of the surety, or omitted to do any act which his duty towards the surety required him to do within the meaning of section 139 of the Contract Act. [p. 656, col. 1.]

The taking of additional securities from the surety does not amount to giving time to the debtor, and will not absolve the surety. [p. 655, col. 2.]

A Hindu son is bound to pay a debt contracted by his father as surety provided it was not for an illegal or immoral purpose, and the liability may be enforced against the son in the lifetime of his father. [pp. 658—661.]

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Tanjore, in Original Suit No. 21 of 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Messrs. K. R. Guruswamy Aiyar, T. V. Muthukrishnier and A. Subbarama Aiyar, for the Appellants.—The defendants are not liable as sureties because the plaintiffs, by their conduct, have impaired their remedy against the debtors, Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. The plaintiffs have not acted up to the stipulations in the contract. Even when the contract was entered into, Visvanatha was individually indebted to the plaintiff firm in the sum of Rs. 50,000. This fact was not made known to the defendants. The plaintiffs were grossly negligent in giving Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. further advances, when the original advances had not been accounted for and sufficient stock had not been purchased to cover them. They should have insisted on the production of the cash bills countersigned by the vendors. The weekly certificates were not also regularly sent to the plaintiff firm. When these defaults were made by the debtors, the plaintiffs should have taken possession of the former's stock in time and ensured themselves against further loss. If plaintiffs had acted according to the terms of the agreement, this loss would have been avoided. All these bring the case within the terms of section 139 of the Contract Act. The plaintiffs actually connived at the omissions of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. See Wulf v. Jay (1), Watts v. Shuttleworth (2), Trent Navigation Company v. Harley (3), Kingston-upon-Hull Corporation v. Harding (4).

The plaintiffs took additional securities from their debtors on Visvanatha Aiyar's reversionary right in the estate of the widow, Pattammal. This was without the defendants' consent and amounts to giving time to the debtors, which absolves the sureties' liability.

In any event, the 3rd defendant, who was a minor at the date of the suretyship transaction, is not liable. The obligation was not incurred by his father, the 1st defendant, for any family purpose. The pious obligation of the son to pay his father's debts does not arise so long as the father is alive, for the father may discharge it himself. See the observations of the Privy Council in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (5).

Mr. S. Vardachariar, for the Respondents.—Under the terms of the agreement between the plaintiffs and Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. the former reserved a large discretion to themselves in the matter of advances and they were to be expressly protected for all acts done in good faith.

It is not correct to say that Visvanatha Aiyar was insolvent at date of the agreement. He had assets, and that is the finding of the Sub-Judge. It was no part of the plaintiffs' duty to disclose to defendants the state of accounts between themselves and Visvanatha Aiyar with respect to the latter's individual business.

What money was to be advanced and at what times was left to the discretion of the plaintiffs. There was no reason for them to apprehend that Mr. Visvanatha Aiyar's conduct was improper or that he was going to wrongly utilise the moneys. The cash bills were not sent regularly because Visvanatha Iyer was ill and his relation, Pattamma, died. Though the plaintiffs did not take immediate possession of the tanneries when Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. suspended business for a time, they acted as prudent men without taking that extreme step. They instructed their man to watch the debtor's actions.

There is no proof that the plaintiffs' conduct was negligent or that they ever connived at the action of their debtors so as to bring it under the terms of section 139 of the Contract Act. In the cases cited by the other side the facts were different.

The taking of additional securities does not impair the remedy against the debtors.

As to the 3rd defendant's liability, the pious obligation theory extends to all debts not tainted with illegality or immorality. The case-law on the subject is uniform. See Sami Ayyangar v. Ponnammal (6), Ramasami Nadan v. Ulaganatha Goundan (7), Chidambara Mudaliar v. Koothaperumal (8), Luchmun Dass v. Giridhur Chowdhury (9), Kishun Pershad Chowdhury v. Tipan Pershad Singh (10), Chandradeo Singh v. Mata Prasad (11) and Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun (12).

In Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (5), the Privy Council had only to decide whether the plaintiff was entitled to a mortgage decree. The Privy Council do not lay down that the son could not be sued along with the father for the latter's debt which was neither illegal nor immoral.

JUDGMENT.

ABDUR RAHIM, J.—Messrs. Shaw Wallace and Co., merchants of Madras, sued the defendants-appellants on a surety-bond executed on the 11th February 1911 by the 1st defendant, the father of defendants Nos. 2 and 3, all of them being members of a joint Hindu family. The 1st defendant, who is a Brahmin land-holder of Mayavaram in the District of Tanjore, wanted to do a tanner's business but for social considerations, he liked to keep himself in the back ground and let the business be carried on in the name of a third person. The plaintiff company used, on behalf of the tanners, to ship their goods to England for sale charging them a commission on the sale-proceeds, and in furtherance of such business they advanced moneys to tanners in order that they might buy skins and hides and tan them, on the understanding that those goods should be sold in the London market through the plaintiffs' agency. They charged interest on such advances and in order to secure their repayment, they not only bargained for a lien on the skins which would be bought from time to time by the tanners but also obtained security on immoveable property of the tanners themselves and of other persons as sureties.

The first venture of the 1st defendant, Subramania Aiyar, was in August 1910. That business was carried on in the name of one Harisankar. It turned out to be unsuccessful and was closed in 1911. In connection with that business the plaintiff company have obtained a decree by consent against defendants Nos. 1 to 3 for the moneys advanced by them with interest. The business which has given rise to the present claim was started on 11th February 1911 in the name of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co., the two partners constituting that firm being one Visvanatha Aiyar and the 2nd defendant.

One of the questions raised at the trial was whether the 2nd defendant was not a minor on the 11th February 1911. But it is found by the Subordinate Judge that he was a major and that finding has not been challenged before us. Visvanatha Aiyar was the active partner of that firm and the 2nd defendant, though a major, had no experience in such business and the tannery was carried on, according to the evidence, entirely by Visvanatha Aiyar. Visvanatha Aiyar formally closed that business on 26th May 1911 and the plaintiffs' claim, roughly speaking, is for a sum of Rs. 40,000, which was advanced from time to time to Visvanatha Aiyer and Co. under the agreement Exhibit B, dated 11th February 1911. The surety-bond which is sought to be enforced in this suit (Exhibit B-1) was executed on the same date and as part of the same transaction. Both the agreement with Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. and the surety-bond executed by the 1st defendant refer to each other.

To understand some of the pleas raised in the defence it would be necessary to mention that Visvanatha Aiyar had been carrying on the business of a tanner by himself before the firm of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. was formed. He first began dealing with the plaintiffs in September 1909. So far as it appears from evidence, he obtained advances from them on terms similar to those contained in the agreement of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. At the end of 1910 Visvanatha Aiyar's liability arising out of his individual business, before the formation of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co., amounted to about Rs. 47,000. The position, therefore, when Visvanatha Aiyar and Co., consisting of Visvanatha Aiyar and 2nd defendant, was started in 1911 was this: Harisankar's business in which the 1st defendant was interested had failed and in connection therewith there was a large claim outstanding against the 1st defendant on the guarantee bond which had been executed by him similar to the one sued upon. The evidence shows that the 1st defendant wanted to set up his son, the 2nd defendant, in the business of a tanner. For that purpose he approached the plaintiffs for recognition and help. But Mr. Menzies, who was at that time the representative of the plaintiff firm, refused to deal with the 2nd defendant as he was a young man and had no experience in tanning, which required considerable skill. He seemed to have recommended Visvanatha Aiyar with whom, as already mentioned, the plaintiffs had had dealings, as a man of considerable skill and experience. The 1st defendant evidently accepted the suggestion with the result that the firm of Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. was started as mentioned above. It may be mentioned that Visvanatha Aiyar, according to the evidence, was known to the 1st defendant as carrying on the business of a tanner at Trichinopoly, though they had no dealings with each other previously.

The main terms of the agreement between the plaintiffs and Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. described therein as tanners are as follows. The plaintiff company agreed to advance to Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. such sums of money from time to time as they might think fit, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, but the amount outstanding at any time should not exceed Rs. 50,000, and Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. undertook not to carry on any business other than that contemplated by the agreement and not to give the skins and hides tanned by them to any person other than the plaintiffs. They further agreed that all the skins and hides purchased by them should be hypothecated to the plaintiff company to secure the moneys advanced by them and Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. should be in the position of trustees with respect to the custody of these goods. It was further provided that the plaintiff company were to be entitled to have a representative of theirs at the tannery with power to look into the books of account of the tannery and to inspect the premises whenever he chose, and the salary of such representative was to be debited to the tanners' account. All the amounts to be advanced by the firm were to be used solely for the purchase of skins and hides, and tanning material and all such purchases were to be paid for in cash and cash bills showing the prices paid and countersigned by the persons supplying the goods to be sent to the firm at Madras. The tanners were not to purchase goods on credit or to pledge their credit for them to their constituents. Each consignment of the tanned skins and hides to the plaintiff company at Madras was to be accompanied by a certificate showing the value and description of the skins and the quantity and value of the stock in the tannery. The certificate was to be signed by the tanners and by the plaintiffs' representative. The tanners are further to deliver to the firm a certificate of stock every week, showing the quantity of goods in the tannery and how far the process of tanning has advanced. The plaintiff firm would be entitled to weigh and examine the goods consigned to them and if they thought fit, they might make further advances to the tanners for the purchase of fresh skins. If the tanners committed a breach of any of the terms of the agreement, the plaintiffs would be entitled without any notice to terminate the agreement and to call in whatever sums were outstanding and to take possession of the property and effects of the tanners hypothecated under the agreement and also of the 1st defendant under the terms of the bond referred to. But it is provided that the plaintiff firm shall not be bound to take possession of the properties or exercise any of the powers abovementioned and that the firm shall not be liable to the tanners for anything done by them in the exercise of the powers reserved to them provided the same is done in good faith. In addition to the amounts which the firm might advance to the tanners the latter themselves were to find certain sums of money altogether about Rs. 25,000, to be invested in the business and not to withdraw the same without the consent of the plaintiff company. In order to secure the performance of this agreement the tanners deposited the title-deeds of certain immoveable property to the value of Rs. 10,000. The 1st defendant by the surety-bond (Exhibit B 1) of the same date and referred to in the agreement guaranteed all payments due to the firm under the agreement up to a limit of one lakh of rupees and agreed to save the firm harmless and to keep the firm indemnified from and against all loss and damage which they might suffer in breach of the terms and conditions of the said agreement by Visvanatha Aiyar and the 2nd defendant or by either of them.

The case of the plaintiffs is that they advanced Rs. 10,000 on the 13th February, Rs. 15,000 on the 21st February, again Rs. 10,000 on the 3rd April and Rs. 5,000 on 19th May 1911 to Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. It was argued that as a matter of fact the advances were not made to Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. but to Visvanatha Aiyar individually. The evidence, however, is clear and conclusive. The counterfoils of the cheques issued by the plaintiffs and the entries in the ledger of the National Bank, the promissorynotes which were executed for each advance and the correspondence which took place at the time all leave no room for doubt that the advances were made to Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. It is also clearly proved that goods were purchased from time to time by Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. of the value of about Rs. 34,000 or Rs. 35,000 altogether. The first cash bill, dated 26th February, is for goods of the value of Rs. 3,625, the second cash bill, dated 20th March, is for goods of the value of Rs. 3,834, three cash bills of the date of 2nd May for goods of the value of about Rs. 18,000 and one cash bill of the 17th May for goods of the value of Rs. 8,750. It may be taken as a proved fact that the bulk of these goods never reached the plaintiff firm at Madras. They were clandestinely removed from the tannery at Trichinopoly at the instance apparantly of Visvanatha Aiyar after the business was stopped, some time in the first or second week of June. It appears that only 1,300 loose skins were all that was found in the tannery.

Under the 9th issue the appellants tried to make out that they were not liable under the surety-bond, inasmuch as it was obtained by misrepresentation and suppression of material facts relating to the position of Visvanatha Aiyar and the state of his financial dealings with the plaintiffs. It was alleged that in February 1911 Visvanatha Aiyar was unable to meet his liability to the plaintiffs which then amounted to nearly Rs. 50,000, and that the plaintiffs in order to realise this amount induced the 1st defendant to start a tannery with his son, the 2nd defendant, and Visvanatha Aiyar as partners and to stand guarantor with respect to dealings of the partnership with the plaintiff firm. One of the suggestions in this connection was that Visvanatha Aiyar had no goods in stock on his individual account although his liability amounted to Rs. 50,000. But this suggestion is clearly without foundation, as the evidence shows without doubt that at the end of 1910 Visvanatha Aiyar's stock belonging to his own individual business was of the value of Rs. 42,000. It was argued that these goods were not his and should be taken to belong to Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. The only basis for this argument seems to be the fact that those goods were not sent on to Madras at once but were consigned to the plaintiff firm in different consignments from January to May 1911. It would appear that in March and April Visvanatha Aiyar was unable to devote much time to his business owing to illness and also because of the death of one Pattammal, to whose husband's estate he was entitled to succeed as reversioner. The whole matter is dealt with in the judgment of the learned trial Judge in paragraphs 50 to 58, and the evidence to which he refers amply bears out the conclusion that Visvanatha Aiyar had the quantity of goods mentioned in Exhibit FFFF-10 at the end of January 1911 amounting in value to about Rs. 42,000 and that in addition to this the security of landed property given by Visvanatha Aiyar was available to the plaintiffs. It could not, therefore, be said that Visvanatha Aiyar was in any sense insolvent or unable to meet his liabilities to the plaintiffs or that the plaintiffs had any reasons for apprehending that Visvanatha Aiyar would not be able to repay the advances in due course.

That there were separate accounts with respect to the dealings between the plaintiffs on the one hand and Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. and Visvanatha Aiyar individually on the other is amply clear from the evidence. Exhibit II, which is a letter written by the plaintiffs to Visvanatha Aiyar on the 18th February 1911 and in which they point out to him the advisability of restricting his operations as he had been suffering loss and losing money, itself mentions the amount owed by him in his individual account separately from what was owed by Subramania Aiyar, the 1st defendant, under the new agreement. Exhibit DDDD, which is a letter written by Visvanatha Aiyar tothe plaintiffs, mentions the 'new' account, that is the account of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co., as distinct from his individual account, and the account of Harisanker. It was not until 14th July 1911, long after Visvanatha Aiyar and Co.'s business was closed, and when the 1st defendant was called upon by the plaintiffs to make good the loss, that we find him making any suggestion that Visvanatha Aiyar had no stock of his own in December. This allegation was instantly repudiated by the plaintiffs as untrue; they pointed out that the plaintiffs had distinct proof that at the time of the agreement Visvanatha Aiyar had in his tannery stock of goods the value of which would cover the advances outstanding against him. But there is no reason for doubting the correctness of Mr. Menzies' statement that he was not in a fix as to his getting back the money advanced to Visvanatha Aiyar at the time of Exhibit B and that he was not anxious on that account, as there was stock from which he could realise the money. There were in addition the consignments which he had sent home and which were awaiting sale in London on behalf of Visvanatha Aiyar. It may be taken for granted that Mr. Menzies recommended Visvanatha Aiyar as an experienced tanner, but it does not necessarily follow that he was under any obligation to disclose to the 1st defendant the state of accounts between him and Visvanatha Aiyar with respect to the latter's individual business. On this point, therefore, the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge must be upheld.

Issue No. 6 raises the question whether Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. carried on any business at all under the agreement. The evidence on this point is abundant and clear that business was carried on by the firm until about the end of May 1911. It may be noticed here that this contention of the defendants is scarcely consistent with the contention that Visvanatha Aiyar had no stock on his individual account and that all the goods were purchased with the moneys advanced to Visvanatha Aiyar & Co.

The question which requires more careful consideration is whether the 1st defendant should be held to have been absolved from liability under the guarantee bond, owing to the conduct of the plaintiffs in not insisting on a strict observance on the part of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. of these conditions of the agreement which, if properly carried out by Visvanatha Aiyar and Co., would have ensured the plaintiffs having in their control and disposition goods sufficient to cover the advances made by them to Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. The plaintiffs are charged with gross negligence of a character implying connivance on their part at the fraud committed by Visvanatha Aiyar in not buying goods to the full value of the advances made to Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. and in making away with the goods which were in stock in the tannery of that firm. It is argued that under the agreement the plaintiffs should have seen that cash bills were forthcoming for goods of the value of each advance within reasonable time and no further advances should have been made until the previous advance was fully accounted for, that they ought further, to have insisted on weekly certificates being sent on regularly to their office in Madras and that as soon as the plaintiffs in May 1911 had reasons to suspect that Visvanatha Aiyar was not acting in accordance with the terms of the agreement and was not behaving properly, they ought to have taken possession of the tannery as provided by the agreement. The plaintiffs, it is suggested, had reasons of their own for not acting with proper vigilance; that in fact they allowed Visvanatha Aiyar to draw money from time to time on behalf of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. without caring to see that the moneys were utilised in purchasing skins and that it was in fact their negligence which enabled Visvanatha Aiyar to make away with the stock. The motive for such conduct on the part of the plaintiffs is alleged to be that they expected through the help of Visvanatha Aiyar to secure the skins in the tannery of his relation Pattammal which were pledged to the South Indian Export Company, a rival firm engaged in similar business. A very lengthy argument has been addressed to us on this point, and we have come to the conclusion that having regard to the nature of the business the plaintiffs cannot be held to have been guilty of any negligence in their dealings with Visvanatha Aiyar. As already found, the money owed by him to them in his individual account was sufficiently secured. We also think there is much force in the argument of Mr. S. Varadachari, the learned Vakil for the plaintiffs, that under the agreement Exhibit B, it was left entirely to the discretion of the plaintiffs how much money they should advance and at what time. They were at liberty to advance moneys by way of capital in order to enable the tanners to buy skins and to start the business. The correspondence shows that Visvanatha Aiyar wanted a lump sum of Rs. 40,000 to start with, but the company advanced only Rs. 10,000. So far as this sum is concerned the appellants do not and could not take any objection. The second advance of Rs. 15,000 was made within a week of the first advance. The first cash bill was made out for goods purchased five days afterwards of the value of Rs. 3,625 and on the 20th March, three weeks later, goods were bought for Rs. 3,8( 0 and odd; that is to say on the last date goods of the value of Rs. 7,500 or so had been bought, while the advances made were Rs. 25,000. Then it must be remembered that Rs. 7,500 need not necessarily represent all the disbursements made by the tanners, because they had to make advances to persons supplying raw skins and they had also to buy materials. The third advance of Rs. 10,000 was made on the 3rd April. It is urged that it was negligent on the part of the plaintiffs to make this advance. But it must be remembered that the plaintiffs had no reason to suspect that the money lent by them was not properly utilised; and the fact that cash bills were not regularly sent at that time is accounted for by the fact of Visvanatha Aiyar's illness and Pattammal's death. In May goods of the value of nearly Rs. 26,000 were purchased and the correspondence shows that the plaintiffs were unwilling to make any further advance and that they made the fourth advance only on a strong representation that unless that amount was paid business could not be done. It was the 1st defendant himself that urged the plaintiffs to make that advance. We think this fact alone is sufficient to show that there was no reason at that time for any one to think that business was not being done regularly or that there was anything seriously wrong in the conduct of Visvanatha Aiyar.

In this connection it ought to be mentioned that the representative of the plaintiff company, Damodaram Pillai, who had to deal not only with Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. but with all tanners doing business with the plaintiffs at Trichinopoly, was not satisfied with the conduct of tanners generally in not giving him such facilities as he thought he ought to be given to check the goods in the tannery. But it appears that the objection of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. as well as of other tanners was to Damodaram Pillai counting the skins one by one, while they were in the process of tanning. This it is said would hinder proper tanning; and the plaintiffs themselves seemed to recognise the force of the tanners' objection. On the other hand the appellants' argument is that Damodaram Pillai was right and that the plaintiffs were guilty of remissness in not supporting Damodaram Pillai in his attitude towards the tanners. There can be no doubt upon the evidence that Damodaram Pillai's duties were of a difficult nature and that is why he ultimately resigned his position in May 1911. At the same time the plaintiffs, as men of business, might well have thought that the tanners' objection in this connection was not without reason.

With regard to cash bills it was urged that the plaintiffs ought to have insisted on their being countersigned by the suppliers of skins according to the terms of Exhibit B. Though, no doubt, that is the provision in the deed, it is quite clear, as stated by Mr. Menzies, that it would not have been practicable to insist upon such signatures. It was argued that the plaintiffs were guilty of inaction in March 1911. But the correspondence does not bear out this charge. They were regularly receiving reports from Damodaram Pillai, a man, according to the evidence, scrupulously vigilant in watching the interest of his masters, and the plaintiffs were constantly writing to him as well as to Visvanatha Aiyar and were watching how the business was proceeding. It is to be borne in mind that the process of tanning takes considerable time and, therefore, the plaintiffs could not reasonably be expected to insist that the skins purchased should be sent on immediately or soon after the purchase. It was not until about the middle of May that there arose any grounds for arousing the plaintiffs' suspicion. The 1st defendant wants to make out that he himself was totally ignorant of what was going on between the plaintiffs and Visvanatha Aiyar. But that cannot be accepted as a fact. It will be sufficient on this point to refer to a letter of the 1st defendant of the 17th May, Exhibit GG, in which he asked the plaintiffs not to delay making advances to Visvanatha Aiyar as otherwise the work would suffer. There were no consignments being received up till then and it was only after great hesitation that the plaintiffs advanced the last sum of Rs. 5,000. They took steps about the same time to see how much goods there were in the tannery of Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. They first sent their checking clerk, then their Dubash and then Mr. Purves, an Assistant of the firm, to check the stock. Mr. Purves was there on the 23rd May and he apparently inspected the tannery, checked the stock and made pencil notes of what he found on Exhibit AAAA1, which is a weekly certificate of stock in Visvanatha Aiyar & Co.'s tannery, dated 17th May. At the time of trial Mr. Purves was not available to explain what he found at the inspection, as he had gone away to East Africa in connection with the war. Exhibit AAAA1 shows that 35,157 skins were in stock belonging to Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. and 4,500 belonging to Visvanatha Aiyar individually. Of the above, 5,100 were apparently ready for despatch on the 29th May and 4,500 which belonged to Visvanatha Aiyar's individual business were to be sent on the 24th or 25th May. The correspondence shows that the entire 35,157 skins were not found there and there was some shortage. Apparently the deficiency was not of a serious character. Otherwise we may take it that Mr. Purves wold not have handed to Visvanatha Aiyar the second halves of the Rs. 5,000 currency notes which he had taken with him.

Two days later, on the 26th May, Visvanatha Aiyar wrote to the plaintiffs that he wanted to close the business for 4 months as he had to attend to other urgent matters. It was argued on behalf of the appellants that the plaintiffs ought to have taken possession of the tannery at once. But we cannot accept that contention. They would not have been justified in taking that extreme step, unless they had good reasons for believing that Visvanatha Aiyar would not send the goods in due course. This is what Mr. Menzies says in his evidence. Further we think there is force in the suggestion of the learned Vakil for the plaintiffs that the plaintiffs are not tanners and that it would not have been in their interests to take charge of goods which were still in different processes of tanning and were not ready. In the meantime, as it is clear from the correspondence, the plaintiffs instructed their men to keep watch on the tannery without arousing the suspicions of Visvanatha Aiyar; and we do not think that the plaintiffs can be blamed in any way in proceeding so cautiously about the matter. At the same time they called upon the 1st defendant to pay up the Rs. 5,000 which they had given to Visvanatha Aiyar at the special request of the 1st defendant and to settle all outstanding accounts. But they discovered on the 25th June that the goods had disappeared and that only 1,300 skins were left in the tannery.

They took possession of the premises on the 6th July not under the terms of Exhibit B but under the authority of a power-of-attorney given by Visvanatha Aiyar. It may be mentioned that before the disappearance of the goods was discovered, the 1st defendant wanted to secure the tannery for his son, the 2nd defendant. But nothing came of that. On the 12th July they obtained further securities from Visvanatha Aiyar on his reversionary right in Pattammal's estate. That security was ultimately found to be of little use to the plaintiffs as Pattammal's estate was heavily encumbered. It may here be mentioned that the learned Vakil for the appellants contended that the taking of additional securities from Visvanatha Aiyar amounted to giving time to the debtor Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. and that, therefore, the surety is absolved from liability under the bond. We fail to see any force in this contention.

The view we take of the facts, therefore, is that the defendants have failed to prove that the plaintiff company were negligent in their dealing with Visvanatha Aiyar and Co., much less that they connived at Visvanatha Aiyar violating the terms of the contract between the plaintiffs and Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. or misappropriating the moneys advanced on the goods belonging to Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. It might be that the plaintiffs would have acted more in accordance with the letter of the contract, Exhibit B, if after making the initial advance they had refused to make any further advances, unless and until they received cash bills showing that the moneys already advanced had been utilised in the purchase of skins and the skins so purchased were in the tannery or were consigned to them and that the weekly certificate was regularly forwarded to Madras. But the contract with Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. left it to the discretion of the plaintiffs, as already pointed out, to make such advances within the limits laid down and at such times as they chose. They were not bound to insist on seeing that goods of the value of the advances already made were in stock, before making any further advance and it is more than doubtful that any such strict procedure would have been conducive to the advancement of the business. Further in fact goods almost of the entire value of the advances made to Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. were purchased and were in the tannery undergoing different processes of tanning, and it has been already shown that their clandestine removal from the tannery of Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. could not be attributed to any appreciable negligence or want of vigilance on the part of the plaintiffs. A careful consideration of the facts as they happened and brought to the knowledge of the plaintiffs does not suggest that they acted otherwise than as prudent men of business or deviated from the ordinary and customary mode of dealing with tanners.

That being our conclusion on the evidence, none of the provisions of the Contract Act and the rulings relied on on behalf of the appellants, as to the circumstances in which a surety will be absolved from his obligation owing to the negligence of the creditor in dealing with the principal debtor, has any application. We fail to find that the plaintiffs in this case did any act inconsistent with any rights of the 1st defendant or omitted to do any act which their duty towards the 1st defendant required them to do within the meaning of section 139 of the Contract Act.

The well-known case of Wulf v. Jay (1) was relied on by the appellants. There the plaintiffs might have entered and taken possession of the plants and fixtures upon the interest not being paid at the time when it became due. Instead of doing this, however, they allowed the mortgagors to remain in possession, when they saw that the bankruptcy was impending and imminent. Cockburn, C. J, says that he had no doubt that "their intention was, that, being creditors ultra the amount thus secured, the goods in question should be available as assets under the bankruptcy, while they had the security of the defendant to come upon in order to get paid the debt of £ 300 secured by the bill of sale." Then he refers to the cases cited in Story's Equity Jurisprudence, which establish the proposition that "where a debt is secured by a surety it is the business of the creditor, where he has security available for the payment and satisfaction of the debt, to do whatever is necessary to make that security property available." In this case there was no negligence or wilful default on the part of the plaintiffs in not taking possession of the tannery before they actually did so. The case of Watts v. Shuttleworth (2) lays down the proposition embodied in section 139 of the Contract Act already quoted. There the surety was held to be discharged as the plaintiff, being under a duty towards him to insure the fittings, had omitted to do so. Pollock, C. B., points out that "the rights of a surety depend rather on principles of equity than upon the actual contract; that there may be quasi-contract; but that the right of the surety arises out of the equitable relation of the parties." Lord Brougham in Mactaggart v. Watson (15) laid down the law in these words: "while at law the surety in a bond is not at all discharged even by a long neglect of the obligee to demand payment or account from the principal—nay, when the latter has become insolvent during the time thus suffered to elapse, as was decided in the Trent Navigation Company v. Harley (3), the Courts of Equity have never, to my knowledge, given a discharge to the surety merely on the ground of the creditor, the obligee, not having called on the debtor so early as he ought, or not having given early notice of his failure or non-payment to the surety." Then he observes: "It is, however, undeniable that the Courts of Equity will look narrowly to everything in the conduct of the obligee which has a direct tendency to wrong the surety and injure his rights and equities, and will, as Lord Loughborough said in Rees v. Berrington (16), lay hold of such errors to release him. The error, however, in the present case arises in supposing that any want of care on the Commissioners' side, in making the trustee do that which the surety had covenanted that he should do, was like a postponement of the surety's equities, or diminution of his rights at law." Further on he says,—"All this may be generally true, and yet it cannot avail to discharge a surety who has expressly bound himself for a person's doing certain things, unless it can be shown that the party taking the security has, by his conduct, either prevented the things from being done, or connived at their omission, or enabled the person to do what he ought not to have done, or leave undone what he ought to have done, and that, but for such conduct, the omission or commission would not have happened." The present case does not fall within the rule here enunciated. The case of Durham v. Fowler (17) also lays down clearly that mere laches of the obligee, or a mere passive acquiescence by the obligee, in acts which are contrary to the conditions of a bond, is not sufficient of itself to relieve a surety, supposing that any such laches has been proved, which in this case, as was shown, has not been. Vice-Chancellor Page Wood in Dawson v. Lawes (18), where it was sought to enforce the bond of the sureties given to the Registrars of the Court for the proper performance of the duties of an Official Assignee in bankruptcy, held, following Mactaggart v. Watson (15), that in such cases the negligence in order to discharge the sureties must amount to connivance at the Official Assignee's getting the fund into his hands improperly, or must be so gross as to be equivalent to a wilful shutting of the eyes to the fraud which he was about to commit. No such case has been made out here. Much reliance was placed by the learned Vakil for the appellants on the case of Kingston upon-Hull Corporation v. Harding (4). I do not see how anything said in that case will help to discharge the 1st defendant in the present case from liability as surety. The ruling is that, a surety for a contractor is not discharged from liability although his position has been altered by the conduct of the employer, where that conduct has been caused by a fraudulent act or omission of the contractor against which the surety has, by the contract of suretyship, guaranteed the employer. Lord Esher, M. R., observes: "It seems impossible to say that according to any doctrine of the law of suretyship a surety is released by something which happens in consequence of that which amounts to a fraudulent breach of contract against which the surety has guaranteed the party with whom he has contracted." At page 508 Bowen, L.J., observes: "I can understand that, where the omission of the employer to do something deprives the surety of a right under the contract, or of the power to insist on its exercise, such an omission really affects a right belonging to the surety and so alters his position as to avoid the relation of suretyship." That has no application to what happened in this case. Further on he says: "The doctrine of law on this subject, established in the case of Mactaggart v. Watson (15) and probably before that case and expounded by subsequent authorities, particularly in the case of Dawson v. Lawes (18) and other cases referred to in Durham v. Fowler (17) is this, mere omission on the part of the employer, mere passive acquiescence in acts which are improper on the part of the employee will not release the surety. If there be an omission to do some act which the employer has contracted with the surety to do, or to preserve some security to the benefit of which the surety is entitled, the case is different. There the omission would be one inconsistent with the relation between the surety and the person with whom he has contracted to be surety."

SUBRAMANIA AIYAR v. SHAW WALLACE & CO.

The law as expounded in the above cases, which is the law applicable in India, does not help the appellants in any way. It must, therefore, be held that they are not released from their liability under the bond by reason of any act or omission on the part of the plaintiffs.

As already indicated, there were 1,300 skins in the tannery when it was taken possession of by the plaintiffs. It was argued by Mr. S. Varadachari, on behalf of the respondents, that his clients received only 300 or 400 skins out of that lot, but the plaintiffs' witness No. 4, Sadasiva Aiyar, who succeeded Damodaram Pillai at the tannery as the plaintiffs' representative, says that when he took possession there were 1,000 skins and that he sent them to the Madras Office. I think the plaintiffs must account for the 1,300 skins. The price of a raw goat skin as entered in the cash bill, Exhibit ZZZ works out at about Re. 1-8-0 per skin. There is nothing to show that they all belonged to Visvanatha Aiyar and Co., or to Visvanatha Aiyar individually, or partly to the one and partly to the other and in what proportions. Under the circumstances, the equitable course would be to hold that half of them belonged to Visvanatha Aiyar & Co., and half to Visvanatha Aiyar individually. On that basis the defendants ought to receive credit for Rs. 975 the value of 650 skins. In addition to that, it appears from the correspondence that 20 bundles of skins were ready for despatch from Trichinopoly to Madras on 31st May 1911 and that they must have been received by the plaintiffs in Madras by the 6th June. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that these 20 bundles are the same as, or included in, the 8 bales referred to in the invoice of skins shipped per "Clan Robertson" on the 7th June on account of Visvanatha Aiyar individually. We were referred to the entry, under the date of 2nd June, of payment of freight with respect to 12 bundles. There is no evidence to identify the one with the other. The learned Subordinate Judge has given credit to Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. for Rs. 1,831-8-2 the value of 2 bales of sheep skins shipped per 'Colaba' which the plaintiffs had credited to Visvanatha Aiyar's individual account. It was argued on behalf of the appellants that the sheep skins which on the 17th May were in the "second bark" could not have been ready for shipment per ss. "Colaba" on the 12th June. Having regard to the evidence of Mr. Menzies as to the time taken in the different processes of tanning we cannot say that there is any force in this contention. We think that, upon the evidence, we must hold that the plaintiffs should account for the entire 20 bundles. It may be pointed out that the evidence adduced on this point by the plaintiffs was to the effect that these twenty bundles were never received. We think that this must be a mistake. Taking 250 skins per bundle it would amount to 5,000 skins and the weekly certificate prepared on the 17th May shows that there were 5,100 goat skins in stock on that day excluding the 3,000 sheep skins. In the absence of specific evidence one cannot say that the 20 bundles contained only goat skins and no sheep skins at all; and, as there is no evidence to the contrary, we must hold as in the case of 1,300 loose skins that half of the quantity belonged to Visvanatha Aiyar and Co. and half to Visvanatha Aiyar's individual account. Taking the value of each skin at Rs. 2, the defendants would be entitled to credit for Rs. 5,000. But they have already received credit for Rs. 1,831-8; deducting this sum they will be entitled to a further credit of Rs. 3,168 7-10 and adding to this Rs. 975 the price of half of the 1,300 loose skins the defendants will be entitled to an additional credit altogether of Rs. 4,143-7-10.

The last question which remains to be considered relates to the liability of the 2nd and 3rd defendants. The 2nd defendant was a major at the time of the contract, Exhibit B, which refers to the guarantee-bond, Exhibit B1, as already mentioned was executed by his father, and it must be taken that he consented to and authorised the giving of the guarantee by which the entire family property was made security for the due performance of the contract by Visvanatha Aiyar & Co. Mr. Mayne in his Hindu Law, 7th Edition, paragraph 344, correctly lays down that "any want of capacity on the part of the father to alienate the family property may be supplied by the consent of the co-parceners. Such consent may either be express or implied from their conduct at or after the time of the transaction." That is sufficient to dispose of the 2nd defendant's objection.

The 3rd defendant, however, was a minor at the date of the transaction and if he is to be held liable at all it must be on the ground of a Hindu son's obligation to pay his father's debt if that debt was not incurred for immoral or illegal purposes. For, as found by the learned Subordinate Judge, there could have been no family necessity for the execution of the surety-bond, Exhibit B 1, pledging the family property nor could the guaranteeing of the tanning business be a legitimate family purpose. The contention on behalf of the appellants is that a Hindu son's pious obligation to pay his father's debts does not arise so long as the father is alive inasmuch as he may in his own lifetime discharge such debts or may leave assets sufficient to meet his liabilities. This proposition is based on a passage in the judgment of the Lord Shaw in a recent Privy Council decision in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (5). It is not contended that under the Hindu Law, as was applied in this Presidency or elsewhere before this judgment of the Privy Council, a Hindu son's obligation to pay his father's debts not incurred for illegal or immoral purposes did not arise until after his death. In fact no such contention could be put forward in face of the state of the rulings of the Courts. It is not necessary to go through all the cases on the subject and it will be sufficient to mention some of the leading decisions, including those of the Privy Council, which left no room for doubt on the point. Here it must be mentioned that it is not a mortgage-decree that is sought against the 3rd defendant's share, but that he is sought to be made liable only to the extent of his share in the joint family property.

In Sami Ayyangar v. Ponnammal (6) both the father and son were sued on a hypothecation bond executed by the father and it was held that as regards the liability of the son's share for the debt of the father as a mere money claim there could be no question since it was found that the mortgage was for consideration and was not illegal or immoral. And both the learned Judges held the alienation to be bad inasmuch as it was not made for an antecedent debt. In Ramasami Nadan v. Ulaganatha Goundan (7) a Full Bench of this Court also held that in a suit against the father and son the son's share in the family property would be liable for the debt incurred by the father not being for any illegal or immoral purpose. Subramania Ayyar, J., delivering the leading judgment of the case, both upon a review of the original authorities and also of the rulings of the Courts says: "Be this as it may, it is impossible to hold under the law, as it stands established by the repeated decisions of the ultimate Court of Appeal, that a creditor suing a Hindu for his personal debt is not entitled to include, as defendants in the suit, the debtor's sons." In Chidambara Mudaliar v. Koothaperumal (8) also the same view of the law was accepted as established by a uniform course of decisions. The learned Judges, however, laid down that there was no distinction in principle between a mortgage given for an antecedent debt and a mortgage given for a debt then incurred. On the latter point, this decision has been overruled by a Full Bench in Venkataramanaya Pantulu v. Venkataramana Doss Pantulu (19).

In Calcutta the law seems to have been the same; see Luchmun Dass v Giridhur Chowdhury (9), Kishun Pershad Chowdhury v. Tipan Pershad Singh (10) and also in Allahabad—see Karan Singh v. Bhup Singh (20), Chandradeo Singh v. Mata Prasad (11), [which contains the judgment of Stanley, C J., relied on by the Privy Council in the case of Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (5)] in which it is stated that a son may be successfully sued for the debts of his father as he is under an obligation to discharge his debts provided that the suit be not barred by limitation and that the decree passed in such a suit may be enforced in execution by the sale of the ancestral property of the family.

The ruling of the Judicial Committee on the point is also to the same effect as pointed out in the various cases referred to. I need mention only the case reported in Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun (12) where their Lordships laid down that if the father's debt, not having been contracted for an immoral purpose, is such as to support the sale of the entirety of the joint estate, either he may sell the latter without suit or the creditor may obtain a sale of it by suit; but the joint sons, not being parties to the execution proceedings or to the sale are not precluded from having a question as to the nature of the debt tried in a suit of their own; a right which will, however, avail them nothing unless it is shown that the debt is one which will not justify a sale of the joint estate.

Now, coming to the case in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (5), the point for consideration before their Lordships was as to what was an antecedent debt within the meaning of Hindu Law which would justify a father in alienating the family property. There the only decree that could be obtained was on the basis of a mortgage; the plaintiffs' claim for repayment of the money as a simple debt had been barred long ago as pointed out by the Judicial Committee. The point they had to settle was whether the plaintiff, under the circumstances, was entitled to a mortgage-decree. They, first of all, state the general principles of Hindu Law, namely, that a gift, sale or mortgage by one co parcener except with the consent, either express or implied, of all the other co-parceners, is invalid but that the manager and the head of the family could alienate the family property for reasons of necessity. To these principles, they point out, there is one exception, namely, alienation by a Hindu father of the family property in order to discharge an antecedent debt of his own. But, it was further argued by the appellant (the respondents were not represented by Counsel before their Lordships) even a mortgage not executed either for family necessity or for an antecedent debt could be upheld on the basis of the pious obligation of a son to pay his father's debt if the money which was borrowed on the mortgage was not obtained for an illegal or immoral purpose. In dealing with that argument, they made the following observation which has given rise to so much difficulty in our Courts: "While the father, however, remains in life, the attempt to affect the sons' and grandsons' shares in the property in respect merely of their pious obligation to pay off their father's debts, and not in respect of the debt having been truly incurred for the interest of the estate itself, which they with their father jointly own, that attempt must fail; and the simplest of all reasons may be assigned for this, namely, that before the father's death he may pay off the debt, or after his death there may be ample personal estate belonging to the father himself out of which the debt may be discharged. In short, responsibility to meet the father's debts is one thing, and the validity of a mortgage over the joint estate is quite another thing." In our opinion, the last sentence shows that their Lordships did not mean to lay down that, so long as the father was alive, the son could not be sued along with the father for a debt which was incurred by the father but not for any illegal or immoral purpose. All that the passage seeks to meet is, the argument that the father was entitled during his lifetime to dispose of the property of the family not for any family purpose nor to discharge any antecedent debt. It must be observed that, if their Lordships wanted to lay down the law as to the liability of the son to pay a father's debt by virtue of pious obligation differently from what had been so well established in India, supported by their own previous decisions they would have expressed themselves clearly to that effect. On the other hand, there is not even an allusion to any of the rulings on the question or to the state of the law as understood hitherto. A similar interpretation was placed on this decision by another Bench of this Court in Vinjanampati Peda Venkanna v. Vadlamannati Sreeniwasa Deekshatulu (13) and the same view has prevailed in the Bombay High Court in Hanmant Kashinath v. Ganesh Annaji (21). In Sripat Singh Dugar v. Prodyat Kumar Tagore (14) in execution of a mortgage-decree against the father, the whole of the family property was held by the Privy Council to be liable to be sold, if the debt was found not to have been incurred for an immoral purpose, and in Jogi Das v. Ganga Ram (22) their Lordships, referring to the case of Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (5), regard it as only laying down the proposition that the family property cannot be alienated except for necessity or for the payment of an antecedent debt, quite distinct from the debt incurred for the mortgage itself, and that the sons of the mortgagor are not bound by any such alienation by reason of pious obligation to pay their father's debt and not that their shares in the family property would not be liable for a simple money-decree if the debt was not incurred for an immoral purpose.

In the result, we confirm the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge and dismiss the appeal with costs, except that the decree will be modified by giving credit to the defendants for Rs. 5,975 instead of the amount allowed by the Subordinate Judge. The defendants will be allowed four months from this date for payment of the decree amount.

AYLING, J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), ss. 154, 177 (f)—Jurisdiction, plea of, futile, urged—Civil Court, jurisdictton of, to entertain appeal.

A suit under section 154 of the Agra Tenancy Act for the resumption of land held rent-free is cognizable only by a Revenue Court, and no question of jurisdiction arises: if, however, such a plea is urged that would not confer jurisdiction on a Civil Court to entertain an appeal in the suit.

Civil revision against the order of the District Judge, Moradabad, dated the 9th January 1919.

Mr. M. L. Sandal, for the Appellants.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an order of the lower Appellate Court directing the memorandum of appeal to that Court to be returned to the appellant for presentation in the proper Court. The suit was instituted in the Revenue Court for resumption of certain land which was alleged to be the rent free holding of the defendants held by them for performance of certain services. Some of the defendants in their written statement alleged that they were tenants with rights of occupancy but they added that the suit was not cognizable by the Revenue Court. The Court of first instance went into the merits and decided against the defendants. The latter preferred an appeal against the decision of that Court to the District Judge and they did so on the ground that a question of jurisdiction had been raised and decided and that, consequently, an appeal lay to the District Judge under section 177 (f) of the Tenancy Act. By reason of certain rulings in which there were conflicting remarks, the question raised in this case was referred to a Full Bench in the case of Gokaran Singh v. Ganga Singh (1). In that case, which is reported in Volume XVII of the Allahabad Law Journal Reports, page 1072, [Gokaran Singh v. Ganga Singh (1)], it was held that where assuming the allegation made in the plaint to be true, it was contended that the Revenue Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the plaint, that would be a proper plea of jurisdiction and in such a case an appeal could lie to the District Judge In the present suit, if the allegations in the plaint are true, it could never be said that the suit was not cognizable by the Revenue Court. The suit purported to be one for the resumption of land held rent-free and it was under section 154 of the Tenancy Act that the suit was brought. If the land was held rent-free, a suit for resumption of such land could only be brought in the Revenue Court. Therefore, no question of jurisdiction arose in the case and the plea of jurisdiction was a futile plea. It was also manifestly futile because the defendants' own allegation was that they were tenants with a right of occupancy. A suit for the ejectment of such tenants was undoubtedly one cognizable by a Revenue Court. The learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court was, therefore, right in holding that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal and this application for revision must fail. I accordingly dismiss it with costs.

An under-tenant who holds under a raiyat is not a raiyat and cannot acquire a right of occupancy in a case governed by Act VIII B. C. of 1869. [p. 662, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of Justice Sir Syed Shamsul Huda, KT., dated the 21st of July 1919, in Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 316 of 1918.

Babus Girija Prosonna Sanyal, for the Appellants.

Babus Sarat Chandra Roy Choudhuri, Satya Charan Sinha and Dwijendra Kumar Dutt, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent from the judgment of Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda, in a suit for ejectment.

The plaintiffs appellants claim a raiyati interest in the disputed land and seek to recover possession on the allegation that the defendant was an under raiyat whose tenancy had been terminated by a notice to quit. The defendant contends that he himself has a right of occupancy and cannot consequently be evicted.

It has been found that the original raiyat in occupation of the land, was one Monsa. His interest in the land was acquired by one Ful Chand. But Ful Chand did not turn out his vendor from the land who continued to cultivate the same. The real point in controversy in this case is, what was the result of this transaction. It has been contended on behalf of the defendant that, notwithstanding the transfer by Monsa to Ful Chand, Monsa continued to be a raiyat in respect of the land and acquired the status of an occupancy raiyat. This position is sought to be supported by reference to section 6 of Act VIII of 1869, B. C., which is in force in the district where the disputed land is situated. The argument, on behalf of the respondent, has in substance been that Act VIII of 1869, B. C., as well as Act X of 1859 did not contemplate the existence of an under-raiyat, because that expression was coined and used for the first time by the framers of the Bengal Tenancy Act. This contention is manifestly fallacious; for it is well-known, and is recognized in numerous decisions in the reports, that under-raiyats existed all over the country before the Bengal Tenancy Act was placed on the Statute Book. It has been seriously argued, however, that these sub-tenants, under-raiyats, were themselves raiyats, such an argument has been found possible because the term 'raiyat' was not defined either in Act X of 1859 or in Act VIII of 1869, B. C. In our opinion, there is no foundation for this contention. In the case of Baboo Dhunput Singh v. Baboo Gooman Singh (1), Mr. Justice Elphinstone Jackson observed that, as a general rule, raiyats are cultivating tenants but they may not be cultivators at all themselves; they may cultivate their lands by hired labour or by under-tenants. To the same effect are two later decisions, namely, Kalee Kishore Chatterjee v. Ram Churn Shah (2) and Kalee Churn Singh v. Ameeroodeen (3). In the former of these cases Mr. Justice Elphinstone Jackson pointed out that "section 6 of Act X of 1859 distinctly alludes to the circumstance of a raiyat with right of occupancy sub-letting his land and does not declare that such raiyat thereby loses his right, but that the sub-lessee thereby gains no right. It is very common all over the country for raiyats who have rights of occupancy to sub-let in the Bazar; but that gives the Zemindar no right to dispossess the raiyat with right of occupancy, as the Zemindar here has done." We cannot possibly accept the contention of the respondent that an under-tenant who holds under a raiyat is a raiyat and acquires a right of occupancy, with the consequence that if there is a tenant under such a person he also is a raiyat with a right of occupancy. The fallacy of this argument becomes manifest, when on close analysis we find that it leads us in the position that in respect of the same plot of land there may be an infinite series of tenants, each under his superior holder but all of them raiyats and all of them in enjoyment of a right of occupancy. It is sufficient to say that there is no authority to be found in any Statute or in any reported decision in support of this astounding conclusion. The learned Vakil for the respondent contended, however, that there was, at any rate, no decision against his view. That is so, for the obvious reason that during the sixty years which have elapsed since Act X of 1859 was passed, no one has ventured to advance an argument of this description. In our opinion, on the facts found, there can be no room for doubt that the plaintiff is a raiyat and the defendant is an under-tenant. The tenancy of the defendant was terminable and has been terminated in accordance with law. Consequntly, he cannot successfully resist the claim for ejectment.

(1) W. R. 1864, Act X Rulings, 61.
(2) 9 W. R. 344.
(3) 9 W. R. 579.

The appeal must be allowed, the decree made by Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda set aside and that of the Special Subordinate Judge restored with costs here and before Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda.

Appeal allowed.

Civil revision against the decision of the Judge of the Court of Small Causes at Gorakhpur, dated the 21st March 1919.

Mr. Haribans Sahai, for the Applicants.
Mr. S. P. Sinha, for the Opposite-Parties.

JUDGMENT.—I do not think I should interfere in this case. The suit was brought in a Court of Small Causes and what the applicant seeks is that I should treat the matter as an appeal from the decree of that Court. However, a legal objection has been taken to the effect that the suit was not of a nature cognizable by a Small Cause Court, and reference has been made to Article 35 (ii) and Article 43 (a). I do not think that these articles are applicable to the present case. According to the allegations in the plaint, the defendants against whom the suit was brought, had committed no criminal offence for which compensation was being claimed. The person who is said to have misappropriated the ornaments about which the suit was brought, was Tulshi Ram, the plaintiffs' gumashta. The plaintiffs' case was that Tulshi Ram, without authority from the plaintiffs, handed over the ornaments in suit, to the defendants. The defendants alleged that Tulshi Ram had pawned them with the defendants and that it was within the scope of his authority to do so. In a previous suit which the defendants brought against the plaintiffs, they made a similar allegation and they sought to recover the amount of the alleged loan from the plaintiffs and for sale of the ornaments. That suit was dismissed as against the plaintiffs. The Court held that Tulshi Ram had no authority to pledge the ornaments, which were the property of the present plaintiffs, to the defendants. In the present suit also the Court below had found that Tulshi Ram had no authority to hand over the ornaments. The plaintiffs, it is true, in the previous suit which they brought, had alleged that Tulshi Ram had credited in the plaintiffs' account the sum of Rs. 165 as received from the defendants and that the plaintiffs were prepared to give credit to the defendants for that amount, but the defendants denied the plaintiffs' allegation and contested the claim upon the basis of the so-called pledge by Tulshi Ram. That suit was withdrawn with liberty to bring a fresh suit. In the present suit the plaintiffs claim the recovery of the ornaments and, in the alternative, for their value. As it was found that Tulshi Ram had no authority to pledge the ornaments or to sell them, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the ornaments. The ornaments could not, however, be identified and, therefore, the only course left for the Court to do was to make a decree for an amount which would compensate the plaintiffs for the ornaments in the possession of the defendants. The Rs. 165 which Tulshi Ram received from the defendants and credited to the plaintiffs in their account was a matter between Tulshi Ram and the plaintiffs. Furthermore, the claim previously brought by the defendants to recover this sum from the plaintiffs was dismissed as against them. The defendants cannot, therefore, claim that sum as a condition precedent to the return of the ornaments or the payment of their value. The decree which has been made by the Court below for an amount which is much less than the amount claimed in the plaint, seems to be a reasonable decree. I accordingly dismiss this application but, having regard to the circumstances of the case, I make no order as to costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 151, O. XLI, rr. 23, 25—Remand—Appellate Court, inherent power of.

The powers of an Appellate Court as regards remand are not restricted to the cases specified in Order XLI, rules 23 and 25, of the Civil Procedure Code: an Appellate Court may, in the exercise of its inherent powers under section 151 of the Code, remand a case if it considers it necessary for the ends of justice to do so.

Civil revision against an order of the District Judge, Gaya, dated the 25th January 1919.

Mr. S. N. Dutt, for the Appellant.

Mr. Sivanandan Rai, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application has been filed against an order of the District Judge of Gaya remanding the case to the Munsif for a re-decision on the whole case after taking evidence on the question of sanity or otherwise of one Sridhar Pathak.

The main ground that has been urged against the legality of that order is that the order is one which is not covered by Order XLI, rule 23 or rule 25. Not much discussion on the point is necessary, inasmuch as I find that the point is concluded by authorities. It has been held in the case of Abdul Karim Abu Ahmed Khan Ghaznavi v. Allahabad Bank Ld., (1) that the powers of the Appellate Court as regards remand are not restricted to the case specified in Order XLI, rule 23, but the Appellate Court can exercise the power of remand under its inherent powers given by the Legislature under section 151 of the Civil Procedure Code, if the Court thinks that it is necessary for the ends of justice to do so. This case has been followed in this Court by Roe and Jwala Prasad, JJ., in the case of Raghunandan Singh v. Jadunandan Singh (2). Therefore, I have absolutely no doubt that the learned Judge had power to remand the case, as he did consider that it was for the ends of justice that he should do so. There is, however, a case of this Court [Haradhan Mandal Modak v. Iswar Das (3)] where Mullick and Atkinson, JJ., took a different view, but I find on reference to the dates of the decision of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court and the decision by Roe and Jwala Prasad, JJ., that the case of Haradhan Mandal Modak v Iswar Das (3) was decided before the Full Bench decision. Under those circumstances, I think that I must follow the decision of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court which has been already accepted as a good decision by this Court.

In view of my decision upon the main point, it is not necessary to go into the question whether the application is entertainable under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. This application is rejected and the Rule is discharged.

Babu Najendra Nath Ghosh, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for partition, and the only question involved in this appeal is, whether the Courts below were right in refusing to allow the plaintiffs to amend the plaint under the following circumstances.

The plaintiffs alleged that the property in suit was the ancestral property of the plaintiffs and defendants; that the plaintiffs were in joint possession with the defendants as co-sharers; that as it became inconvenient to hold possession of the property jointly, they gave notice to the defendants to effect a partition and then brought this suit. The cause of action is said to have arisen in January and May 1916 when the defendants declined to effect the partition.

The defence (of the defendant No. 1 who alone contested the suit), inter alia, was that the plaintiffs had no title, that the property was not ejmali property, and that the plaintiffs had no possession. He accordingly contended that the suit could not be maintained in the form in which it was instituted.

There were several issues raised, the first issue being: "Is the suit maintainable in its present form? Can the plaintiffs claim partition without praying for declaration of title?" The fourth issue was: "Is the subject-matter of the suit undervalued and is the suit properly stamped?" and the seventh issue was: "Were the plaintiffs or defendant No. 2 or their predecessors-in interest, Madan Mohan Basak, ever in possession of the property in suit?"

The questions of Court fee and possession were taken up several months before the trial commenced, and the learned Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were out of possession at the date of the suit and that the suit, therefore, could not be maintained on a Court-fee of Rs. 10. Thereupon the plaintiffs paid ad valorem Court fee, but did not amend the plaint. When the suit came on for hearing, the Pleader for the defendant objected that the suit could not be proceeded with on the plaint, as framed. The plaintiffs thereupon put in a petition in which they stated that the prayer (kha) in the plaint was wide enough to be construed as a prayer for possession after partition and that if that was not considered sufficient, the plaint might be amended by adding the words at the end of the prayer (kha), namely, that "Out of the entire property, 4 annas 5 gundas 1 kara share being separately demarcated, a decree for possession may be given in favour of the plaintiff with respect to the same."

As a matter of fact, the prayer (kha) in the plaint was to the same effect and the application was not really an amendment of the plaint. The learned Subordinate Judge held: "The application is equivocal and does not contain all the elements necessary to convert the present suit into a suit for recovery of possession. Under the circumstances, I refuse to admit this application and hold that the suit is bad in form and is not maintainable on that account." On appeal, the learned Additional District Judge has affirmed the order of the first Court.

The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court and it has been contended before us that the amendment ought to have been allowed.

As stated above, the suit was originally brought for partition, that is, on the footing that the plaintiffs were in joint possession with the defendants and merely wanted separate possession. That case has been found to be false. They will now have to sue for recovery of possession. That will be a new cause of action and different from that on which the suit was originally based.

There is no doubt that the Civil Procedure Code gives ample power to the Court to give leave to parties to amend the pleadings. Order VI, rule 17 lays down: "The Court may at any stage of the proceedings allow either party to alter or amend his pleadings in such manner and on such terms as may be just, and all such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real questions in controversy between the parties." And rule 7 provides: "No pleading shall, except by way of amendment, raise any new ground of claim or contain any allegation of fact inconsistent with the previous pleadings of the party pleading the same."

It is contended, however, on behalf of the respondent that the defendant would be seriously prejudiced in his defence on the question of limitation, if the amendment were allowed by converting the suit into one for recovery of possession, because although the period of limitation for the claim for recovery of possession might be proved at the trial to have expired between the date of the institution of the suit and the date of the amendment, it would be saved by reason of the amendment which would relate back to the date of the institution of the suit, whereas a new suit, if filed at the date of the amendment, would be barred. We were referred to the cases of Cropper v. Smith (1) and Kali Das Chaudhuri v. Srimati Danpadi Sundari Dassee (2).

Although, as we have said, the power given to the Court should be liberally exercised, this should not be done where the amendment would prejudice the opposite party.

In the case of Cropper v. Smith (1) Bowen, L. J., observed: "I think it is a well-established principle that the object of Courts is to decide the rights of the parties and not to punish them for mistakes which they make in the conduct of their cases by deciding otherwise than in accordance with their rights. Speaking for myself, and in conformity with what I have heard laid down by the other division of the Courts of Appeal and by myself as a member of it, I know of no kind of error or mistake which, if not fraudulent or intended to over-reach, the Court ought not to correct" but the learned Judge added, "if it can be done without injustice to the other party."

In the case of Kali Das Chaudhuri v. Srimati Danpadi Sundari Dassee (2) Sanderson, C. J., observed: "If we were to grant his application for amendment, it would amount to granting him leave to bring a fresh suit of an entirely different nature, which suit, if brought now, would be barred by the Statute of Limitation." In the same case Mookrjee, J., observed: "It is well settled that where a plaintiff bases his claim upon a specific legal relation alleged to exist between him and the defendant, he should not be allowed to amend the plaint so as to base it on a different legal relation This rule is only one aspect of the broader principle that leave to amend should be refused where the amendment would introduce a totally different, new, and inconsistent case."..... and, further, "it is plain that the Court would be very reluctant to deprive the defendants in this manner of a valuable right which they have already acquired by the operation of the Statute of Limitation."

In the present case we do not know how the amendment would affect the defendants as no application has yet been made setting out the cause of action and when it arose. We were pressed with the fact that the plaintiff has paid Court-fee as directed by the Court. But up to date there has been no proper application for amendment. It is true that there was in the Court of first instance an application (referred to above), which, as the learned District Judge puts it, was "mere tinkering at the prayer portion of the plaint". There was in fact no material amendment even of the prayer portion; and we think that the application made in the Court of first instance was wholly insufficient for the purpose of amendment. Under Order VII, rule 1 (e) the plaint shall contain "the facts constituting the cause of action and when it arose". That has not been done either in the Court of first instance or in the Court of Appeal. Even in this Court the learned Pleader for the appellant is unable to state how the plaintiffs want to amend the plaint. Moreover, the plaintiffs came to Court not only with a false case of having been in joint possession, but they attempted after the institution of the suit to deprive the defendant of their possession with the help of the goondas and got hold of some municipal bills with a view to create evidence of possession in support of the case as framed. Both the Courts below have in the exercise of their discretion disallowed leave to amend, and having regard to all the circumstances, we do not think that the plaintiffs ought to be allowed leave now to amend the plaint. The appeal must accordingly be dismissed with costs.

Messrs. John Jackson and N. N. Ghoshal, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—These are applications for revision of two orders passed by the District Judge of Lucknow. It appears that there are cross-suits pending between the parties; one in the Court of the Munsif (South) Lucknow and the other in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Lucknow. On the 17th of March two applications were made before the learned District Judge by the Counsel on behalf of Rani Qamar Zamani Begam who is the defendant in one case and the plaintiff in the other. The applications were for the transfer of both suits to the Court of Pandit Seetla Prasad Bajpai and various grounds were set out in the applications upon which it was claimed that transfer of the suits should be made.

The learned Judge, without issuing notice to the opposite party, at once recorded an order transferring both the cases to the Court of Pandit Seetla Prasad. It is objected here that this order is a wrong order in law and is open to revision under the provisions of section 115. We are of opinion that the Judge did act irregularly and that his procedure is vitiated by material irregularity. An order for transfer of a case in these circumstances ought not to be made without notice being given to the opposite party. It is to be observed that the cases are not cases in which the Judge acted suo moto. He was moved by one of the parties in each case and he does not profess to have acted on his own motion. We direct, therefore, that the orders of the District Judge be discharged, that the applications be sent back to him for disposal in accordance with law after he has issued notice to the opposite party and given the opposite party an opportunity of showing cause. No order as to costs.

Hindu Law—Separation—Minor, suit by, for partition

LALTA PRASAD v. SHIAM SINGH.

effect of—Minor attaining majority and proceeding with suit, effect of—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXII, r. 12.

Inasmuch as a minor member of a joint Hindu family cannot, as of right, demand a separation, an action brought by him through his next friend for partition does not create any alteration of status of the family. But where, during the pendency of such a suit the minor attains majority and appears before the Court and elects, under rule 12, Order XXXII of the Civil Procedure Code, to proceed with the suit, such election has the same force as at the time attaches to a man of full age who commences an action for partition, that is to say, the family hitherto joint becomes at once a separate family. First appeal from the decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Cawnpur, dated the 31st of July 1917.

Messrs. K. N. Katju and Mr. Saila Nath Mukerjee, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Moti Lal Nehru, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

MEARS, C. J.—This appeal raises two interesting and important questions of Hindu Law. It was originally opened before Mr. Justice Piggott and myself and subsequently we deemeed it proper to have the weight and assistance of Mr. Justice Banerji's wide knowledge and long experience.

The facts are quite simple, and the points of law stand out in a form very convenient for a clear pronouncement. Lalta Prasad, the plaintiff in the Court below and the appellant here, is the grandson of one Gajadhar Lal. Gajadhar Lal had a son who died during his lifetime and, in the year 1914, the appellant was about 17 years of age. Gajadhar Lal and the mother of the appellant were not on good terms, and on the 18th of November 1914, the appellant and his mother, apparently living away from the residence of the grandfather, commenced a suit for partition, the appellant being the plaintiff in that case suing by his mother as next friend. There is nothing to show that the grandfather ever knew of that suit, because, having made a Will on the 22nd of November 1914, he died on November the 25th, 1914. The terms of the Will were displeasing to the appellant and one of the points taken in the Court below, and also argued before us, was that the grandfather was not, at the time of the execution of the Will, of sound disposing mind and that the Will was consequently null and void. We examined the evidence on this part of the case and intimated to the Counsel that, in our view, the appellant's contention in that respect was wrong and, thereupon, we came at once to what are the substantial points in dispute. One of the provisions of the Will of November the 22nd, 1914, was in these terms: "As all the expenses of the temples at Mauzas Bangawan and Ramaipur, Pargana Cawnpore, in which are seated the idols of Sri Mahadeoji and which (both) were built by my ancestors, have always been defrayed from the family property it is incumbent on me, the executant, to set apart (a portion of) the property for their expenses and management so that the souls of my ancestors and the members of the family may be benefited thereby in the next world, and my religious duties may be performed. With this view I dedicate the property entered in list B, which is a portion of the entire property owned by me, the executant, to Sri Mahadeoji installed in the temples aforesaid. The said Sri Mahadeoji shall be the owner thereof, neither Lalta Din alias Munna, nor any other person shall have any right in it. It shall be the exclusive property of Sri Mahadeoji. The management of the property shall be made by Lalta Din alias Munna through his mother, Musammat Sheo Rani Kunwari, during the period of his minority and by himself after he has become adult." There was also a question as to whether the family was joint or separate and the history of the family was quite clear down to the year 1911. From 1911 until 1914, in fact, up to the death of the testator, there was no suggestion of any amicable partition but it was said that partition was ipso facto effected by means of a suit instituted on the 18th of November. These, therefore, are the two points for decision.

First, whether the institution of the suit by the appellant with his mother as next friend by itself and of itself has the effect in law of creating an alteration of the status of the family so that the family hitherto joint becomes at once a separate family. The second point is, whether the bequest contained in the 5th clause of the Will was a competent bequest for a Hindu kurta to make, if it was decided that, in the circumstances, the testator was joint at the time of his death.

LALTA PRASAD v. SHIAM SINGH.

Now, on the first question, it is, of course, accepted law that a person sui juris, who is a member of a joint Hindu family can effect partition and he can bring about that partition by a request to the Courts, if other methods prove unavailing and it has been held and must be taken to be a definite statement of the law that the institution of a suit for partition is such a clear unequivocal and distinct expression of determination that that in itself is sufficient to cause a severance of the joint family. Girja Bai v. Sadashiv Dhundiraj (1). The point that arises here is, whether a minor, who commences an action through a next friend, stands in any other different position to that of a person sui juris. Now a minor may be a youth who is so nearly approaching his majority that he is capable of exercising some, perhaps, even a full measure of discretion upon so vital a question as partition. On the other hand, the minor may be a child, three years old but whether three years old or 17 years of age, the law requires that the minor shall be represented in the suit by a next friend and it has been argued before us that a minor, so represented by a next friend, can, by the very institution of a suit, effect the same immediate legal consequences as would admittedly follow from a suit brought by a man sui juris. We cannot agree with that contention at all. It is evident that it would open up grave dangers. A person might be appointed guardian of a minor, who was in a position of antagonism to the rest of the family, and who would, by reason of the rule of law contained in the above case, have the immense power by his or her own will alone of bringing about an immediate alteration of status in a family that might otherwise be quite united. The effect, therefore, we think, of an action brought by a minor through his next friend is not to create any alteration of status of the family, because a minor cannot demand as of right a separation, it is only granted in the discretion of the Court when, in the circumstances, the action appears to be for the benefit of the minor [See Chelimi Chetty v. Subbanna (2)]. There is one intermediate stage and that is the case of a minor who, during the pendency of a suit, becomes of full age and in that case the provisions of Order XXXII, rule 12 apply, and, in the event of a minor who has attained his majority during the pendency of a suit for partition, coming to a Court and insisting on his right to continue the action, it may very well be that, at the moment when he was, by reason of having attained his majority, regarded by the law as a person competent to make up his own mind upon the matter, it may well be that on his appearing before a Court and electing to proceed with the suit that that election would be deemed to have the same force as at the time attaches to the election of a man of full age who commences an action for partition. Inasmuch as in the present case the suit abated by reason of the death of the grandfather, the time never arrived for this appellant to show whether he was minded to continue the action and, therefore, we are of opinion that the joint family did not become separate by the institution of the action of the 18th of November 1914.

Now, the second point which was taken on behalf of the appellant was that the property, included in the Will under the fifth head which in value was about 1/30th of the family property did not pass to the idol, because the grandfather had no power to will it away. In argument, it has been said that whatever power the karta of a joint Hindu family may have of making a gift inter vivos he has no power to make a bequest, because at the moment of his death his rights have passed to the surviving members of the Hindu family and then there is a conflict between the right of survivorship and the alleged right under the Will and that the right of survivorship prevails, and in support of that contention we have been shown three authorities. The first one is to be found in the VIIIth Volume of the Madras High Court Reports at page 6 [Vitla Butten v. Yamenamma (3)]. In that case an adopted son sought to set aside a Will made by his adoptive father, who had purported to dispose of immoveable ancestral property. Therefore, leaving out the immaterial fact that it was a suit as between an adopted son and an adoptive father, we get a very similar set of circumstances in that case to those which we are considering to-day. The Court in that case say: "we are of opinion that the Will in the case referred to cannot take effect. At the moment of death the right of survivorship is in conflict with the right by devise. Then the title by survivorship, being the prior title takes precedence to the exclusion of that by devise." They then proceeded to declare the Will of no effect as a valid devise of property in favour of the defendant. Now that case has been referred to with approval in Suraj Bunsi Koer v. Sheo Persad Singh (4), Rathnam v. Sivasubramania (5) and Lakshman Dada Naik v. Ramchandra Dada Naik (6). In the last mentioned case their Lordships of the Privy Council approved of the practice of the High Court of Madras, who have by their decision admitted that a co-parcener can effectually alienate his share by gift, but have ruled that he cannot dispose of it by Will. Their Lordships further say: "Its reasons for making this distinction between a gift and a devise are, that the co-parcener's power of alienation is founded on his right to a partition; that that dies with him, and that the title of his co-sharers by survivorship vesting in them at the moment of his death, there remains nothing upon which the Will can operate. This principle was invoked in the case of Suraj Bunsi Koer v. Sheo Persad Singh (4) and was fully recognised by their Lordships, although they decided the particular case, which was one of an execution against a mortgaged share, on the ground that the proceedings had then gone so far in the lifetime of the mortgagee as to give, notwithstanding his death, a good title against his co-sharers to the execution purchasers. It follows, from what has been said, that the weight of positive authority at Madras, as well as at Bombay, is against the proposition of the learned Counsel for the appellant."

"Their Lordships are not disposed to extend the doctrine of the alienability by a co-parcener of his undivided share without the consent of of his co sharers beyond the decided cases."

With these cases to guide us, it is clear that the plaintiff must succeed in this appeal on the ground that his grandfather, by the Will made on the 22nd of November 1914, had no power to transfer the joint ancestral property to the idol, a devise which, it should be noticed, was to take effect after his death, he having in the Will stated that he was to remain as long as he lived in possession of the property. In these circumstances, the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore must be overruled and the appeal allowed.

We allow the appeal, decree the plaintiff's claim by granting him the declaration sought in his memorandum of appeal to this Court, and direct that the respondents Nos. 1 and 2 shall pay the plaintiff's costs of the appeal here and in the Court below including fees in this Court on the higher scale. As regards costs of the other defendants we do not interfere with the order of the Court below.

BANERJI, J.—I am of the same opinion and entirely agree with the judgment of the learned Chief Justice on both the questions discussed in this appeal. The rule laid down by their Lordships in the Privy Council in Girja Bai v. Sadashiv Dhundiraj (1) to the effect that the institution of a suit for partition of joint family property has the effect of creating a separation of the joint family, cannot be applicable to a suit brought on behalf of a minor which has not matured into a decree. The reasons for the exception are stated in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice and I have nothing to add to them. The same view was held by the Madras High Court in Chelimi Chetty v. Subbamma (2). As regards the other point which has been raised in this appeal, there can be no doubt that the manager of a joint Hindu family cannot by Will devise any portion of the joint family property to take effect after his death inasmuch as upon his death he ceased to be the manager of the family and had no estate left in him which could pass to the legatee under the Will. This is manifest from the authorities which have Landlord and tenant—Tenure, agreement to subdivide—Agreement incorporated in compromise decree in rent suit—Agreement, whether valid and binding—Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 1885), ss. 164, 165, —Tenure, sale of, for arrears of rent—Auction-purchaser, suit by, for possession—Incumbrance pleaded in written statement—Plaintiff not aware previously of incumbrance—Suit, whether maintainable.

In a suit for arrears of rent the parties effected a compromise and agreed upon a separation of the tenures of the defendants, each being deemed an independent tenure, and this agreement was inserted in the compromise and incorporated into the decree. In a subsequent suit it was urged that as the decree went beyond the scope of a rent-decree and recited a separation of the shares of the defendants, it was invalid:

Held, that, inasmuch as the landlord and tenure-holders were at liberty to divide the tenure by mutual agreement, and they did so divide it, and evidenced the fact by the compromise on which the decree was based, the agreement was binding between the parties, and its validity was not impaired by its being incorporated in the decree. [p. 672, col. 1.]

Plaintiff purchased a tenure at a sale held in execution of a decree for arrears of rent under sections 164 and 165 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and received possession, but was subsequently dispossessed by the defendant. He brought a suit for possession and was for the first time made aware of an incumbrance when it was pleaded in the written statement of the defendant:

Held, that the plaintiff had a good cause of action which could not be taken away by what was brought to his notice for the first time in the defendants' written statement, and was entitled to recover possession, but the incumbrance would stand good if no annulled within one year of the plaintiff becoming aware of its existence, in the manner prescribed by section 167 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Babu Moorari Lal Mazumdar (was absent at the hearing), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises under the following circumstances:—Lakhan was the holder of a separated 8-annas share of a Mokarari tenure under Kailash Misra, the rent-free proprietor. Lakhan had two sons Goday and Becharam, the interest of the latter being inherited by his four sons. Kailash sued Goday and his nephew for arrears of rent of the 8-annas Mokarari in question; and a compromise decree was passed whereby it was agreed, that Goday's moiety interest should be separated off from the moiety of Becharam's sons each being deemed an independent tenure. That decree is dated the 23rd March 1889. In execution of the decree the 4-annas share belonging to Becharam's sons was put up for sale and was purchased on the 21st June 1890 by Surjya Narayan Gossain. Subsequently, Kailash sued Surjya Narain for arrears of rent, and in execution his 4-annas interest was purchased by the plaintiff on the 22nd January 1894.

The plaintiff brought this suit on the allegation that he had been put in possession by the Court in May 1894 and dispossessed by the defendants in the subsequent month of August.

The principal defendants, who are the appellants before us, had in April 1879 obtained a mortgage from three of Becharam's sons of their interest in this tenure and recovered a mortgage-decree on the 4th September 1890 against two of those sons (neither Surjya Narain nor the plaintiff being made a party to the suit) and in execution thereof, on the 23rd May 1894, themselves purchased the interest of those two sons respresenting one-fourth of the original 8 annas Mokarari tenure. The defendants pleaded that the plaintiff was not entitled to deprive them of the interest thus acquired because he had not annulled the incumbrance in the manner and within the time required by law. They also contended that the rent-decree in execution of which the plaintiff purchased the property was a decree in respect of only a share of the tenure, and had, therefore, only the effect of a money-decree, the sale in execution of which would pass no more than the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor. Both the lower Courts have held that these pleas are invalid, and have given the plaintiff a decree. The same contentions are raised in the appeal before us.

As regards the second of these grounds, it is urged that the Solenama decree, in so far as it went beyond the scope of a rent-decree and recited a separation of shares between the defendants, was invalid. It must, however, be conceded that the landlord and the tenure-holders were at perfect liberty to divide the tenure by mutual arrangement. They did so in fact and evidenced it not only by the Solenamah on which the decree was based, but by subsequent conduct, first in the sale at which Surjya bought and afterwards at the sale in which the plaintiff bought. The agreement was a binding one between the parties, and its validity was not impaired by its being incorporated in the decree. The separated 4 annas Mokarari was duly and effectively recognized by both landlord and tenants, and so the plaintiff's purchase must be regarded as that of an entire tenure.

The next question which arises is, whether the plaintiff was entitled to sue for possession though he had not annulled the incumbrance set up by the defendants. This leads us to a consideration of some of the provisions contained in Chapter XIV of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Section 159 enacts that where "a tenure is sold in execution of a decree for arrears due in respect thereof, the purchaser shall take with power to annul the interest defined as incumbrances." Section 161 indicates that a mortgage comes within the defination of an incumbrance. In the present instance it does not appear that the tenure was first put up for sale under section 164 and then under section 165. It has been found by both the lower Courts that the mortgage was not notified to the landlord so as to make it a "registered and notified incumbrance," therefore, there was apparently no necessity of first resorting to the procedure indicated in section 164. However this may be, the purchaser under either of the two sections 164 and 165 has power to annul an incumbrance and can only do so in the manner prescribed by section 167, and not otherwise. He is required within one year from the date of the sale, or the date on which he first has notice of the incumbrance, whichever is later, to present to the Collector an application in writing, requesting him to serve on the incumbrancer a notice declaring that the incumbrance is annulled. This action had not been taken either by the plaintiff or by Surjya the previous tenure-holder but it will be remembered that in the suit brought by the defendant against some of his mortgagors neither Surjya Narain nor the plaintiff was made a defendant and the lower Courts have found that they had no notice of the incumbrance, and that the plaintiff was first made aware of it when it was pleaded in the written statement and they have further found that plaintiff was put in possession under his purchase and subsequently dispossessed by the defendants. That being so, we think that the plaintiff had a good cause of action and was entitled to recover the property from the defendants subject, however, to the condition that the incumbrance would stand good if not annulled within one year of the plaintiff becoming aware of its existence. The plaintiff's right of action which was good and valid when the suit was brought could not be taken away by what was brought to his notice for the first time in the defendant's written statement.

We are not now concerned to enquire whether the plaintiff has not taken any action to annul incumbrance. We have only to see whether he had a right to be put in possession of the tenure at the time he brought his suit, and as we have found that he was so entitled we affirm the decree of the lower Court, with this reservation however, that the incumbrance would stand good if not annulled within one year of the plaintiff's knowledge thereof, and we dismiss this appeal but without costs, as the respondent does not appear.

JUDGMENT.—This is a reference by the learned Sessions Judge of Saharanpur, in deciding which we have had the advantage of hearing the point very satisfactorily argued by Counsel on both sides. The essential facts are these. A Sub Inspector of Police, finding himself in a certain village in the north of the Saharanpur District, received information that persons who had been concerned in a number of dacoities in that neighbourhood, and who had recently committed a dacoity in a village about two miles off, had been seen in a forest tract in his neighbourhood. He endeavoured to get a number of villagers to join him in an expedition into that forest for the purpose of discovering the whereabouts and effecting the arrest of these dacoits. With this object in view he called upon Joti Prasad, the local agent of an absentee Zemindar, to join him and to bring with him or, in the alternative, to lend him the use of a gun which was kept in the Zemindar's house under a license personal to the Zemindar. He also called upon two other villagers, Ishri and Agdi, to join him. These three men refused to accompany the Sub-Inspector on his expedition and Joti Prasad further refused to lend the Sub-Inspector the use of the gun. The result was that no sufficient number of villagers volunteered to join the Sub-Inspector and that the latter gave up his intended expedition. Joti Prasad and Ishri and Agadi have been convicted by a Magistrate under section 187 of the Indian Penal Code of having intentionally omitted to give assistance to the Sub-Inspector which they were bound by law to render or offer. Whatever obligation lay upon these persons under the law is defined and limited by section 42 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. According to that section, as applied to the facts of this case, they were bound to assist the Sub-Inspector reasonably demanding their aid in the taking of any dacoits or suspected dacoits whom that officer was authorised by law to arrest. The Magistrate having convicted all three men and passed sentences of fine, the learned Sessions Judge of Saharanpur has referred the case to this Court, being of opinion that the convictions are not in law sustainable. Having heard arguments on both sides we have come to the conclusion that the learned Sessions Judge is substantially right. Cases of this sort must be carefully considered on their own individal facts, it would be easy to suggest cases in which a refusal to render active assistance in the arrest of an absconding criminal, or to place at the disposal of a responsible Police Officer material assistance, such as the use of a firearm or of a bicycle or other means of locomotion urgently required by the circumstances of the case, might involve a criminal liability. We think the learned Sessions Judge has put his finger on what is the real weakness in the case for the prosecution, when he says that the Sub Inspector's request was for assistance in finding and arresting a number of unknown persons, whose precise whereabouts were also unknown at the time when the request for assistance was made. Obviously, the law does not intend that Police Officers should have a general power of calling upon members of the public to join them in doing the work for which they are paid such as tracing out the whereabouts of an absconding criminal or collecting evidence to warrant his conviction. Taking the facts of the present case as they stand, and applying them to the precise words of section 42 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, we think that the convictions in this case were bad, because the assistance of the applicants in revision had not been invited to assist the Police Officer in the taking of any persons within the meaning of that section. The correct way of looking at it is that they had been asked to join in a search for the whereabouts of certain persons, with a view to their arrest in the event of the search proving successful. We think this is a sufficient ground on which to dispose of the reference. We accept, accordingly, the reference of the learned Sessions Judge, set aside the conviction and sentence in this case and direct that the fines imposed upon Joti Prasad, Ishri and Agdi, if paid, be refunded.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 297—Trial by Jury—Misdirection, what amounts to.

Where in a trial by Jury the Judge fails to direct the mind of the Jury to a particular aspect of the case, or where he tells the Jury that the statement of one accused might be taken for what it is worth against a co-accused, this amounts to a misdirection sufficient to occasion a failure of justice and to vitiate the trial. [p. 680, col. 2.]

Criminal appeal against the decision of the Sessions Judge, Assam Valley Districts, dated the 5th May, 1919.

FACTS appear from the following dissentient judgments of Mr. Justice Newbould and Justice Sir Syed Shamsul Huda, Kt., dated the 29th July 1919:—

NEWBOULD, J.—This is an appeal by Suryya Kanta Bhattacharyya who has been convicted on the charge of having committed breach of trust as a servant and has been sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment under section 408 of the Indian Penal Code. The appellant was tried jointly with one Ananda Kishore De before the Sessions Judge of the Assam Valley Districts and a Jury. Both accused were charged with having committed criminal breach of trust as servants. Ananda Kishore De was charged with having made false entries in certain documents and hereby committed an offence punishable under section 477A of the Indian Penal Code and the appellant Suryya Kanta Bhattacharyya was charged with abetment of this offence. The Jury unanimously found Ananda Kishore De not guilty of both charges and by a majority of three to two found the appellant Suryya Kanta Bhattacharyya guilty of the charge under section 408, Indian Penal Code only.

The case for the prosecution, so far as it relates to the charge on which the appellant has been convicted, is as follows:—In October last Suryya Kanta Bhattacharyya was Station Master and Ananda Kishore De was Goods Clerk at Dumduma Station on the Dibrusadiya Railway. On the 18th October, Golap Rai (P. W. No. 3) loaded a consignment of 135 bags of rice at Dumduma Station to be sent to Rupai siding on the same Railway. For the freight and other charges on this consignment Golap Rai paid Rs. 10-4-0 to the Station Master, the appellant: but he credited Rs. 8-4-0 only to the Railway Company and misappropriated the difference, rupees two.

The case for the prosecution depends very largely on the evidence of this Golap Rai. The verdict of the majority of the Jury shows that they accepted his evidence and the learned Sessions Judge, in commenting on this verdict, has stated that he sees no reason to distrust the evidence of Golap Rai. Whether Golap Rai should be believed or not was for the Jury to decide and we must accept their decision unless we are satisfied that there has been a misdirection in the Judge's charge to the Jury which has in fact occasioned a failure of justice. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that there has been such misdirection. The point that was most strongly urged was that Golap Rai was an accomplice and the Judge omitted to give the necessary directions to the Jury as to the danger of convicting on the evidence of an accomplice unless it was coroborated in material particulars. In my opinion this contention fails for the reason that Golap Rai was not an accomplice in the meaning of that word as used in sections 114 (b) and 133 of the Indian Evidence Act. It is not suggested that Golap Rai was an accomplice in the offence for which the appellant has been convicted nor in the other offence punishable under section 477A, Indian Penal Code, with which he and his co-accused were charged. What is alleged, is that Golap Rai was an accomplice in a different fraud which was not the subject-matter of the trial. This accusation against Golap Rai is based on the following facts. The 135 bags of rice sent from Dumduma on the 18th October weighed 254 maunds. It was charged for as a consignment of 60 bags weighing 100 maunds, the result being that Golap Rai had to pay less than half the amount he would have had to pay if the correct charges had been levied. From this we are asked to infer that Golap Rai was conspiring with the person responsible for the booking of the goods to defraud the Railway Company of the difference between the amount paid and the amount payable as freight. The appellant alleges a conspiracy bstween Golap Rai and the co accused, but so far as the argument that Golap Rai was an accomplice is concerned, it is immaterial whether he conspired with the appellant or the other accused. The first answer to this argument is, as stated by the learned Sessions Judge, that there is no evidence to support this allegation of a conspiracy between Golap Rai and either of the accused. There are suspicious facts, but this accusation was not investigated at the trial and Golap Rai was not given an opportunity of explaining these facts. An examination of his evidence shows that, instead of it being suggested to him that, he was paying too little, he was asked if he did not suspect that the Station Master was charging him more than the rate allowed. Secondly, I would hold that, even if the inference were drawn that Golap Rai was a party to a conspiracy to defraud the Company, he would not be an accomplice within the meaning of that term as used in the Evidence Act and the case-law on the duty of a Judge when charging a Jury as to the value of an accomplice's evidence. The word 'accomplice' is not defined in the Evidence Act or any other Indian Statute. An indication of its meaning may be found in section 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code. There the word 'accomplice' is used in the marginal note and the section itself refers to "any person supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in the offence under enquiry." Golap Rai was not concerned in the offence under enquiry. It was clearly put to the Jury that they must find that the sum of Rs. 10-4 was paid by him as freight before they would convict the appellant on the charge under section 408, Indian Penal Code. If, as the Jury have found, Golap Rai paid this sum as freight, he was not even indirectly concerned with the offence under enquiry. The meaning of the word 'accomplice' was considered by Sir Subrahmania Ayyar, Officiating Chief Justice of the Madras High Court, in the case of Ramaswami Gounden v. Emperor (1). In that case it was held that a witness, who was alleged to have assisted in the removal of the dead body of a murdered person from the place of murder to the pit in which it was buried and delayed to report the murder, was not an accomplice and the rule of practice as to corroboration had no application to the case. So far as I am aware, it has never been held that a witness who is alleged to have taken part jointly with the accused in an offence different from that for which the accused is being tried should be regarded as an accomplice so that the Jury must be told that it is unsafe to convict on his uncorroborated evidence. In the present case I hold, that the learned Sessions Judge did not misdirect the Jury when he told them they should hold the appellant to be guilty of misappropriation, if Golap Rai's evidence be believed, without warning them that it was unsafe to convict on his evidence unless it was corroborated in material particulars. I should add, that there would be no difficulty in the case if Golap Rai were an accomplice in the offence under enquiry since, in that case, his evidence would be obviously false and the charge would have failed not on the ground that the principal witness required corroboration, but because there was no evidence to support the charge at all if he were disbelieved. For the same reason, the case would fail if the Jury held that Golap Rai paid the sum of Rs. 2 as a bribe and not as freight.

The other points urged on behalf of the appellant can be dealt with more shortly. It was said that the Jury should not have been told that the evidence of Golap Rai was corroborated. In my opinion, the learned

(1) 27 M. 271 at p. 277; 2 Weir 803; 14 M. L. J. 226; 1 Cr. L. J. 641.

Sessions Judge was right in saying: "If it is believed that it is necessary to apply to the Station Master when a whole wagon is required, this would be good corroboration of Golap Rai's evidence." If the Station Master was the person to whom the application should have been made, the Jury would be justified in thinking it probable that Golap Rai did apply to the Station Master himself as he says he did.

Then it is said that the Jury ought not to have been told that they had to decide whether to believe the prosecution witnesses Benoy Bhusan and Khetra Nath who tried to throw the responsibility on to the Assistant Goods Clerk, the other accused. Had not the Jury's attention been drawn to the question of the credibility of these witnesses there would have been a serious misdirection. Each accused threw the blame on the other and the Jury could not properly decide as to the guilt or innocence of the Assistant Goods Clerk without considering the credibility of this evidence.

Another point taken is, that the defence of the appellant was not properly put to the Jury. The main defence of the appellant was an attempt to throw the blame on his co-accused and this was clearly stated. It was contended that the defence that the Assistant Goods Clerk and Golap Rai were acting in collusion to defraud the Company in the manner mentioned above in relation to the point of Golap Rai being an accomplice was not properly put. But the learned Sessions Judge drew attention to the difference between the number of bags and their weight shown in the documents and their actual number and weight and said that this could not be a mere mistake and must have been intentionally misstated with the object of showing favour to the consignor and defrauding the Railway or in the alternative the officer responsible must have accepted the word of the consignor. At another part of his charge he told the Jury that it was argued that Golap Rai must have bribed the accused or one of them to charge less than the full amount of freight and that they should consider whether, if this were so, Golap Rai should be disbelieved on this account. This shows that the attention of the Jury was drawn to the line of defence.

There is one misdirection. The Jury should not have been told that the statement of one accused should have been taken for what it was worth against the other. As, however, the learned Sessions Judge was careful to point out that these statements were of practically no value as evidence, I cannot hold that this misdirection has occasioned a failure of justice.

A point was made on the basis of a remark in the charge that certain evidence was wholly irrelevant. It is not quite clear whether the learned Sessions Judge used this word in the special sense in which it is used in the Evidence Act or in its ordinary sense. The use of the qualifying adverb suggests that he did not mean to use it as a term of law. It may be that the evidence was relevant to prove facts, that it was necessary for the prosecution to establish at the commencement of the trial but that owing to those facts being undisputed this evidence did not require the Jury's consideration. However that may be, it does not appear that this evidence could have had any influence on the decision of the Jury.

The learned Sessions Judge in his charge to the Jury has expressed his opinion on the evidence. But he did not do more than he was authorised to do by clause (2) of section 298 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. He was careful throughout his charge to impress on the Jury that the decision of all questions of fact rested with them.

The sentence passed is not too severe.

I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal.

As my learned brother is of a different opinion, the case will be laid before another Judge of the Court under the provisions of section 429 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—The facts, as disclosed by the evidence for the prosecution, are shortly these: Golap Rai, the Gumasta of a Marwari firm, on the 11th of October 1918 brought 135 bags containing about 258 maunds of rice to the Dumduma Railway Station and loaded them in wagon No. 2858 for being carried to Rupai Siding, the consignee being the Rupai Tea Estate. Again, on the 18th of October he brought and loaded in wagon No. 1396 another 135 bags containing about 254 maunds of rice. There is no entry regarding the first consignment in the books of the Railway but as regards the second consignment the entries show a consignment of 60 bags weighing 100 maunds and Rs. 8-4-0 as paid as freight. For the quantity shown in the books this was admittedly the correct charge. But the account book of the Marwari's firm shows that the actual amount paid for the second consignment was Rs. 10 4-0, i. e., two rupees more than the amount entered in the books of the Railway. The charge under section 408 relates to this sum. At the time of making these consignments the accused No. 1 Ananda Kishore Dey was the Assistant Goods Clerk and the accused No. 2 Suryya Kanta Bhattacharyya, the appellant before us, was the Station Master. All the entries relating to the second consignment in the papers and registers of the Railway are in the handwriting of the first accused Ananda Kishore. If the correct quantity had been entered the correct charge would have been Rs. 20-4 annas. The consignee thus paid Rs. 10 less for freight on the second consignment but calculated upon the weight falsely entered he made an excess payment of Rs. 2. These facts are undisputed. These irregularities having come to the notice of the Traffic Manager, Mr. Anderson, there was an investigation by a Criminal Investigation Department Officer as the result of which the two accused were placed on their trial on a charge under section 408 against both of them. There was also a charge under section 477A against the first accused Ananda, and a charge for abetting the said offence against the second accused Suryya Kanta.

The defence of Ananda Kishore was that he had nothing to do with the transaction except that he made certain entries under the direction of Suryya Kanta. In the same way Suryya Kanta's defence was that he left these matters to the Assistant Goods Clerk and that he had no knowledge of the fraud committed by Ananda Kishore. Under the rules, the responsibility rested with the Station Master but, as the learned Judge pointed out, this theoretic responsibility must be distinguished from criminal liability.

On these facts, and apart from the evidence of Golap Rai, to which I shall refer later the offence disclosed against the person who received the money was either that he received the extra Rs. 2 as bribe or that he committed criminal breach of trust in respect of that sum. The case was one of receiving a bribe if it is assumed that Golap Rai knew that he was paying more than the proper charge, from which it may be reasonably inferred that the excess amount was paid by way of bribe to escape liability for the extra Rs. 10 that was chargeable for the whole consignment, but it was criminal breach of trust if the whole amount was paid as freight and a part of it, viz., Rs. 2 was misappropriated. From the facts, as I have stated them, it is difficult to imagine that Golap Rai was an honest consignor and that he was no privy to the fraud that was committed on the Railway. It appears that to constitute an accomplice there need only be the intention of assisting in the commission of a crime, but he need not know exactly what crime is being committed. This was the view taken by Lord Chief Justice Isaacs in the case of Charles Cratchley (2) in which reference was made in the case of Rex v. Lord Baltimore (3). Even if Golap Rai was not an accomplice in the technical sense of the term, his evidence was no better than that of an accomplice and should have been dealt with on that footing: Queen v. Chando Chandalinee (4), Alimuddin v. Queen-Empress (5) and Ishan Chandra v. Queen-Empress (6). Golap Rai admits being in the service of the Marwari firm for the last eight or nine years. He says that for the first consignment he was charged only Rs. 7 and that when an excess amount of Rs. 3-4 as. was charged for the second consignment he grumbled but Suryya Kanta told him it was all right. Subsequently, he modified this statement and said he did not ask the Station Master why the amount charged for was in excess of the amount charged on the 11th. Whilst Golap Rai or his employer saved about Rs. 10 the Railway Official, whoever he was, gained only Rs. 2. It is inconceivable that the Railway Officials charged Golap Rai Rs. 10 less for his benefit or for the benefit of his employers without his complicity. However, it is not for me to find the facts. The Jury have acquitted Ananda and have convicted Suryya Kanta only. The case against Suryya Kanta as pointed out by the learned Sessions Judge depends entirely on the statement of Golap Rai to the effect that he transacted the business with the Station Master alone and paid him the money. It seems to me that, upon the facts as I have stated them, the Jury had ample materials upon which to hold that Golap Rai was an accomplice and that the extra Rs. 2 was paid as bribe either to the first or the second accused. It was due to the appellant that the learned Judge should have explained to the Jury what an accomplice was, should have asked them to say upon the facts before them whether Golap Rai was or was not an accomplice. The Jury should then have been told that if Golap Rai was a party to the conspiracy to cheat the Railway Company he was an accomplice and it was not safe or proper to convict upon his evidence without corroboration on material particulars. He should have also explained to the Jury, what was the nature of corroboration necessary in such cases: Jamiruddi Masalli v. Emperor (7). Instead of that, the learned Judge told the Jury that Golap Rai was an independent witness, that he was not connected with the Railway and that he had no interest in the success of the prosecution. With reference to the argument that Golap Rai was an accomplice, the learned Judge observed as follows: "It is, however, argued that he must have bribed the accused or one of them to charge less than the correct amount of freight. This is possible but there is no evidence to show that he did so and the accused are not being charged with accepting a bribe in consideration of showing favour to Golap Rai. The Jury should, therefore, consider whether Golap Rai can be considered as an accomplice in this case, and also whether, if he did give a bribe to either of the accused, he should be regarded as a person of less than average morality and on that account to be disbelieved." These observations are open to serious objections: First, if Golap Rai was in the conspiracy, he was an accomplice and it made no difference that the advisers of the Crown instead of charging Suryya Kanta for receiving a bribe charged him with criminal breach of trust; secondly, the Judge should have distinctly told the Jury that it was not enough to find that Golap Rai paid Rs. 10-4 as. and the amount credited was Rs. 8-4 0 but they must be satisfied that the whole amount was paid as freight and if the extra Rs. 2 was paid as bribe the charge under section 408 could not stand. But, instead of saying this, the learned Judge told the Jury that there was no evidence to show that Golap Rai had paid a bribe. There was no direct evidence but the circumstantial evidence was ample to justify the Jury in coming to the conclusion that the extra Rs. 2 was paid by way of bribe and not as freight. By this expression of opinion the learned Judge shut out the Jury from holding that Golap Rai had really paid a bribe so that the charge under section 408 was not established. Thirdly, it was not enough, assuming that Golap Rai was an accomplice, that he should be regarded as a person of less than average morality and on that account to be disbelieved. There is nothing to prevent a man of low morality being believed by a Jury, but if that person is an accomplice the law says that it is unsafe to convict on his uncorroborated testimony and casts upon the Judge the duty of warning the Jury against acting on such testimony. This duty has not been discharged in the present case.

Again, referring to the rules and actual practice and to the evidence of Golap Rai that he applied to the Station Master for a whole carriage, the learned Judge said, 'if it is believed that it is necessary to apply to the Station Master when a whole wagon is required this would be a good corroboration of Golap Rai's evidence." Although, at the same time, the learned Judge pointed out that the evidence of Mr. Anderson and others showed that this duty was generally performed by the Assistant Goods Clerk and that the Station Master would not in ordinary cases even know about it, he ought to have told the Jury that the corroboration required must be something that connected the accused with the crime. If Golap Rai was an accomplice, his statement that he applied to the Station Master would not, in my opinion, be corroborated by the mere circumstance that the rules required such applications to be made to that officer. The corroboration must be by evidence sufficient to connect the accused with the offence charged. The mere existence of the rules is not such corroboration.

SURYYA KANTA v. EMPEROR.

On these grounds I think that the verdict of the Jury in this case is vitiated by misdirection and want of proper direction and that a fresh trial should be ordered. If the Jury had been properly directed, it is likely that they would have brought a verdict of not guilty against the appellant and such a verdict would have been amply justified by the evidence.

I regret I have to differ in this case from the decision of my learned brother.

JUDGMENT.

CHAUDHURI, J.—The appellant, a Station Master, was tried jointly with another, a Goods Clerk, before the Sessions Judge of the Assam Valley Districts and a Jury under section 408, Indian Penal Code, for criminal breach of trust as railway servants. The Goods Clerk was also charged under section 477A for fabrication of certain entries and the appellant with abetment thereof.

The Jury unanimously found the Goods Clerk not guilty of both charges; the majority, however (3 to 2) found the appellant guilty under section 408. The Judge agreeing with the majority has sentenced him to three years' rigorous imprisonment. Hence this appeal. It was heard by the Criminal Bench, but, owing to a difference of opinion, it has come before me under section 429, Criminal Procedure Code.

The facts are shortly these. One Golap Rai (P. W. No. 3), the Gomasta of a Marwari firm, on the 18th December 1918, loaded 135 bags of rice weighing about 254 maunds in a wagon at the Dumduma Station to be sent to Rupai Siding and they were so sent. The proper charge for the consignment was Rs. 20-11-0. The Railway Books show an entry of Rs. 8-4-0 against this item which is put down as 60 bags weighing 100 maunds. The entry in the Rokur of the Marwari firm shows a debit of Rs. 10-4-0, namely, Rs. 2 more. The actual quantity proved to have been sent was 254 maunds and the railway books at Dumduma contained untrue entries. Rs. 8-4-0 is the proper charge for 100 maunds, but, having regard to the quantity, the Railway should have been paid Rs. 12-7-0 more. Golap Rai's statement is that the Station Master asked Rs. 10-4-0 from him as freight and he paid that sum. The entries in the Railway Books were made by the Goods Clerk and his statement is that he made them under the directions of the Station Master accused. The Station Master said he had left these matters to the Goods Clerk and knew nothing about them. Under the rules the responsibility rested with the Station Master and applications for wagons are to be made to him. Two Railway witnesses, namely, Binoy Bhusan Das Gupta, Booking Clerk and Signaller (P. W. No. 13), and Khetter Nath Biswas, Trains Clerk (P W. No. 14), deposed that the practice at that Railway Station was that applications for wagons were made to the Goods Clerk and that he was in charge of booking and loading consignments of goods, but the Station Master received the total amount of the day's receipts in the evening from the Goods Clerk.

I agree with Shamsul Huda, J, that the offence in respect of the sum of Rs. 2 was either receiving a bribe, or that of criminal breach of trust. The consignor says that he paid Rs. 10-4-0 altogether. He is benefited to the extent of Rs. 10-7-0 the Railway lost Rs. 12-7-0 and Rs. 2 went into the pockets of the officer who received the freight, as in the Railway Books Rs. 8-4-0 only was entered. It is difficult to believe that the Gomasta of a Marwari firm who has done business there for eight or nine years did not know or try to find out the correct freight. Either the consignor had to bear the cost or the consignee, but the consignor had to pay it in the first instance. The Railway receipt or invoice would have shown the amount actually paid. It is not forthcoming. Golap Rai says he did not ask for a receipt as it did not occur to him that it was necessary. How did he think the consignee was going to get delivery without a receipt or invoice? He said he had no experience of Railway receipts, but had seen other people using them. Being pressed in cross-examination he said he did not ask for a Railway receipt but the Station Master said of his own accord that as the goods were going to a siding there was no need for one. He had on a previous occasion sent a milar quantity of rice from the same station to the same Siding and says he paid Rs. 7 then. He says he grumbled when he was asked to pay Rs. 10-4 0 on this occasion and was told that was the right amount. Then he varied the statement and said he did not ask the Station Master why the amount charged was larger on this occasion. I agree with Shamsul Huda, J., that it is difficult to conceive that he was an honest consignor and that he was no privy to the fraud committed on the Railway. His story is that he was asked to pay Rs. 10 4 0 as freight and paid it and reliance is placed on the entry in his book, which stands thus "Rs. 10-4 0 in cash for railway freight, Railway receipt for 135 bags." The mention of Railway receipt in it is noticeable. It does not mention the weight, although other entries in his book such as Exhibits 20 (5), 20 (1), 20 (2), 20 (4). mention both the number of bags and weight. He is paid by the weight. These facts do not appear to have been put before the Jury in connection with the credibility of Golap Rai. No doubt the charge is under section 408 and that depends upon the truth of the statement of the witness Golap Rai that he paid Rs. 10-4 0 as freight, but if he paid Rs. 2 as a bribe to charge him less than the actual freight payable, he was clearly an accomplice in respect of an offence under section 161, Indian Penal Code, which is clearly an alternative case practically upon the same facts. I think it was incumbent upon the Judge to direct the mind of the Jury to this aspect of the case and his failure to do so is a serious misdirection as the case practically depends upon the evidence of Golap Rai. The learned Judge merely said this: "It is, however, argued that he must have bribed the accused or one of them to charge less than the correct amount of freight. This is possible, but there is no evidence to show that he did so and the accused are not being charged with accepting a bribe in consideration of showing favour to Golap Rai. The Jury should, therefore, consider whether Golap Rai can be considered as an accomplice in this case, and also whether, if he did give a bribe to either of the accused, he should be regarded as a person of less than average morality and on that account to be disbelieved" I agree with Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda that "these observations are open to serious objection: First, if Golap Rai was in the conspiracy, he was an accomplice and it made no difference that the advisers of the Crown instead of charging Suryya Kanta for receiving a bribe charged him with criminal breach of trust; secondly, the Judge should have distinctly told the Jury that it was not enought to find that Golap Rai paid Rs. 10-4-0 and the amount credited was Rs. 3-4 0 but they must be satisfied that the whole amount was paid as freight and if the extra Rs. 2 was paid as bribe the charge under section 408 could not stand. But, instead of saying this, the learned Judge told the Jury that there was no evidence to show that Golap Rai had paid a bribe. There was no direct evidence but the circumstantial evidence was ample to justify the Jury in coming to the conclusion that the extra Rs. 2 was paid by way of bribe and not as freight. By this expression of opinion the learned Judge shut out the Jury from holding that Golap Rai had really paid a bribe so that the charge under section 408 was not established." Newbould, J., also says that if Golap Rai paid Rs. 2 as bribe and not as freight, the case failed. The evidence of Golap Rai about the payment stands uncorroborated. He said he asked the Station Master for a wagon and was told the freight to be paid. That also is not corroborated by any other evidence. It seems to me also that sufficient attention was not called to the evidence relating to the practice said to have been followed at this Railway Station about the consignment of goods and applications for wagons. If the general rule about applications for wagons can be treated as corroborating the statement of Golap Rai that he applied to the Station Master, it is clear that if the practice as stated by the two witnesses was true, it went against it.

I agree with Mr. Justice Newbou l that the Judge misdirected when he told the Jury that the statement of one accused might be taken for what it was worth against the other. The Judge, no doubt, added that it was practically of no value as evidence, but in a case where there is so little evidence on the main point considerable value may have been attached to these statements.

I think, on the whole, the misdirections above referred to were serious and have occasioned a failure of justice and the conviction ought to be and is accordingly set aside and the accused discharged.

I have been told that the whole of the evidence available has been given in this case, and as it depends upon the evidence of one man who may have been a participator in the fraud on the Railway, and the accused has already been in jail for some months, I do not think that, in the circumstances, a re-trial should be ordered.

Appeal allowed: Conviction set aside;
Accused discharged.

CRIMINAL MISCELLANEOUS No. 216 OF 1919.

December 10, 1919.

SITAL PANDE—APPLICANT

versus

EMPEROR THROUGH NIHAL AND OTHERS—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 526—Application for transfer—Magistrate displeased, whether sufficient ground for transfer.

The fact that a Magistrate by his attitude shows that he is displeased with an accused person is not a sufficient ground for transferring a case.

Miscellaneous application for transfer under section 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Mr. Harnandan Prasad, for the Applicant.

The Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for transfer of what is called a Criminal Case No. 177-11 of 1919 from the Court of a Magistrate of the First Class of Basti to that to any other Magistrate in the District. The application is supported by an affidavit. It is alleged in the so-called affidavit that the Magistrate, without hearing any of the applicant's witnesses and without any case being instituted under section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code, has called upon the applicant to show cause why he should not be required to file a personal bond in the sum of Rs. 1,000 with two sureties in the sum of Rs 500 each, but the other side have been required by the said Court to show cause why they should not be required to file a personal bond for Rs. 500 each with two sureties in the sum of Rs. 250 each for one year. The applicant proceeds to say that this Magistrate has, on various occasions, shown by his attitude that he is displeased with the applicant and many times when he has gone to file some applications he has turned the applicant out of Court and refused to receive his applications and threatened to send the applicant to jail. That, on three occasions, dates specified, the applicant made applications before the aforesaid Magistrate but he refused to take them. That the Magistrate has been threatening to send the applicant to jail and has been expressing his displeasure in various ways, such ways are not specified, and has started proceedings against the applicant under section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code. I understand, then, by this application that what the applicant wants transferred is the requisition of the Magistrate under section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code that the applicant shall show cause why he should not be ordered to execute a bond for keeping the peace. Now, the only person who can deal with proceedings of this kind, [section 107, clause 2, are proceedings where the person informed against (apparently the applicant in the present case) or the place where breach of the peace is apprehended is within the local limits of such Magistrate's jurisdiction] is the Magistrate within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the applicant resides. In the argument addressed to me I have been more than once informed that the Magistrate who issued the requisition is the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. I have not been informed either by the affidavit or elsewhere that there is any other Magistrate who has jurisdiction in this Sub-Division except the Magistrate who has issued the requisition and I also doubt very much indeed, whether under section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure I have power to transfer this proceeding. It is not an enquiry and it is not a trial.

There is no offence. What the Magistrate appears to be intending is to prevent an offence being committed within his jurisdiction. But, over and above these two objections which appear, on the face of the proceeding, sufficient cause has not been shown to me that a fair and impartial enquiry or trial cannot be had before this First Class Magistrate. It seems to me, after hearing the argument, that the applicant has been offended by certain applications of his having been returned to him and from the Magistrate's refusal to receive applications he apprehends that the Magistrate is displeased with him and that the matter will not be impartially enquired into. The learned Vakil who appeared for the applicant put forward what he says were explanations furnished by the Magistrate concerned. How the said Vakil got hold of these I do not know but I do not think that the matter specified in the affidavit amounts to more than exaggerated language. For all these reasons, I am not prepared to order a transfer. The application is dismissed, I am informed by the learned Vakil that he is in possession of a certified copy of the Magistrate's explanation.

CRIMINAL APPLICATION No. 69 OF 1920.

June 15, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Wazir Hasan, A. J. C.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 117—"General repute", meaning of—General repute, evidence of—Character, evidence of—Personal opinions, admissibility of.

Evidence of personal opinions as to the character of an accused person in inquiries under section 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is inadmissible. [p. 684, col. 2.]

Every man is conscious as to what his general reputation is and by necessary association of ideas he is also conscious of the limited or the extensive circle, as the case may be, within which his reputation generally exists. The opinion held by the body of persons within that circle as to his character is his "general repute." Evidence which discloses the opinion of such persons collectively is, therefore, evidence in proof of general reputation. [p. 684, col. 2.]

Evidence of general repute is evidence of a fact which could be heard, and evidence of only such witnesses is admissable who say that they heard the general reputation of the accused to be so and so. Evidence, therefore, which only repeats what the witnesses heard from some specified individuals will be purely hearsay and as such inadmissible. [p. 685, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of the District Magistrate, Sultanpur, dated the 7th Febuary 1920, confirming that of the Magistrate, First Class, Sultanpur, dated the 13th January 1920.

Mr. Har Dhian Chandra, for the Applicant.

The Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—On the basis of information received by means of a report, dated the 20th October 1919, from the Sub-Inspector of Police Station Bazar Shukul, to the effect that the persons named therein were by habit robbers and habitually commit extortion, Mr. Jagdish Prasad, First Class Magistrate (Deputy) of Sultanpur, recorded an order on the 15th November 1919 in terms of section 112 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, giving the substance of the information received and calling upon the applicants and two others to show cause why they should not be ordered each to furnish security to be of good behaviour for one year in the sum of Rs. 100 in his own bond and also one surety for the same amount. Summonses were issued requiring the applicants to appear, and on their appearance they were put on trial under section 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. In the course of the enquiry twenty-two witnesses were examined on behalf of the prosecution and 34 on behalf of the defense. In the result, the learned Deputy Magistrate passed an order on the 13th January 1920, directing each of the applicants to "execute a personal bond in a sum of Rs. 100 and provide a respectable security for Rs. 100 to be of good character for one year." An appeal was preferred from this order to the District Magistrate of Sultanpur, who dismissed it on the 7th Febuary 1920. Aggrieved by the last order the applicants have moved this Court in its criminal revisional jurisdiction.

The only point argued before me was in relation to the nature of evidence upon which the learned Deputy Magistrate has acted. It was contended that the evidence led by the prosecution in this case is inadmissible in law and, therefore, it could not form the basis for the order of conviction which has been passed against the applicants.

Section 117, sub-section (3), of the Code of Criminal Procedure is as follows:—"For the purposes of this section the fact that a person is an habitual offender may be proved by evidence of general repute or otherwise." It is clear to my mind that the word 'otherwise' used in the pre-quoted sub-section does not permit transgression of the rules of evidence as enacted in the Indian Evidence Act. Evidence may be tendered by the prosecution in this proceeding of the existence of the fact that the accused are 'by habit robbers, or habitually commit extortion,' and of such other facts as are declared by the Indian Evidence Act to be relevant, and of no others. (Vide section 5 of the Indian Evidence Act, Act I of 1872). Part II of that Act deals with the manner of Proof of Facts in Issue and of Facts Relevant thereto. All evidence, therefore, whether of 'general repute or otherwise' must be in strict accord with the law of evidence both as regards quid probandum and modus probandi.

Evidence in inquiries contemplated by section 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure must, in the nature of things, consist of evidence relating to the 'character' of the accused. Section 54 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) excludes evidence of bad character of an accused person unless evidence has been given that he has a good character, in which case it becomes admissible. Explanation I to that section, however, provides an exception in cases in which the bad character of any person is in itself a fact in issue. This exception, therefore, is an express sanction for the admission of evidence as to the bad character of an accused person in inquiries under section 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Of course, the 'bad character' in issue in such inquiries is always of the nature specified in section 110 of the same Code and evidence will not be admitted to prove 'bad character' of any other nature. For instance, no evidence will be permitted to show that the accused is a habitual drunkard, or a habitual profligate or a habitual gambler.

The Explanation to section 55 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) is of great importance in this connection.

It is as follows:—

"In sections 52, 53, 54 and 55, the word 'character' includes both reputation and disposition; but (except as provided in section 54) evidence may be given only of general reputation and general disposition; and not of particular acts by which reputation or disposition were shown." (The exception in brackets in the above explanation was introduced by section 7 of Act III of 1891.) This explanation makes it abundantly clear that in inquiries under section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the 'character' in issue of the accused person may be proved by evidence both of general reputation and of general disposition as well as of particular acts by which reputation or disposition were shown. It follows, therefore, that inquiries under section 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure may extend over a very wide range.

The foregoing analysis of the several provisions of the law of evidence brings me to the point also raised at the Bar, whether personal opinion of a witness as to the bad character of an accused person in an inquiry in question is admissible evidence. Is a statement by a witness—'In my opinion (or I think) the accused A, B and C are robbers or (habitual robbers)' good evidence in law?' In my judgment such evidence is inadmissible. It obviously does not fall either within the category of evidence of 'general reputation and general disposition' or of 'particular acts by which reputation or disposition were shown.' To admit such evidence and then to act on it amounts to a complete surrender of the functions of the Judge. The judgment of the witness would be substituted for the judgment of the Court and that, too, on a question which is the fact in issue. It follows, that if a Court bases its order on such evidence, it really exercises no judgment of its own but gives effect to the judgment of the witness. (Bests' Law of Evidence, 11th Edition, section 511, page 487). I have said before that no evidence is admissible unless it relates to facts in issue or facts declared to be relevant thereto by the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act. Section 146 provides for admission of evidence by means of cross examination relating to 'character' of a witness. Section 155 clearly allows evidence to be produced to impeach the credit of a witness. Under sub-section (1) evidence would be allowed to be given of the general reputation as well as of opinion, founded on such knowledge as the person giving evidence has, of the witness, whose veracity is impeached by him. I conceive that the law on this subject is the same in England as above though the second part of it has not remained unquestioned. See Taylor, section 1470A and compare Reg. v. Riley (1).

Section 55 of the Evidence Act (Act I of 1872) declares that in civil cases the fact that the 'character' of any person is such as to affect the amount of damages which he ought to receive is relevant. There, again, evidence as to 'character' will be confined to evidence of general reputation and general disposition (see the explanation to that section). By necessary implication, evidence of personal opinion as to the 'character' of a party will be excluded—Compare the decision of Mr. Justice Cave (now Viscount Cave) in the case of Scott v. Sampson (2).

Evidence of 'general reputation', however, involves to a certain extent evidence of opinion but that is of the belief or opinion of a body of persons, which is essentially different from individual opinion. The general rule, therefore, that individual opinions are inadmissible in proof of facts holds good even with reference to evidence relating to 'character' either in a civil or a criminal proceeding, the only exceptions recognised by the Evidence Act being those which I have mentioned before.

To the broader rule of inadmissibility of opinions in proof of all questions of fact, the Indian Law of Evidence prescribes exceptions by specific provisions of the Act. These exceptions are in general accord with those which are recognised also by the Law of Evidence obtaining in England. They are as follows:—

1. Matters of pedigree (section 32, clause 5, and section 50).
2. Customs and public rights (section 32, clause 4, and sections 48 and 49).
3. Identity of handwriting, point of foreign law, or of science or art, (sections 45 and 47).

This is the whole field which is covered by the exceptions and there is no other exception besides them. I, therefore, must hold that the evidence of personal opinions as to the character of an accused person in inquiries under section 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is inadmissible.

As to what constitutes a man's 'general repute' (section 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure) or 'general reputation' (section 55, Evidence Act), I am of opinion that the idea conveyed by those words is well understood. Every man is certainly conscious as to what his general reputation is and by necessary association of ideas, he is also conscious of the limited or the extensive circle, as the case may be, within which his reputation generally exists. Now, the opinion held by the body of persons within that circle as to his character is, to my mind, his 'general reputation.' The evidence which discloses the opinion of such persons collectively is, therefore, evidence in proof of 'general reputation,' and what that circle is is also capable of being easily proved. It is impossible, however, to define the limits of the circle. It must vary according to the position and circumstances of every particular indivdual. As I said before, the whole idea is better understood than could be defined with any logical precision. I cannot help reproducing here, what appears to me as the best epitome of expositions of the term 'general repute' from an American case quoted by Mr. Wigmore in his Law of Evidence, Volume II, page 1959, Edition 1904—

Campbell, C. J., in Pickens v. State (3):

"General reputation consists in what is generally thought of one by those among whom he resides and with whom he is chiefly conversant. 'Common opinion'; 'that in which there is general concurrence'; 'the prevailing opinion in that circle where one's character is best known'; 'what is generally said by those among whom he associates and by whom he is known'; 'common report among those who have the best opportunity of judging of his habits and integrity'; 'common reputaion among his neighbours and acquaintances,'— are so many forms of expression by which an effort has been made to define wherein consists general reputation."

On my part, I am quite content to accept the advice given in the following passage of Wigmore on Evidence, section 1612, Volume II, pages 1959-60:—

"When it is said that reputation must be general, it is meant that the community as a whole must be agreed on this opinion in order that it may be regarded a reputation. If the estimates vary and public opinion has not reached the stage of definite harmony, the opinion cannot be treated as sufficiently trustworthy. On the other hand, it must be impossible to exact unanimity for there are always dissenters. To define precisely that quality of public opinion thus commonly described as 'general' is, therefore, a difficult thing..... There is on this subject often an attempt at nicety of phrase which amounts in effect to mere quibbling because the witness will not ordinarily appreciate the discriminations. Such requirements of definitions should be avoided as unprofitable."

Section 60 of the Evidence Act lays down that "oral evidence must, in all cases whatever, be direct; that is to say:—.....If it refers to a fact which could be heard, it must be the evidence of a witness who says he heard it."

Evidence as to the general repute is evidence of a fact which could be heard and evidence of only such witnesses is admissible who say that they heard the general reputation of the accused to be so and so. Evidence, therefore, which only repeats what the witness heard from some specified individuals will be purely hearsay and as such inadmissible. It may often happen that the entire evidence of a witness amounts to nothing but 'hearsay upon hearsay'. Such evidence, must not be permitted. As pointed out before, the evidence of general repute to be admissible must in all cases be direct.

Before I conclude my judgment I desire to acknowledge the fact that references were made to the following cases in the course of the arguments at the Bar:—

Kalai Haldar v. Emperor (4), Rajendra Prasad Sahi v. King-Emperor (5), Rup Singh v. King Emperor (6), Nilkamal Das v. Emperor (7), Dunia Singh v. King-Emperor (8), Gokul v. King-Emperor (9), Raghuber Dial v. King-Emperor (10) and Chandi v. Emperor (11).

I have carefully perused these decisions and, if I may say so, have profited by them.

Now, the evidence adduced in this case by the prosecution was read to me from the beginning to the end by the learned Pleader for the applicants and I read it again in my chamber.

The impression which such a study of the evidence has left on my mind is that there are many portions of it which must be rejected as inadmissible. Yet there remains a good bulk which would satisfy the strictest test of admissibility. Such being the conclusion as to the nature of evidence in this case at which I have arrived, it follows that there is ample legal evidence to support the order passed by the Deputy Magistrate and the District Magistrate.

I, therefore, dismiss the application.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 256—Cross-examination of witnesses—Right of accused—Magistrate refusing to summon witnesses for cross-examination without payment of expenses.

Inasmuch as an accused person has the right to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution before the charge is framed, and under section 256 of the Criminal Procedure Code, he has the right to cross-examine these witnesses after the charge is framed, a Magistrate acts illegally who, upon an application by an accused person to summon or re-summon the prosecution witnesses for cross-examination, calls upon the accused to deposit a sum of money before his application would be granted, and on his failing to make such deposit disallows the application. [p. 686, col. 2; p. 687, col. 1.]

An application to summon the prosecution witnesses for cross-examination can be disallowed only if it is frivolous or vexatious and its object is to defeat the ends of justice. [p. 687, col. 1.]

Application against the decision of the Additional District Magistrate, Patna upholding that of the Deputy Magistrate, Behar.

Mr. Y. M. Gauher Ali, for the Petitioners.

Mr. G. C. Pal, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—The accused in this case were tried under section 147 of the Indian Penal Code, by the Deputy Magistrate of Behar and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. They moved the Additional District Magistrate, who, however, thought that there was no ground for interference.

An application has been filed in this Court against this conviction and the main ground that has been urged is that the accused were not given an opportunity to cross-examine a certain witness, Kudrattulla. It may be pointed out that this objection was taken before the Additional District Magistrate, who disposed of this objection in the following terms:—

"Kudrattulla was again summoned as a defense witness. He disobeyed the summons. The trying Magistrate then ordered the issue of a warrant of arrest provided the accused paid the process-fee. The accused never paid the process-fee nor did they file any petition for more time to do so. They were considered to have given up this witness."

To begin with, Kudrattulla was never summoned as a defence witness as appears from the order passed in the case by the trying Magistrate as well as the explanation submitted to this Court by the Additional District Magistrate himself. That being so, it is obvious that the learned Additional Magistrate was in error when he thought that this witness was summoned as a defence witness. Then the question arises, whether the learned trying Magistrate was justified in refusing the application of the accused for re-summoning the witness Kudrattulla for cross-examination. The accused have got the right to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses once before the charge is framed and, secondly, after the charge is framed under section 256 and no Court can legally refuse this application for cross-examination of the prosecution witnesses for the first time after charge. Under section 257, the accused are given the third opportunity of cross-examining the prosecution witnesses. They are entitled to this right, except when the Magistrate finds, and records so in writing, that the application for further cross-examination "is made for the purpose of vexation or delay or for defeating the ends of justice."

Under the proviso to section 257, if the accused have cross examined or had the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses after the charge is framed, the Magistrate cannot be compelled to summon the witnesses unless the Magistrate is satisfied that it is necessary for the purposes of justice. It appears that the Magistrate called upon the accused to deposit Rs. 20 as process-fees for summoning four prosecution witnesses, after the charge had been framed, and these four included witnesses Kudrattulla. The other witnesses appeared in pursuance of the summons, while Kudrattulla did not appear though the sum of Rs. 20 had been deposited by accused for re-summoning Kudrattulla as well as the other three witnesses. The accused applied to the Magistrate to re-summon this witness for cross-examination. The request, in my opinion, ought to have been acceded to, but the Magistrate agreed to call him as a witness provided a sum of another Rs. 20 was deposited for calling him. There is no provision in law which provides the procedure that has been adopted by the Magistrate. If he really thought that the application was frivolous and vexatious and would defeat the ends of justice he should have rejected the application and recorded his reasons for doing so as required by law. If the application was frivolous and vexatious, it could not be otherwise by payment of Rs. 20 by the accused. Therefore, I take it that the Magistrate never thought that the application was designed to defeat the ends of justice. In my opinion, the learned Magistrate committed an error in calling upon the accused to pay another sum of Rs. 20 for calling a prosecution witness for cross-examination, a right which the accused were perfectly entitled to exercise under the law. I have no doubt the Additional Magistrate in appeal would have allowed an opportunity for the cross-examination of this witness if he had not been under the impression, and I say an erroneous impression, that Kudrattulla was summoned as a defence witness.

Under the circumstances, I have no alternative but to allow the petitioners an opportunity for cross examining Kudrattulla who must be summoned by the Court without asking the accused to pay any further process-fee.

It has been pointed out by the Additional District Magistrate that Kudrattulla was not an important witness. That may be so, but it is not my province to enquire at present as to who were the witnesses whose evidence influenced the Magistrate in convicting the accused. If I were hearing an appeal, or if I had decided to go into the whole evidence, in that case alone I would have been in a position to agree or disagree with the Magistrate. Where I find that an illegality has been committed it is my duty to see that this wrong is set right, and the accused, if they are to be convicted, must be convicted after fair trial.

Under the circumstances, I make the Rule absolute, set aside the conviction and sentence and send the case back to the trying Magistrate for an opportunity to be given to the accused for the cross-examination of witness Kudrattulla.

Rule made absolute.

EMPEROR THROUGH GYASIA—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 203—Complaint, dismissal of—Subsequent complaint on same facts before successor of previous Magistrate, whether maintainable.

The fact that a complaint has been dismissed by a Magistrate is no bar to the entertainment of a second complaint upon the same facts by the successor-in-office of that Magistrate. [p. 688, col. 1.]

Criminal reference by the Sessions Judge, Agra, dated the 28th May 1920.

Messrs. Nehal Chand and K. R. Dang, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The essential facts are that Gyasia presented to a Magistrate of the First Class, who apparently is also a Sub-Divisional Officer, or at least exercises some of the powers of a Sub-Divisional Officer, on the 10th of April 1920, a complaint in which he alleged that Mohan Singh and others had committed certain offences punishable under the Indian Penal Code. The Magistrate examined Gyasia and then passed an order transferring the case for disposal to another Magistrate of subordinate jurisdiction. The application in revision does not challenge the order on the ground that the Magistrate to whom the case was transferred was not subordinate to the Magistrate before whom the complaint was presented, the contention is that the lattter had no jurisdiction to entertain Gyasia's complaint or to take cognizance of the offences therein referred to, because on a previous date another Magistrate had dismissed a complaint filed by Gyasia on the same facts. I have seen the order in question; it was apparently passed under section 203 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. though the Magistrate does not say so. That Magistrate had been transferred from the district before the 10th of April 1920 and the learned Sessions Judge seems to be satisfied that the Magistrate whose order is now called in question was the successor-in-office of the Magistrate who had dismissed Gyasia's first complaint. At any rate, he says that the complaints must be regarded as having been presented in the same Court. It has to be admitted that there is no section of the Code of Criminal Procedure which, either expressly or by implication, bars the jurisdiction of the second Magistrate to take cognizance of this complaint.

The learned Sessions Judge, however, is of opinion that this Court should interfere in order to enforce the principle laid down by a Bench of this Court in Queen-Empress v. Adam Khan (1). On its facts, the present case is practically identical with that of Ram Bharos v. Baban (2). This is a decision by a single Judge, but it is founded on various cases, as for instance that of William Cecil Keymer v. Emperor (3), in which it has been held that a Magistrate who has tried and discharged an accused person on particular charges has jurisdiction to commence a fresh enquiry into the same charges on a second complaint. The learned Sessions Judge expresses his apprehension that, if the decision in Queen-Empress v. Adam Khan (1) is treated as limited to cases in which a complaint might have been brought before either of two Courts exercising co-ordinate jurisdiction in the matter at one and the same time, and if it be held that the principle laid down in Ram Bharos v. Baban (2) is of general application where the presiding officer of a Court has been transferred and the second complaint is lodged before his successor-in-office, the result will be that the principle laid down in the former of the two decisions "will have very small scope." The concluding words of the judgment in that case seem to me to show that the learned Judges who decided it intended that it should have very small scope. I may add that I have taken into consideration also the particular facts of this present case, because I have no doubt that it would be within my jurisdiction to quash the order complained of and to direct the dismissal of the complaint merely on the ground that the record did not show that the interests of justice would be served by the further enquiry which has now been initiated. The essential facts are that there were cross-complaints by Gyasia against Mohan Singh and others and by Mohan Singh against Gyasia. A Magistrate took cognizance of both complaints, but proceeded to try Mohan Singh's complaint first. He recorded in that case, as evidence for the defence, the evidence which Gyasia would have produced in support of his complaint, but he convicted Gyasia and sentenced him to fine and imprisonment. This conviction was subsequently set aside by the Sessions Court. In the meantime, however, Gyasia's complaint had been brought before the successor-in-office of the Magistrate who had passed judgment on Mohan Singh's complaint. That Magistrate passed the order of dismissal under section 203 of the Criminal Procedure Code, on the ground that Gyasia's evidence had been heard and disbelieved by his predecessor when it was produced as evidence for the defence in the case in which Mohan Singh was complainant. Under these circumstances, and in view more particularly of the fact that the conviction of Gyasia has been set aside by the Court of Appeal, I do not feel disposed to interfere with the order now complained of, unless I were compelled to do so on the ground that it was wholly illegal and without jurisdiction. I am satisfied that this it was not. Let the record be returned.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

APPEAL No. 372 OF 19.7.

August 27, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar and Mr. Justice Burn.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL—DEFENDANT No. 1—APPELLANT

Sri Rajah BOMMADEVARA VENKATANARASIMHA NAIDU BAHADUR ZAMINDAR GARU (DEAD) AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS NOS. 1 TO 3—DEFENDANT NO. 2—RESPONDENTS.

Riparian owners, rights of—Navigable river, what is—River not navigable during some months, effect of—Adverse possession—Owner, ignorance of, effect of—Limitation, running of, whether arrested.

Riparian owners on the banks of a river are entitled to the bed of the river up to midstream, if the river is one which, although navigable for the greater part of the year according to the ordinary sense of the term "navigable", is not a navigable river according to the meaning of that term as used in Indian Courts, that is, is not navigable throughout the year because it ceases to be so during several months in the year. [p. 692, col. 1.]

Where the true owner of land, having the opportunity to acquaint himself with all the facts and the law, and not being led into any error by the fraud of a party, sees that party openly enjoying the land and claiming it as owner, the true owner cannot, in order to arrest limitation, plead ignorance of the law which made him unaware of his right to possession. [p. 696, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Masulipatam in Original Suit No. 83 of 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

The Government Pleader (Mr. V. Ramesam), for the Crown:—The plaintiffs' claim to the river-bed is unsustainable. The Sanad of 1803 to plaintiffs' ancestors does not include that portion of the river bed of the Krishna river bordering on the five villages now in question up to the middle of the river-bed.

The Common Law as to the ownership of river-beds should not be imported in its entirety in this country without regard to its conditions. Though the river Krishna is not tidal where it runs past the plaintiffs' villages, it is still navigable in the wide sense of the term. The fact that it is not navigable in some portions of the year will not displace the presumption that the beds of navigable rivers belong to the Crown. See Farnham on Waters, Volume I, page 100. The American Courts have adopted the view that the water need not be continuously navigable. Navigability alone is the test of whether the bed of a stream is presumed to vest in the Crown.

The accretions or additions due to the deposit of alluvial matters are not due to natural causes. Nor have they been imperceptible. It is in evidence that these formations are largely due to the operations undertaken by the Government under the Rivers Conservancy Act. The plaintiffs can lay no claim to them.

The Hon'ble B. N. Sarma (with him Mr. R. Narasimham and K. Aravamudu Aiyangar), for the Respondents:—The Crown Sanad of 1803 did include the river-beds. Even if it is not so expressly stated in the deed of grant, there is no doubt that it was so understood by the parties. The evidence, oral and documentary, and the public records establish this fact beyond all doubt. The records show that even before 1802 the river-bed was regarded as an integral part of the villages on the banks. The estate granted in 1802 must be deemed to have comprised what was then understood to be their limits. From the time of the Permanent Settlement the records show that the Government exercised no acts of ownership over the river beds adjoining the plaintiffs' villages. The plaintiffs were in possession and enjoyment of all the Lankas.

As to the law, there is no reason to depart from the English Common Law. It is conceded for appellant that the river Krishna is non-tidal when it passes through the plaintiffs' villages. It cannot be said to be a navigable river as for six months it dwindles into a petty stream passing through sand. The test of navigability is its being available for passage of vessels at all times and seasons. Being non-navigable the bed of the river on the banks of these villages belongs to the riparian owner. The American decisions should not be treated as authority. And even they are not uniform.

As to alluvial accretions they have, in the main, been due to natural causes, i.e., floods, etc. The fact that they were aided by Government operations will not deprive the landowner of his right or vest a new right in the Crown.

SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA v. BOMMADEVARA VENKATANARASIMHA.

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The pleadings are sufficiently set out in the judgment to be pronounced by my learned brother and I shall not, therefore, repeat them in detail. Numerous questions were argued in this appeal, but I think it necessary to consider and decide only the following as the other questions would fall to be considered only if I had decided the questions 2 to 4 against the plaintiffs. The questions I propose to consider are,—

(1) Is the river Krishna a public navigable river at the place where the plaintiffs' five villages abut on the river?

(2) Are the plaintiffs, as riparian proprietors, entitled to the bed of the river Krishna up to the mid-stream so far as it runs along side the villages of Pedapulipaka, Chodavaram, Madduru, Royyuru and Vallur?

(3) Apart from their right as riparian proprietors, did the plaintiffs' predecessors-in-title acquire the ownership of the river-bed by reason of the grant made by the Government at the time of the Permanent Settlement?

(4) Have the plaintiffs acquired title to the river bed in question by reason of exclusive possession or enjoyment?

(5) Are the plaintiffs entitled to mesne profits, as claimed in paragraph 28 (c) of the plaint, and, if so, what is the amount to be awarded?

The river Krishna is tidal and navigable for a distance of eight miles from above the place where it falls into the sea. Beyond the said eight miles it ceases to be tidal but it is navigable for about five months in the year between June and November for a length of about fifty eight miles up to the Bezwada anicut. The lands in dispute lie in a portion of this length commencing from about three and a-half miles below the anicut and have been raised from the river-bed by the deliberate reclamation operations carried on by the Government (acting under the powers given to the Government by the Rivers Conservancy, Madras, Act, No. VI of 1884), the reclamations having taken place between 1897 and 1912.

The plaintiffs' contention is that the breadth of the river-bed has always been apportioned between the villages on both banks as portions of the areas of the villages themselves and that the 700 odd acres in dispute raised from the river-bed formed part of the plaintiffs' five Zemindary villages even before the levels of the lands were so raised up. The suit was laid in ejectment of the Government who, having entered upon the lands for the purpose of doing Conservancy operations under the Statute (which does not allow of interference with the plaintiffs' enjoyment as owners except to the extent necessary to carry on the Conservancy operations), illegally dispossessed them from the lands in 1911.

The literal meaning of the word 'navigable' seems to be, "affording facilities for steering ships through." Facilities for passage of large river crafts which may not be capable of rising to the dignity of ships seem to be generaly considered sufficient to call a river, affording such facilites, a "navigable" river. The legal presumption governing the ownership in the beds of the navigable portions of rivers have been elaborately argued before us. As regards the portion of a river-bed where a river is both tidal and navigable, there is of course, a very strong presumption that it belongs to the Crown. The river-bed portion we have to deal with in this case lies in the length of the river which is non tidal and hence the diffioulty. As I said already, the river is not navigable during at least half the year. Lankas and keelankas (miniature peninsulas bounded by the river bank) are formed after each flood and changes in the formation and area of old lankas take place almost every year in the length under dispute. Can the river portion be called "navigable" in the legal sense under the circumstances? If it is non-navigable in the legal sense, the Full Bench decision in Vasireddi Venkata Lakshmi Narasamma v. Secretary of State for India (1) applies, and the bed of the river, up to the middle line of the water-breadth from the left bank, belongs to the plaintiffs. In England, the term 'navigable' seems to be used in its legal sense to connote the meaning "tical and navigable." In America, the legal meaning seems to differ in different States. In Srinath Roy v. Dinabandhu Sen (2), the following observations of the Privy Council occur at pages 529 to 531*. "The question how far a rule established in this country (that is, England) can be usefully applied in another, whose circumstances, historical, geographical, and social are widely different, is well illustrated by the case of navigability, as understood in the law of the different States of the United States of America ...The Courts of the different States, minded alike to follow the Common Law where they could, found themselves in the latter part of the eighteenth and the early part of the nineteenth centuries constrained by physical and geographical conditions to treat it differently...The reasoning has been put pointedly in Pennsylvania. Chief Justice Tilghman says in 1810 in Carson v. Blazer (3), 'the Common Law principle concerning rivers', (viz., that rivers, where the tide does not ebb and flow, belong to the owners of adjoining lands on either side), 'even if extended to America, would not apply to such a river as the Susquehanna, which is a mile wide and runs several hundred miles through a rich country, and which is navigable and is actually navigated by large boats. If such a river had existed in England no such law would ever have been applied to it.' Thirty years later in Zimmerman v. Union Canal Company (4), President Porter observes, 'the rules of the Common Law of England in regard to the rivers and the rights of riparian owners do not extend to this Commonwealth, for the plain reason that rules applicable to such streams as they have in England above the flow of the tide, scarcely one of which approximate to the size of the Swatara, would be inapplicable to such streams as the Susquehanna, the Allegheny, the Monongahela,' and sundry other 'rivers of Damascus.' A similar deviation, equally grounded in good sense, from the strict pattern of the English Law of waters lies at the bottom of the current of Indian cases previously referred to, and forms its justification.

"In proposing to apply the juristic rules of a distant time or country to the conditions of a particular place at the present day, regard must be had to the physical, social and historical conditions to which that rule is to be adapted." Having regard then to the historical, geographical, social and physical conditions of India, is there any presumption which could be safely made as to the ownership of the bed of a river like the Krishna in that portion of its length which has the characteristics and is affected by the seasonable fluctuations already referred to? The river in the hot season during six months in the year dwindles away into an insignificant stream fordable everywhere opposite to the disputed length and of the depth of a foot or one and-a-half feet. In Sri Balusu Ramalakshmamma v. Collector of Godavari District (5) their Lordships of the Privy Council say that they "required to know much more about the river in question" (the river in question in that suit being the Godaveri) "and the mode in which it has been dealt with, before deciding as to the presumption" (that is, the presumption whether the bed up to the medium line belongs to the owner of the bank) "or its rebuttal". In Ohunder Jaleah v. Ram Ohurn Mookerjee (6) it was held, having regard to the conditions in India that even if a river is navigable throughout the year, though it may not be tidal, the Government may grant exclusive fishing rights therein to individuals against the claims of the general public. But where the river portion in dispute is not navigable throughout the year, the river is not in Bengal considered "navigable" in the legal sense. (The reason put forward in some English decisions, namely, that where the river portion in dispute is covered by fresh water there is a presumption that riparian owners have been exercising the usual riparian rights, but where, owing to the action of the tide, the water is or tends to become saltish the presumption is the other way does not, in my opinion, apply to Indian conditions just as it has been held not to apply to conditions in America.)

in this country the test as to whether a river is navigable, is whether it allows of the passage of boats at all times of the year".

I think that, having regard to the nature of the river portion in dispute (the bed being yearly replenished with fresh fertile soil, the Lankas formed in the bed having been cultivated as a matter of course as hamlets and appurtenance of the villages on both banks and the Zemindars having allowed sand and silt to be removed from the bed of the river only on payment of license fees) and the entire evidence in this case on both sides which conclusively establishes that proprietorship in the entire bed area was treated as distributed from time immemorial among the villages on both banks, no legal presumption arises that the portion of the river in question which is not navigable during at least half the year, belongs to the State. Such a presumption has, no doubt, been raised in some American cases, namely, that the bed of a navigable river, though not tidal, and though it is not navigable throughout the year, belongs to the State provided it is navigable during well established seasons; but, as their Lordships of the Privy Council point out, its justifiability depended probably on special geographical, social and other conditions. I would, therefore, answer the first question thus: The river Krishna is a river navigable for about six months in the year in the portion now in dispute according to the ordinary sense of the term "navigable" but it is not a navigable river according to the meanings of the term 'navigable' as used in Indian Courts, because it is not navigable throughout the year and ceases to be so during several months in the year.

Coming to the second question, the legal presumption as to the ownership of the bed of a non-navigable river applies, I think, to the Krishna river in the portion in dispute. The plaintiffs, as owners of the villages on the left bank, would, therefore, be entitled to the bed of the river up to the mid-stream.

I shall now shortly deal with the third question. The Sanad granted to the plaintiffs' ancestors for the Vallur estate is Exhibit D, dated February 1803. In paragraph 3 of the Sanad or grant, ten villages of the Vallur Zemindari are mentioned, including the plaint five villages of Peddapulipaka, Chodavaram, Madduru, Royurru and Vallur. When the Government granted these villages, did they or did they not intend to include that portion of the river bed of the Krishna river bordering on these five villages up to the middle of the river bed or up to any other line which included definite areas of the river-bed Ayacut in those villages? Does the evidence show that these villages were, at the time of the grant, understood to include portions of the river bed, portions of (what is called in the old documents) the river Ayacut? It was conceded by the learned Government Pleader (and it could not but be conceded on the evidence) that the Lankas and Keelankas which had been raised out of the bed of the river in the portion of the breadth of the river bed adjacent to the dry Ayacut of the villages were treated as parts of the villages from before the date of the Sanad. Exhibit A is a report of Mr. John Reads, Collector, dated November 1800, to the Board of Revenue, submitting statement of the details of the Vallur Samut in connection with the proposed sale of the above Samut by the East India Company. It was in pursuance of this report that the villages, which were Havelly villages, were afterwards sold as Zemindari estate in 1802 and granted to the plaintiffs' ancestor as the highest bidder at the sale and the Sanad, Exhibit D, was issued to him. In Exhibit A, the yield from the cultivable lands of these villages is noted and one of the items of produce (on the value of which the Government assessment was roughly estimated) is mentioned as "mustard seed to be sown on the islands left by the subsiding of the Krishna river." Cultivation of mustard is admittedly done only in the clayey soil formed in the river bed after a flood. In Exhibit K9 reference is made to a dispute as to boundary between Peddapulipaka (one of the plaint five villages) and Prattur, a village on the opposite bank of the Krishna. It mentions a settlement made in 1802 and to a Mahazar prepared then, fixing the boundaries of several villages. In fact, the whole of Exhibit K9, part of Mr. Newill's report, indicates conclusively that boundary disputes between the villages on both banks of the river had been occurring every few years from, at least, the middle of the 18th century. Reference is made (See page 370 of the printed papers, Volume II) to a proposal made in May 1848 to tread the boundary line between a village and a Lanka and to the Collector having given orders for the boundary to be trodden accordingly, it being admitted that the Lanka had formerly belonged to Devarakota village which became a separate village about the year 1753. Some explanation is necessary as to what the "treading" of the boundary means. An island has formed in the river bed. It is claimed either partly or wholly by a village on the left bank as included within the limits of that village and it is also claimed by a village on the opposite bank as included within the limits of that village, it being always assumed without question that the breadth of the river bed is part of the total area of the villages on the opposite banks (Of course, it sometimes happens, when the island is a comparatively long one, that the dispute is also inter se between two contiguous villages on the same side of the river, the question then being which portion of the length of the island belongs to each village. The dispute however is more often between villages on the opposite banks.) Whenever such disputes arose, the procedure laid down in some of the old Hindu Smrities seems to have been followed. I shall now quote some verses from Brahaspati. (See Sacred Books of the East, Volume 33, page 352.) "In default of witnesses and signs, even a single man, agreeable to both parties, may fix the boundary, wearing a red garland of flowers and a red cloak, putting earth on his head, adhering to truth and having kept a fast," The old practice seems to have been for such a man to "tread" the boundary line and thereby fix it. He first keeps a fast, wears a red garland of flowers and a red cloak, keeps also a vow of silence till he finishes his work and fixes the boundary by walking along the line which in his opinion forms the boundary. Almost always, the man selected for doing it is an old man trusted by the villagers on both sides. After he finishes the treading of the boundary, he bathes, breaks the vow of silence and breaks his fast. This seems to have been done several times, according to the documentary evidence in this case, wherever disputes arose. The earliest date of such treading to which reference is made in the evidence is, as I said before, about 1750.

At page 360, second volume, a document of 1768 is referred to where a dispute arose about a Lanka or island in the bed of the river between two or three villages. Then in Volume I, page 128, a Mahazar of 1790 is mentioned which related to the settlement of a dispute about Buraga Lanka between Kollpara. Iyeloor and Moolakalapully by "treading the boundary under order of the Guntur Circuit Committee," and it states that the boundary was "trodden with all due ceremonies in the presence of the Desmooks and Curnams and others of 22 villages of Guntur and Masulipatam as particularized and signed by all parties". Then the running of the boundary lines is described showing that the boundary lines went sometimes across and along the bed of the river, and that stones were fixed some in the bed and some in the islands. In fact, every village on the banks (it is clear from the evidence) had as a matter of course, besides its dry Ayacut area, its river-bed—Ayacut area, and the river bed Ayacut area is treated as situated in and as part of the village itself. Again, in Volume II, page 338, there is a Mahazar, dated 10th February 1799, referred to as given by Desapondees, head farmer Karnams and others of several villages, and it records the treading of the boundary between Rayoor and Vallur (two villages on the same side of the river) by Ooppooloor Narasayya of Rayoor in the presence of both parties and of Thanadars after the usual ceremonies. Then it says: "Descend into the river in the direction of the opposite boundary between Moonanghy and Vallabhapuram giving the part on the west to Royyur and on the east to Valloor." So, on page 115 of Volume I, we find river bed (including island) described as a certain area and as part of a village on the bank. Koodalies, or boundary erections, are stated to have been found in the river bed itself. This was in 1800 before the year of the Sanad (1803). Mr. Newill when fixing boundaries between 1848 and 1850 of all the villages on both banks of the river was undoubtedly of opinion that from time immemorial the whole of the river breadth had belonged in definite portions to the villages on both banks (the villagers making such claims as a matter of right before him). The references to the treading of boundaries along and across the river-bed and on the Lankas and the erection of Koodalies from about 1750 fully support Mr. Newill's opinion. The relative frequency of these boundary disputes is explained by the following extracts from Mr. Elliot's report:—"The changes of form produced in the banks of a great river—always considerable and increasing in importance as it approaches the alluvial tracts adjacent to its delta—become still more conspicuous in the case of a tropical stream. For six months, its bed is nearly dry; during the remaing six, it is filled by a succession of floods, or freshes as they are called, rushing down with sudden violence and as rapidly subsiding. At its greatest height, the water (unrestrained as regards the Kistna by artificial embankments) overtops its ordinary limits, which, parched and cracked by the previous drought, are easily crumbled and washed away. The comminuted particles of earth suspended in the water, are deposited as the velocity of the current decreases, in the shape of new formations. The work of alternate abrasion and accumulation continually proceeds. Islands already thrown up are modified in shape and extent by succeeding floods. Sometimes they are swept away bodily and new deposits make their appearance in some more favoured locality."

"5. Under the operation of such causes, the bed of the Kistna is found to have undergone considerable vicissitudes in the lapse of time, some of the most remarkable of which ascertained from a comparison of his own survey with that of 1816—9, Mr. Newill has noticed. They do not seem, however, materially to effect the general direction of the river's course, or to increase the area of its bed. Nor do the new formations of land exercise an important influence on the value of particular villages, the gain in one place or at one period being compensated by corresponding losses at others. After considerable aberrations, the river often returns exactly to its former bounds, but where other forces are brought into play, as occurs within the range of the tide, the deviations are more prominent."

"73. I may here venture to offer a few remarks upon the native mode usually adopted for the settlement of disputes by "treading the boundary," which, although popular, seems very seldom to produce any very fair or satisfactory results. I may instance among others the Royyur, Walloor, and Valabhapooram case, and that of Sreekakulam and Lunkapulli even more recent, and in looking through the old records connected with the Krishna disputes it may be remarked that such modes of settlement have in most cases been attended with violent assaults, or at least otherwise have called forth the dissatisfaction of one party or the other."

Paragraph 75 of Mr. Newill's report also shows that the decision as to whether a particular island belongs to one village or the other depended upon whether it had been raised above that portion of the river-bed Ayacut which was included within the boundary line of the particular village. I think that what I have stated is sufficient to establish that, from long before the Settlement of 1803, a village on the river Krishna in the disputed length was always held to include the portion of the river-bed opposite to it and, generally, up to the central line of the river bed and hence to include all the Lankas and Keelankas within that river-bed area. That the boundaries were fixed so as to include river-beds even in places where no Lankas had been formed or where the areas of the islands were wholly insignificant is clear from pages 252 to 255 of Volume II of the printed records. For instance, in the village of Poppur the river Ayacut is said to be 303 acres in extent in which is included a small island near the river bank. That the centre of the stream was the idea in fixing the river-bed is shown from both Mr. Newill's report and the plans prepared by him (see especially Exhibit L also K12 and L1) fixing the boundary lines which followed as far as possible the old lines of the 1816 survey and from the following passage in page 255:—(Ayacut of river to the above limit, 235 acres, above this point there are not likely to be any disputes as the river is deep and rocky and the centre of the stream, as laid down in the old survey of 1816, may be taken as the boundary between the Masulipatam and Guntur Districts."

preciated the strength of the plaintiffs' case on this point, and yet, in paragraph 20 of his judgment, comes to the conclusion that the grant of the villages in 1803 by the Crown (following the sale to the highest bidder in 1802) cannot be considered as necessarily including the transfer of the river-bed Ayacut as part of the Wallur Samut villages. His main reason is, that grants by the Crown must be construed strictly in favour of the Crown; but I think, even giving full weight to that principle, the facts and circumstances already referred to almost conclusively establish that the grant of the ten villages (on which peishkush was fixed with reference to the income derivable from the villages, such income including what was obtained by the cultivation of mustard in the Lankas in the river-bed) included the river Ayacut area which had always been considered as portions of the village areas called by definite names and indicated by definite boundaries. Tha fact that under the English Law relating to the title of riparian owners, no claim to the bed of a non-tidal river was made by the Crown and the fact that the East India Company was probably more under the influence of legal notions derived from the English Law than the Local Governments of these days must also be given some weight in considering what was intended to be granted under the Sannad of 1803 and what was intended to be sold at the auctions of 1802.

Further, even assuming for argument's sake that there is reasonable doubt or ambiguity as to what the Sanad of 1803 intended to include, it has been held that, in such cases of doubt, the nature of the subsequent possession by the grantee and the conduct and declaration of the parties from and after the grant can be legitimately referred to as evidence of the nature and extent of the grant. See Secretary of State for India v. Nellakutti Siva Subramania Tevar (8), where it was observed that acts of enjoyment and assertions of ownership should be ascribed to title if that is the reasonable inference; Lord Advocate v. Lord Blantyre (9), Attorney General for Ireland v. Vandeleur (10), Construing the grant in the light of such enjoyment, conduct, assertions and declarations, there can be no reasonable difficulty in finding that it must have also included the river Ayacuts adjoining the dry Ayacuts of the villages.

I shall now deal with the fourth question relating to prescription and limitation. The learned Subordinate Judge has dealt with this question in paragraphs 27 and 28 of his judgment. I fully concur in his conclusions on the facts. The entire evidence in the case supports his conclusions, and I shall state them in his own words." The plaintiffs had been enjoying the river bed as forming part and parcel of the respective adjoining villages since the date of Mr. Newill's statement, that is, from January 1853, when it was sanctioned by the Local Government up to date of disputes raised in the matter in November 1911. The plaintiffs alone have been exclusively enjoying the fishery in their portion of the river leasing out the same to others latterly (vide Exhibits RR33, Y39, KK3, SS34, KK1, KK5, KK2, 4, 7, 6 and 8 and Exhibits LLL series); they alone have been exercising control over the taking of sand from the river-bed, levying some fees for permitting others to take it and obstructing others from taking it without their permission; and they alone have been from the earliest times enjoying all the Lanka formations in the river bed in question both old and new, and in the surveys made by the Government after Mr. Newill's Settlement. which were made once in the sixties and a second time in the nineties; "the river-bed opposite to each village of the Samuth was demarcated as part of the area of that village according to the limits fixed by Mr. Newill. In fact, all this was practically admitted" by the appellent "during the arguments of the case. Exhibits EE, etc, and some of the documents in Exhibits Y series relate to the period preceding the date of Mr. Newill's commission (commission being in 1848) and subsequent to the date of the Permament Settlement (1803) and these show that the plaintiffs' predecessor alone had been enjoying the Lankas in the river-bed claimed by plaintiffs both the old ones that existed at the date of the Permanent Settlement and those that appeared since." It seems to me clear that on these facts the possession of the plaintiffs' and their ancestors as owners of the river-bed Ayacut dated at least from 1803. The learned Subordinate Judge, by a process of reasoning which I cannot follow, came to the conclusion that their possession as owners began only in 1853 when the Government adopted and confirmed Mr. Newill's report, and that the plaintiffs' ancestors' possession prior to 1853 must be confined to the areas of the Lankas formed on the plaintiffs' side of the river-bed Ayacut area and should not be extended to the area periodically covered by floods. For arriving at this opinion he has pushed to an undue and inadmissible length the doctrine that a trespasser should be held to be in possession of only those portions of the area trespassed upon which he was able to bring under his actual and effective occupation. In the first place, the Zemindars were not trespassers as the Government made no claim to the river-bed Ayacut after 1803 till 1911. In the next place, the Lankas, the fisheries and the sand in the river-bed have always been claimed by the plaintiffs as owners of the river-ayacut though effective occupation of the sand was intermittent owing to the sanded area being periodically covered by floods. Having regard to the nature of the disputed lands, the possession of the important areas throughout, the possession of fishery rights whenever they could be exercised, and the control over the sands whenever they were exposed, I think that the possession of the plaintiffs constituted an indivisible possession of the whole river ayacut. Further, I have been unable to understand why 1853 should be taken as the date when the plaintiffs had effective possession of the whole river ayacut area which is included in their villages when their possession of 1153 was exactly similar to their possession before 1853 and from 1803. Again, if we take it that the Government's admission as to ownership of the river Ayacut must be taken as the date when plaintiffs' possession of the river Ayacut began to be adverse to the Government, the Government, when they appointed Mr. Newill in 1848 directing him to define the boundaries of the villages on both banks of the river, knew that the owners of the villages claimed the river-bed as included in the area of their villages, though they were disputing as to the exact boundary lines in the river-beds and Lankas. It was on the footing that the whole river-bed area in the river length in question belonged to the owners of the villages on both banks and not to the Government that the Government asked Mr. Newill to demarcate the boundaries. The plaintiffs' possession of the river Ayacut just opposite to his village as owner to the knowledge of and adversely to the Government must, therefore, have commenced at least in 1843, that is, more than sixty years before suit.

The learned Government Pleader in the course of his arguments, remarked that even if the Government knew more than sixty years before 1911 that the plaintiffs' ancestors were in enjoyment of the river-bed area claiming it as owners, the Government were then probably under the influence of (according to the learned Vakil) the erroneous view as to the law governing the ownerships of the bed of non-tidal but navigable rivers, that is, that the Government were ignorant of their own rights and that in 1911 they first became aware of their legal rights. I am not sure that he based any serious argument on the above statement. If the true owner A having the opportunity to acquaint himself with all the facts and the law and not being led into any error by the fraud of the opposite party B sees B enjoying A's land openly, claiming it as owner, limitation against A cannot cease to run till the ignorance of law on the part of A which led him into thinking that the land really belonged to B is removed. (The Limitation Act relieves against ignorance only in cases under sections 5, 14 and 18). It has been held that even ignorance of his dispossession will not save the true owner. (See cases quoted in footnote 4 in page 6 of Rustomjee's Law of Limitation) much less ignorance of law which made him unaware of his right to possession. In the result, I would decide the fourth question also in the plaintiff's favour.

The last and fifth question formulated by me relates to the question of mesne profits. I agree with the finding of the Subordinate Judge that the first five years' fresh Lanka formations yield about Rs. 30 an acre and the next five years about Rs. 50 an acre and afterwards about Rs. 15 an acre per annum. See P. W. No. 23. The extent of the land in dispute is 704 acres. The plaintiffs lost possession in November 1911 Fasli 1321. The Subordinate Judge assessed the profits only at Rs. 20 an acre for Fasli 1321 instead of Rs. 30 which the defendant could have got from the land in that Fasli if the defendant had cultivated them. The reasons given by the Subordinate Judge for not allowing Rs. 30 an acre for Fasli 1321, cannot be supported, the reasons being that defendant did not actually cultivate the lands and left them lie waste in Fasli 1321, and that their normal income after they lose their special fertility should be taken as the standard of the damages to be awarded for Fasli 1321. The standard is laid down in Order XX, rule 20, clause 2, Code of Civil Procedure, namely, the profits which the person in wrongful possession might, with ordinary diligence, have received from the property together with interest. Applying this correct standard the plaintiffs should be allowed Rs. 30 an acre with interest thereon at 6 per cent. from the end of the Fasli. The award of the lower Court will be modified accordingly.

Further, though the plaintiffs prayed in paragraph 28, clause (c), for future profits up to the date of the delivery of possession, that prayer has not been considered in drawing up the decree. I would, therefore, grant future profits also at the varying rates mentioned in the above finding till delivery of possession or till date of expiry of three years from the date of the final decree whichever event first occurs. A supplemental decree for mesne profits till 1st July 1919 will be at once drawn up, and another similar decree or other similar decrees afterwards on plaintiffs' application or applications. The appeal will be dismissed with costs. (Vakil's fee Rs. 2,000). The appellant will also pay the respondents' costs of the memorandum of objections proportionate on Rs. 7,040. Three months will be allowed to Government for payment of moneys awarded to the plaintiffs.

BURN, J.—The first plaintiff in this action is the Zemindar of North Vallur and second and third plaintiffs are his sons. The first plaintiff died in the course of the proceedings. The estate of Vallur was granted to an ancestor of the plaintiffs under a permanent Sanad (Exhibit D) in 1802. Prior to that the estate had formed portion of the Haveli lands of the East India Company. These were sold in auction and the Sanad was granted to the purchaser. In 1906 the northern portion of the property was allotted to the first plaintiff in a partition. The Zemindari is situate a few miles below Bezwada on the left of the Krishna, and the five villages of Pedapulipaka, Chipadavarm, Madduru, Royyur and Vallur abut on the bank of that river for a total distance of ten miles. At the time of the Permanent Settlement the river formed at this point the boundary between the districts of Masulipatam and Guntur, and this state of things continued till 1859 when the two districts were amalgamated into the Kistna District. As a result of re-arrangements effected in 1905 the river is once more a boundary, the Guntur District lying to the south and the Kistna District on the north of the river, bed. The villages on the right bank opposite to the Vallur Estate were also permanently settled in 1802 and the grant was made in favour of a member of the Vasireddi family. This property was brought to sale in 1846 for arrears of peshkush and purchased by Government. Since that year, the villages have been held on ordinary ryotwari tenure.

In 1894 operations were begun under the Rivers Conservancy Act (Mad. Act VI of 1884) with the object of confining the course of the river Kistna within defined bounds in the centre of its bed. A survey of the river was made and training works were started on both banks but it is asserted that little progress was made with these until 1897. The measures were directed towards aiding the deposit of alluvial matter brought down in time of floods by lessening the velocity of the current. The nature of the works will be referred to later. At this point it will be enough to say that, between the commencement of the Conservancy operations and up to 1912, when this suit was instituted, considerable additions had been made to the left bank of the river. These formed a strip of solid ground of varying width along, practically, the whole ten miles of the river frontage of the plaintiffs' estate and occupying what previously had been part of the river bed. In August 1911 the first plaintiff applied under section 11 of Act VI of 1884 for permission to cultivate this land and in November of that year he was informed that the Government claimed ownership of the land. This suit was, therefore, instituted to obtain a declaration of the plaintiffs' rights and possession from the defendants. The plaintiffs claim the new formations, (1) as riparian proprietors entitled to half the bed of the river, (2) under a grant at the Permanent Settlement, (3) by prescription, (4) by recognition of their rights by Government in 1853 and (5) as accretions. The Subordinate Judge found in favour of the plaintiffs on points (1) and (5) and against them on the other contentions. This appeal is by the first defendant, the Secretary of State for India in Council.

The first question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to the river-bed usque ad medium filum aquae on the ground that they are admittedly riparian proprietors. The whole of the land in question falls within these limits. It is not disputed that the beds of tidal and navigable rivers in this Presidency are presumed to belong to Government. As regards non-navigable rivers the law has been settled by the Full Bench decision of this Court in Vasireddi Venkata Lakshmi Narasamma v. Secretary of State for India (1). The beds of such rivers are presumed to belong to the riparian owners. It is admitted that the Kistna is not a tidal river where it flows by the plaintiffs' Zemindari and, according to the Law of England, the plaintiffs would be presumed to own half the river-bed adjacent to their estate whether the river be navigable or not. The contention for the appellant is that the Krishna is navigable in this portion of its course, that the rule of English Law is unsuited to Indian conditions and is not the law of this country. The proposition of the learned Government Pleader is that the beds of all rivers should be presumed to be vested in Government when such rivers are navigable in a wide signfication of that term and even when navigation can be carried on for a portion only of the year. The plaintiffs contend that the rule of English Law should be applied and that, in any event, the Kistna is not a navigable river in the legal sense of the term.

In Sri Balusu Ramalakshmamma v. Collector of Godavari District (5) their Lordships of the Privy Council, referring to presumptions as to ownership of the bed of the Godaveri where it had been found to be not tidal and navigable, express grave doubts whether the presumption applicable to little English rivers applies to great rivers such as the Godaveri. The description of part of the Godaveri given in the District Judge's finding in that case applies equally to the Kistna. In the portion of its course with which we are concerned, it is from three to four miles wide at the time of highest flood the discharge at Bezwada is "a quantity one hundred times as great as the maximum discharge of the Thames at Staines"—Walsh, Volume I, page 3—the flood season is from June to October. Thereafter, the water falls rapidly and after January the river has dwindled to "a petty stream meandering through a wide expanse of sand." In Srinath Roy v. Dinabandhu Sen (2) the following passage occurs:—"In proposing to apply the juristic rules of a distant time or country to the conditions of a particular place at the present day, regard must be had to the physical, social, and historical conditions to which that rule is to be adapted." As, in the case of the river, then under consideration of their Lordships of the Privy Council, so also in the case of the Kistna the contrast of physical conditions with those of English streams is capital. At page 529,* their Lordships refer to the manner in which Courts in the United States of America have dealt with the question of navigability as an illustration of the need for adapting the rules of the English Common Law to local requirements. The reasons given in some of the Courts for rejecting the Common Law principle as to the rights of riparian owners in navigable rivers above the ebb and flow of the tide are stated. Then follows the following passage page 530*:—"A similar deviation, equally grounded on good sense, from the strict pattern of the English Law of waters lies at the bottom of the current of Indian cases previously referred to, and forms its justification." The Indian deviation refers to the grant of fishery rights by Government which was the subject directly under consideration. The peculiar historical and geographical reasons which led to the evolution of the English rule that 'tidality decided the point at which ownership of the bed should be public on one side and private on the other" have no counter-part in this country. On the other hand, certain of the considerations which led to the modification of the English rule by some American Courts, referred to in the judgment of the Privy Council cited above, are applicable to the great navigable rivers of India. Regulation XI of 1825 (Bengal) section 4, clauses 3 and 5, support the view that the bed of large navigable rivers is, as a rule, vested in the Government. This Regulation is declaratory of the Hindu and Muhammadan Law as ascertained from the law officers and the decision of the Sudder Dewani Adalat. Most of the cases coming from Bengal now referred to were cited before the learned Subordinate Judge and have been considered by him. He has rightly pointed out that in some cases the river actually referred to in the judgment was in fact tidal as well as navigable and that in some other cases the question of the ownership of the river, bed was not directly in issue. Several decisions of the Privy Council have been referred to but it was conceded that in none of them is the question now to be determined definitely decided. In Doe d. Rajah Seebkristo v. East India Company (11) the river referred to is the Hooghly which is both tidal and navigable. In Jagadindra Nath Roy v. Secretary of State for India (12) and Haradas v. Secretary of State for India (13) the references in the judgments are to a "public navigable river." This term is defined (Coulson and Forbes, Law of Waters, page 81) as a river which is actually navigable and in which the tide ebbs and flows. It is not clear from the reports whether the rivers in question were in fact tidal or not. In the former case the judgments of the lower Courts refer to the river as a "large navigable river" which is the language of the Bengal Regulations XI of 1825. In Srinath Roy v. Dinabandhu Sen (2) the following passage occurs:—"the freehold of the bed of navigable waters was deemed to be in the East India Company as representing the Crown and now is vested in the Government of India in right of the Crown." Two cases are referred to. The first is that reported in Doe d. Seebkristo v. East India Company (11) which deals with a tidal river. The second is Nogender Chunder Ghose v. Mahomed Esof (14). In this judgment their Lordships of the Privy Council observe, incidentally, in meeting an argument, that Counsel had drawn no distinction between a tidal river and a river which had ceased to be tidal, that "their Lordships have no reason to suppose that in India there is any such distinction as regards the proprietorship of the bed of the river." This cannot be taken as a definite pronouncement on the point and neither in this case nor in that reported as Srinath Roy v. Dinabandhu Sen (2) did the question arise for decision. It is, however, significant that in none of these cases is any reference made to "tidality" as a condition necessary for a presumption in favour of the Crown in India. On the other hand, some of the dicta suggest that navigability alone is the test of whether the bed of a river is presumed to vest in the Government of India. There are decisions of the Calcutta Courts which indicate that, in determining in Bengal whether the bed of a river is public or private property, regard is had to the fact of navigability only and that the question of whether the river is tidal or not need not be considered. Navigable has always been interpreted to mean "navigable throughout the year". Bagram v. Collector of Bhullooa (15), Ohunder Juleah v. Ram Ohurn Mookerjee (6), Mohinee Mohun Doss v. Khajah Assanoollah (16) Secretary of State for India v. Bijoy Chand Mahatap (7). The learned Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that the Kistna is navigable although it is admitted that no navigation can be carried on for a considerable part of the year. He relied upon a passage in Farnham on Waters, Volume 1, page 100, which has also been cited at the hearing of this appeal. The quotation is taken from a discussion of the meaning of "navigability" in

"The fact that the water is not continuously navigable does not destroy its character but the times of navigability must be incident to the natural condition of the stream and be of such regular occurrence and duration that persons wishing to use the stream may place dependence on them". This is laid down on the strength of a number of American decisions some of which have been cited before us. As far as ownership of the river bed is concerned, many States have adhered to the rule of the English Common Law. Other States have adopted "navigability in fact" as the test of public ownership. There is, however, no uniformity in the definition of navigability and local conditions seem to have influenced the Courts in their interpretation of the term. The Subordinate Judge has given no reasons for accepting the wide definition of some American Courts as appropriate to Madras in preference to the meaning which has been adopted in Bengal. No argument has been advanced which establishes any justification for such a preference. The Bengal rule has the merit of being definite and comparatively easy of appplication. It has been argued that the Calcutta decisions are based on the wording of the Regulation of 1825. Assuming this to be so, there seems to me to be no reason to suppose that the public rights in river beds are greater in Madras than in Bengal, at any rate where the banks form portion of permanently settled estates. No Madras authority has been cited which supports the claim now put forward. On the facts of the present case, the Subordinate Judge has found, and rightly in my opinion, that until recent times the English Rule was understood both by Government and the people to be applicable to the rights of the riparian owners to the river bed now in question. Conditions in Madras are so dissimilar from those in Great Britain that it may well be that the English Common Law rule should not be applied without modification and that public rights should be recognised in the beds of rivers which are navigable but not tidal. There seems to me, however, no ground for attaching to the word 'navigable' a meaning different from that which has throughout been followed in all the Indian Courts in which the question has arisen. In the present case the river is not navigable in this sense. The evidence establishes that cargoes of tobacoo, fire-wood and fish are carried at times, that boats are used by officers of the Engineering department on inspection duty, and that lime and stone required for bank protection works have been transported on the river to the site of operations The user seems to be infrequent and unimportant for commercial purposes. It might, perhaps, be sufficient to justify the river being treated as navigable in the legal sense provided the traffic could be carried on thoughout the year. The last condition is not fulfilled. As to the period during which boats can pass, there has been a good deal of exaggeration in the statements of the witnesses on either side. I think the evidence establishes that craft of shallow draught can be used on the river for about $4\frac{1}{2}$ months between June to October. This estimates derives support from some of the defendants' own witnesses (D. W. Nos. 3, 4 and 5). In the result, I am of opinion that the Kistna where it flows past the plaintiffs' estate is not a navigable river and that the plaintiffs have been rightly held to be owners of the bed to midstream. This view of the enjoyment of the river-bed in the present case supports the conclusion arrived at above. It is also relied upon for the respondents as strong evidence in favour of their contention that the river bed must be held to have been included in the grant made under the Sanad of 1803. The chief importance of the ownership of the bed lies in the fact that a number of islands or Lankas exist in it. These are created by the deposit of the alluvial matter brought down by the floods and are exceptionally fertile. New islands are frequently formed and the old formations are constantly changing in extent and position owing to accretions or to portions being washed away. These circumstances led to frequent disputes between the ryots both of adjoining villages on the same bank and of villages on opposite banks of the river. In 1848 the left and right banks belonged to different districts, Masulipatam and Guntur. The left bank of the part of the river with which we are concerned was part of the plaintiffs' Zemin dari and on the right bank were Government (ryotwari) villages. Owing to the frequency of disputes about the islands and uncertainty about the jurisdiction of magisterial authorities, a re-survey of the boundary was ordered. (Exhibit K4). Mr. Newill was charged with this task. His reports and the correspondence and orders connected with them are on the record and afford valuable evidence of the enjoyment and of the attitude of the public authorities. The proposal in the first instance was, that a line should be laid down for the sole purpose of determining jurisdiction of the two districts. The Government suggested an arbitrary method of dealing with the question by treating all islands above a certain point on the river as within the jurisdiction of Guntur and all below that point as belonging to Masulipatam. Mr. Newill, however, pointed out the objections to the settlement of the jurisdiction in a manner not coinciding with the proprietary rights of the parties. He added that the course suggested could lead to Government property in one district being mixed up with that belonging to Zemindars in the other. (Vide Exhibit K2). He proposed to take the survey of 1816—19 as the basis for his work and to modify the line, where necessary, to make it coincide with the proprietary or occupation limits of the different parties. The conduct of the survey on these lines was approved by Government (Exhibit K6). The procedure adopted by Mr. Newill was to call upon the Karnams and ryots of each village to point out for survey "the limits claimed by them in the river." They were required to substantiate their claims by all documentary evidence in their possession. An exhaustive enquiry was made. In the result, the river boundaries of all the riparian villages were fixed. Plans were prepared showing the exact extent of the river-bed comprised within the limits of each village (including the five villages with which we are concerned) and the area of the river Ayacut belonging to each village was calculated and entered in the accounts. The area of the existing islands was calculated separately. Thus, for the Vallur Estate the total river Ayacut is given as 15,455 acres of which 4,402 acres were islands (pages 136 and 187 of printed papers). The survey, as completed, received the approval of Government and copies of the plans and survey extracts were ordered to be supplied to the Zemindars and other persons interested, (vide minutes of consultation of January 21st, 1853). Throughout the whole of these proceedings there is no suggestion of any claim by Government to the whole or any part of the river-bed adjacent to plaintiffs' Zemindari. River-bed including Lankas was entered in the Ayacut accounts of the plaintiffs' villages without any reservation. The Subordinate Judge has found (paragraph 27 of the judgment) that from the date of the G. O. just referred to up to the end of 1911 the plaintiffs enjoyed the river-bed as demarcated as part of their estate. This is conceded by Mr. Ramesam and it is, therefore, unnecessary to refer to the evidence. The Lankas were in possession of the estate through its tenants; the removal of sand was controlled and fishery rights were leased. The respondent has not pointed out any evidence of fishery leases or of interference with the removal of sand prior to 1853. There is, however, no doubt to my mind that Lankas were always enjoyed as part of the estate prior to that date. This is clear from the proceedings connected with Mr. Newill's survey and, indeed, as already pointed out, it was the disputes between the villages as to the possession of new Lankas which led to the demarcation of 1848—53 being undertaken. Reference has been made to the survey of 1816 to 19 as the foundation of Mr. Newill's operations. He accepted these records as accurate after inquiry (vide Exhibit K2 paragraphs 13 to 15). No satisfactory plan showing the boundaries then fixed is on the record, but the report Exhibit K2 paragraph 16 shows that the whole river bed was included within the village boundaries, portion being allotted to villages on the left bank and portion to those on the right. Mr. Newill's report shows that this old boundary formed the basis of the settlement finally arrived at by him except in special cases. The only thing of substantial value connected with the ownership of the river bed was the enjoyment of the Lankas. There is nothing to show that Government ever made claim to any of these, whether old islands or new formations. The survey of 1848—53 proceeded on the basis on the Lankas being integral portions of the villages within the boundaries of which they were situate and such documentary evidence as is available points to the enjoyment of Lankas old and new by the riparian proprietors from the time of the Permanent Settlement and to recognition of these rights by the local officers of Government (e. g Exhibit QQ, Exhibit SS—31, Exhibit F and G (page 39), Exhibit H4, Exhibit J, Exhibit H—7, Exhibit H). In addition to the evidence provided by these exhibits, Mr. Newill's reports contain other illustrations of the claims of the riparian land-holders and of the attitude of the public authorities. The following are instances (page 339). In 1815 the people of two villages of plaintiffs' Zemindari petitioned the Collector stating that they were willing to abide by a settlement of a boundary dispute made by the Zemindar's manager and involving the river-bed. The Collector confirmed the decision and directed boundary marks to be fixed.

At page 343, et seq, a dispute between the villagers of Walur and Vallabhapuram (of Guntur) is detailed. Disturbances had taken place and an attempt at settlement was made by the intervention of the Collector. This failed, and the matter was referred to Government, with the result that it was ordered in 1844 that the islands in dispute should be treated as being within the jurisdiction of Masulipatam and the disputants (the Walur Zemindar and the Vallabhapuram people) were referred to the Civil Courts for the settlement of their claims.

In Exhibit K8 an account is given of a long dispute about islands between Poolipaka of the Walur Zamin and a village on the opposite bank. In 1802 the Zamin boundary was settled in accordance with instructions sent to the Collectors of the two districts by the Revenue Board. Disputes were renewed in 1823 and eventually, in 1826, Government ordered neither party to interfere with the island till the dispute was settled by the Civil Courts. Litigation followed between the Walur and Vasireddy Zemindars and was finally determined in favour of the former in 1846 shortly before Government acquired the Vasireddy estate. Mr. Newill was of opinion that the Court has been misled as to the village boundaries and that the decision was erroneous. He suggested that steps should be taken to have the decree reviewed in order "to recover from the Walur Zemindar this valuable portion of the river belonging properly to the Vasireddy estate of Guntur lately purchased by the Government." The Government, however, decided not to interfere as no strong grounds could be assigned for disturbing the decree.

From 1853 to 1911 it is admitted that the river-bed was treated as part of the property of the owner of the villages on the banks. The evidence, in my opinion, shows conclusively that the same view of these rights was entertained by Government from the time of the Permanent Settlement. The matter does not rest here for, as pointed out by my learned brother in his judgment, the records show that even prior to 1802 the river-bed was regarded as an integral part of the villages on the banks. The estate which was created in 1802—03 which was acquired by the plaintiffs' ancestor and for which he was granted a Sanad comprised a number of such villages. There is absolutely nothing to suggest that the limits of the villages as granted differed from those recognised prior to that date.

The attitude of the Government from 1853 to 1911 is ascribed to a mistaken view of the law applicable. There is nothing to indicate that other views were entertained at any previous time. The evidence points to the plaintiffs' rights having been recognised throughout. The record does not disclose that Government exercised any rights of ownership over the river-bed adjoining plaintiffs' estates from the time of the Permanent Settlement. On the other hand, the plaintiffs were in possession and enjoyment of the only property of value in the bed, i. e., the Lankas. The idea of claiming the bed on the ground that the Kistna is a navigable river does not seem to have been conceived till quite recently. In this view of the case, there can, I think, be no reasonable doubt that the grant in 1802 was understood, as including rights over the river-bed. Those are not specifically referred to but this was unnecessary as the rights were believed to pass with the ownership of the villages on the banks. It has been found above that the view of the law taken by Government till recently was not wrong. Even if it were wrong the extent of the grant would have to be judged by the views entertained in 1802 as these would indicate the intentions of Government at the time the grant was made. Abdul Aziz Khan v. Appayasami Naicker.(17). The whole history of the enjoyment after 1802 to the knowledge of the officers of Government is cogent evidence of the inclusion of the river-bed in the grant. Lord Advocate v. Lord Blantryre (9).

The villages on the left bank were Haveli lands and it is common ground that in 1802 the river-bed adjacent to them was at the disposal of Government and it must be held that, in the absence of special reservation, the river-bed was included as part of the villages for which a Sanad was granted. There seems to me to be no force in the argument that the enjoyment was limited to definite Lankas and cannot be held to have included other portions of the bed. The Lankas are constantly changing formations and the evidence indicates that they were appropriated and enjoyed wherever, within the village bounds they happened to arise. The plaintiffs are entitled to the portion of the river-bed where the land in dispute has been formed on the ground that it was included in the grant of 1803.

As to the effect of the admissions by Government in 1853 (4th ground of claim) I do not think they can, by their own face, be treated as creating title in the plaintiffs. Taking that year as a starting point, no prescriptive title had been acquired at the time of suit. In this view, it is not necessary to consider the arguments advanced for the appellant to show that the East India Company had no power to make grants except under the enactment relating to Permanent Settlements. Issue 5 (c) and (d) relate to the last ground of claim put forward by the plaintiffs, namely, that they are entitled to the new formulations as accretions to the river-bank even if the ownership of the bed be in Government. On the findings already come to, this question does not arise, but as the point has been argued at length I shall deal briefly with the subject. There is no doubt that the land in dispute has been formed by the deposit of alluvial matter in suspension in the flood water. Deposit is constantly going on and considerable additions were at times made to the bank in this manner before Conservancy operations were begun. Such formations are known as Kilanaks but they had no permanency and the creation of one year might be washed away in the next. The process is the same as leads to formation of the islands or Lankas and these are constantly changing in size and shape and sometimes disappearing. The facts are clearly brought out in Mr. Newill's Reports. The changes in the set of the currents which varies from year to year are the chief cause of these alterations. The greater the velocity of the stream the smaller is the quantity of the deposit it leaves behind. The main object of the Conservancy operations was to lessen the strength of the current thereby to increase the deposit and by this means to steadily narrow the width of the river-bed. One means to this end is the planting of nanal, the ground gained in one year was made the starting point of further plantation in the next. Cross-section measurements were taken after every flood season at each furlong where work was in progress to furnish a record of the result of the operations (Exhibit Z). The figures show that, although progress was not continuous, for in some years there was a set back at certain points yet, except in a single section, the net gain was considerable along the whole river frontage of the plaintiffs' estate. The total extent re-claimed from the river-bed was 704 acres over a length of ten miles and during a period of about 15 years.

Two objections are taken by the appellant to the findings in favour of the plaintiff. Firstly, it is alleged that the accretions cannot be regarded as imperceptible, and, secondly, it is said that the plaintiffs are not entitled to them as they were not due to natural causes. As to the first point: additions due to the deposit of alluvial matter during floods in rivers like the Kistna have been treated as accretions belonging to the owner of the adjacent land [Sri Balusu Ramalakshmamma v. Collector of Godavari District (5)] the question of what is meant by "imperceptible" in this connection has been elaborately dealt with in Secretary of State v. Rajah of Vizianag.

garam (18) The conclusion is against the contention of the appellant and this is a much stronger case in favour of the adjacent land-holder than that was, as the accretions were formed in a far longer period of time. There is no doubt to my mind that the accretion in the present instance was "so slow and gradual as to be in a practical sense imperceptible in its course and progress as it occurs". Attorney-General of Southern Nigeria v. John Holt & Co. (Liverpool) Limited (19). I think the learned Subordinate Judge's conclusion on this point was right.

As to the second objection: The case of the appellant is that the new formations were caused by artificial means, i. e, by the work done by the Conservancy staff. The scheme of the operation is detailed in Exhibit XII where a description is given of the various means which may be employed for arresting the velocity of the current. The method most commonly resorted to was the planting of nanal but the other and more elaborate devices referred to in Exhibit XII were also made use of (vide Exhibit VIII and D. W. 5). The evidence seems to me to leave no room for doubt that these operations played an important part in the creation of the new formation now in question. The effect is admitted by some of the plaintiffs' witnesses (viz., P. Ws. 4, 6 and 3?). The outstanding fact is that, although the Kilankas of considerable extent have been formed in the past at particular points along the banks there is no record of such regular and permanent formations as have been brought into existence since the commencement of the Conservancy operations. Exhibit X shows the gradual growth of the solid ground adjacent to the bank in the years from 1894 onwards. The question is, whether the fact that natural processes have been aided and, to some extent, controlled by artificial means disentitles the adjacent land holders from claiming the accretions as theirs. I am not satisfied the there is any authority for this view. The operations in the present instance were carried out by Government under its statutory powers which authorised entry on the plaintiffs' lands for special and limited purposes. It may be noted incidentally that the declared intention of the Government Officers was to hand over the new formations to the riparian owner (Exhibit S16). Another consideration which is not immaterial is, that the rights of the riparian owners might be prejudicially affected by the interposition of a strip of land owned by Government between their property and the river. Reference has been made to the case of Attorney-General of Southern Nigeria v. John Holt & Co., (Liverpool) Limited (19) in support of the appellants' contention. In that case, however, there appears to have been a deliberate reclamation by the building of a wall on the foreshore and levelling up by direct human agency of the space behind it. The remarks in the judgment, at page 615, also indicate that, if the silting up had been aided by simple artificial means employed by the respondents, the new formation would still be an accretion for the benefit of the adjoining land-holder. The dictum of the Judicial Committee quoted by the Subordinate Judge from Doe d. Seebkristo v. East India Company (11) is also in support of this view and so also are the remarks in Attorney-General v. Chambers (20) and Secretary of State v. Kalirikutti (21). These cases are authority for the position that, even where the accretion is contributed to by acts done by the adjacent land holder, he is not debarred from his right to them provided his acts were lawful. No case has been cited in which a claim to accretions has been disallowed on the ground that they were aided by the independent acts of a stranger. It is not suggested that the Goverment has any statutory privileges in this matter. I think that the conclusions of the learned Subordinate Judge are right.

In the result, I agree with my learned brother that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. The plaintiffs have preferred a cross appeal with regard to the amount of the award of mesne profits—the omission of provision for future profits. I agree with the order proposed by my learned brother in his judgment.

NARAIN DAS v. ABDUR RAHIM.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL DECREE No. 13 OF 1919.

March 26, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Richardson and Justice Sir Syed Shamsul Huda, Kt.

NARAIN DAS—DEFENDANT No. 1—APPELLANT

Kazi ABDUR RAHIM MUTWALLI OF SALKIA MIRPARA MOSQUE AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Muhammadan Law—Wakf, creation of—Mutwalli, appointment of—District Judge, power of—Mutwalli, title of, nature of—Limitation Act (IX of 1908*)*, Sch. I, Art. 134—"Date of transfer," meaning of.

The appointment of a mutwalli of a religious endowment is within the discretion of the District Judge as kazi, and where, after publishing a call for nomination to the office, he appoints a mutwalli he does not act without jurisdiction, even though the person appointed is a stranger to the family of the founder of the endowment and not in the line of succession designated by him. [p. 706, col. 1.]

Where in a deed of endowment the founder deprived himself of the power to dispose of the corpus, reserving to himself, during his own lifetime, an absolute discretion over the disposal of the income, leaving no such discretion to his successors, the income in whose hands was to be employed in necessary outgoings, rent, taxes and repairs, and of the balance, one-half was to be devoted to named charitable and religious purposes, and the other half was to be distributed to the heirs of each degree according to shares due to them under the Muhammadan Law of succession:

Held, that there was a substantial dedication of the corpus and income to charitable uses, and that the deed created a valid wakf [p. 706, col. 2.]

The mutwalli of a wakf estate is not the ostensible owner of the estate, he is a mere manager under a duly constituted trust. A transfer by a mutwalli who assumes to deal with the trust property as if he were the true owner in breach of his duty and in fraud of the trust reposed in him, is ultra vires and it is immaterial whether the transferee takes with notice or without notice of the trust [p. 707, col. 1.]

Limitation under Article 134 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act is not dependant on possession. The expression "the date of the transfer" in the Article means the date on which the property or the title is transferred by the transferor to the transferee: where the transfer is effected by a registered instrument that date is the date of the instrument. [p. 708, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDSON, J.—The appellant is the defendant No. 1 in a suit brought by the plaintiff as Mutwalli of a religious and charitable endowment to recover possession of certain landed property mortgaged by the former Mutwalli (the defendant No. 2) to the predecessor-in-title of the defendant No. 1. The defendants, other than the defendant No. 1, are formal parties.

The story is a not uncommon one. A wakf was created by Abdul Rahim by a registered deed, dated the 25th February 1894. By that document he dedicated certain property, valued at Rs. 2,000, to pious uses, appointed himself the first Mutwalli, laid down a rule of succession to the office and prescribed the mode in which the rents and profits were to be expended. On his death, some months later, without issue the office devolved or should have devolved on his sister, Nazirannessa (defendant No. 2), after whom it was to go to his younger brother, Abdul Alim, and the male descendants of the latter. It was not long before the founder's intentions were frustrated. His sister and brother joined in executing a registered deed of mortgage, dated 7th February 1899 to secure a loan of Rs. 2,500 with interest. The recitals and covenants of title show that the mortgagors represented themselves to be the secular heirs of their father and Abdur Rahim. The form of the transaction combined a mortgage by conditional sale with a usufructuary mortgage, possession being expressed to be rendered to the mortgagee for the realization of his dues on account of interest. It is in dispute whether possession was actually given and taken. The mortgagee, Kedar Nath Gourseisa, having died, his relative Sheo Prosad, who had established in the High Court his title by survivorship to Kedar Nath's estate, brought a suit for foreclosure in 1904 and the mortgage was finally foreclosed in January 1906 In March 1906, possession was delivered by the Court to the defendant No. 1 to whose father the mortgage-decree had been assigned (Exhibit D, dated 4th February 1905).

In 1911, the local Muhammadans bestirred themselves and a suit was instituted under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code with the result that the District Judge removed Nazirannessa from the office of Mutwalli and appointed the present plaintiff, a stranger to the founder's family, in her place.

The present suit was commenced on the 2nd May 1913, and more than five years elapsed before a decision was arrived at in the Court below on the 23rd December 1918. The delay is in part explained by stay orders made by superior Courts, but the conduct of the suits by the parties and by the Subordinate Judges before whom it came was very dilatory. The decree eventually made declares the properties in suit to be wakf properties appertaining to the Salkia Mirpara mosque and awards possession to the plaintiff as Mutwalli of the endowment with mesne profits.

On the appellant's behalf it was first contended that the plaintiff has no right of suit inasmuch as he is an outsider, not in the line of succession designated by the founder of the trust, and the District Judge had no jurisdiction to appoint him Mutwalli. In answer to this contention it is sufficient to refer to the observations of the Privy Council in Mahomed Ismail v. Ahmed Moolla (1).

In the present case, before appointing the plaintiff, the District Judge published a call for nomination to the office. No response was received. Neither Abdul Alim nor any of his descendants came forward, the plaintiff being the only candidate. The appointment was entirely within the discretion of the District Judge as Kazi.

It was next contended that the wakf itself was invalid as being illusory. A perusal of the deed of endowment is, in my opinion, a sufficient answer to this argument. I see no reason to doubt the pious intentions of the founder. He deprived himself of the power to dispose of the corpus and if he reserved to himself during his own lifetime an absolute discretion over the disposal of the income he left no such discretion to his successors. The income in the hands of his successors was to be employed, in the first instance, in meeting necessary outgoings, rent, taxes and repairs. Of the balance, one-half was to be devoted to named charitable and religious purposes, and the other half was to be distributed to the heirs of each degree or in each generation according to the shares due to them under the Muhammadan Law of succession. There was, as it seems to me, a substantial dedication of the corpus and income to charitable uses within the test laid down by the Privy Council in Muiib unnissa v. Abdur Rahim (2), and repeated in Ramanadan Chettiar v. Vava Levvai Marakayar (3). Reference may also be made to Mahomed Ahsanulla Chowdhry v. Amarchand Kundu (4), where the decision of this Court in Muzhurool Huq v. Luhraj Ditarey (5) is approved.

Then, a point was taken that the plaintiff was precluded by the doctrine of res judicata from raising the question that the mortgage to Kedar Nath was invalid. It was said that Nazirannessa, who was a defendant in the suit on the mortgage, might and ought to have pleaded her own breach of trust as a defence and, therefore, that the plaintiff as her successor was bound by the result of the suit. If the plea was open to her, as no doubt it was, she committed a breach of trust in not taking it just as she had committed a breach of trust in the original mortgage transaction. It would be a strange result if the trust which the plaintiff now represents were bound by the decree against her. In the mortgage suit, however, Nazirannessa was not, in the language of section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, litigating under the same title as that under which the plaintiff is now litigating. She was sued in her secular capacity, not as trustee.

On these three points with which I have dealt we did not think it necessary to call for a reply from the learned Vakil for the plaintiff. There still remain two questions to be dealt with.

In his written statement the defendant No. 1 asserted that he and his predecessors-in-interest were bona fide purchasers for value without notice of the trust. An issue was framed raising the question of notice. The learned Subordinate Judge dismissed the issue with the remark that it did not arise. It was contended that he was wrong and that, if either the original mortgagee, Kedar Nath, or the assignee of the mortgage-decree, were transferees for value without notice, the suit must fail. It is well-settled that trusts may be created in India in various ways [Jatindra Mohan Tagore v. Ganendra Mohan Tagore (6).] The nature of the trustee's possession may, therefore, vary with varying consequences. The trustee may be the ostensible owner, as in the case of secret and resulting trusts and benami transactions. In such cases he may be in a position to confer title on a transferee for value without notice under the provisions of section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act, or by way of estoppel, but when the possession of the trustee is that of a mere manager, under a duly constituted trust, it is immaterial under the present law whether the transferee takes with notice or without notice of the trust. I say under the present law, because under the older Acts of Limitation the transferee with notice was not protected by the twelve years' rule corresponding to Article 134 of the present Act. Consequently, under those Acts the question of notice might become relevant twelve years after the date of the transaction [Radanath Doss v. Gisborne & Co. (7), Luteefun v. Bego Jan (8)]. Under Article 134, the transferee without notice and the transferee with notice are on the same footing. Where the trustee is a mere manager, he is not the ostensible owner nor has the transferee anything corresponding to the English 'legal estate' to set over against the prior equity of the beneficial owner: the legal ownership and the prior equity are, generally speaking, both in the beneficiary [cf. Varden Seth Sam v. Luckpathy Royjee (9), Gokul Dass v. Eastern Mortgage and Agency Company (10)]. The element of hardship, so far as the transferee without notice is concerned, is minimized by the system of registration. The system of registration in a public registry office and the protection it affords to the intending purchaser are now well-understood by the people. The registers are generally searched and ought always to be searched. I think I may say on behalf of us both that we regret the Bengal rule, if it is still the rule, according to which registration does not itself amount to notice. It opens the door to a great deal of chicane and a great deal of idle argument. The change in the Law of Limitation above referred to seems to indicate an intention on the part of the Legislature that registration should be accepted as equivalent to notice. But, however that may be, there is no doubt that the Mutwalli of a wakf estate is not the ostensible owner of the estate. A Mutwalli is a mere manager and in the case of a public charitable endowment, such as the present, the legal ownership of the property dedicated is in the Divine Being or in the charity created in His name. A transfer by a Mutwalli, who assumes to deal with the trust property as if he were the true owner, in breach of his duty and in fraud of the trust reposed in him, is ultra vires and may be avoided by timely proceedings properly taken for the purpose. The vice in the transferee's title, whether he takes with or without notice, can only be cured by lapse of time. For these reasons, the learned Subordinate Judge is, in my opinion, right in holding that the question of notice in the present case is immaterial.

There remains the question whether Article 134 of the Limitation Act operates to bar the suit, a question which has been discussed mainly as a question of construction. The Article in its present form applies to suits 'to recover possession of immoveable property conveyed or bequeathed in trust and afterwards transferred by the trustee or mortgagee for a valueable consideration." The period of limitation is twelve years from "the date of the transfer."

The term 'transfer', which was substituted in the Act of 1908 for the term 'purchase' used in previous Acts, put an end to the long discussions which had taken place whether property mortgaged or leased was property "purchased" within the meaning of the Article. The cases are collected by Mookerjee, J., in Ram Kanai Ghosh v. Raja Sri Sri Hari Narayan Singh Deo Bahadur (11). The term "transfer" appears in the title of the Transfer of Property Act and seems to have been selected as the widest and most general term which could be found. The change, therefore, settled the law in the sense in which it had been generally understood in India [Ishwar Shyam Chand Jiu v. Ram Kanai Ghose (12)]. It is not disputed that a mortgage is a transfer.

A suit to which the Article applies must be a suit to recover possession. The plaintiff must be out of possession and the defendant in possession. The transfers chiefly contemplated are apparently transfers for value in excess of the limited powers of the trustee or mortgagee. In terms, the Article would apply to a transfer within those powers, but in such a case the true defence to a suit to recover possession would be title and not limitation, though in some cases limitation might be useful as an alternative defence. The underlying idea may be that the creator of the trust or the original mortgagor put the trustee or mortgagee in a position to deal with the property wrongly as well as rightly, and that after a limited time neither the cestui que trust nor the mortgagor shall be permitted to question those dealings. The creator of a trust or the mortgagor should, therefore, be careful to whom he entrusts or mortgages his property. The utility of such an Article lies in this, that it relieves the Courts of the necessity of deciding disputed questions of fact relating to transactions long past and prevents the hard swearing and chicane to which such disputes are apt to give rise. With every year that passes, the chance that the Courts may be led into a wrong conclusion on a question of fact increases.

The question we have to decide is, what is meant by "the date of the transfer" as the time from which limitation has to be reckoned? The rival contentions are, for the defendant No. 1, that the suit is out of time because it was instituted more than twelve years from the mortgage of 1889, and, for the plaintiff, as the Subordinate Judge has held, that the suit is in time because possession of the mortgaged premises was first taken in March 1906 under the foreclosure decree and the suit was instituted within twelve years of that date.

Apart from authorities which, though not binding on us, are entitled to our respectful attention, I should have thought that the language of the Article was plain and unambiguous and that the plaintiff was out of Court. To my mind, the date of the transfer is the date on which the property or the title was transferred by the transferor to the transferee. Where, as here, the transfer was effected by a registered instrument, that date is the date of the instrument. It is hardly disputed that such is the literal and natural meaning of the words and, in my humble judgment, there is no justification for departing from that natural and intelligible meaning. To construe the date of the transfer as the date on which the transfer is followed by possession is to import into the Article words which are not there. So far as I am aware, the Article has always been understood in its natural sense in Bengal [see for instance Nilmony Singh v. Jagabandhu Roy (13) and Ram Kanai Ghosh v. Raja Sri Sri Hari Narayan Singh Deo Bahadur (11)]. It was so understood in Behari Lall v. Muhammad Muttaki (14) and in Manavikraman Ettan Tamburan v. Ammu (15). It is so interpreted by the learned Judges of the Full Bench who were in the minority in the recent case in Madras of Mulla Vittil Seeti Kutti v. Kunhi Pathumma (16).

To make limitation under Article 134 dependent on possession is not merely to amend the Article by judicial legislation but to go very near repealing it and leaving Article 144 in sole possession of the field [Cf. Behari Lal v. Muhammad Muttaki (14).]

I turn to the cases on which reliance is placed for the plaintiff.

In Ramchandra Vithal Rajadhiksha v. Sheikh Mohidin (17) the property had been mortgaged and then transferred by the mortgagee also by way of mortgage. The learned Judges say,—

"Both on principle and precedent, it is thus clear that the purchaser from a mortgagee of what is represented and believed to be absolute right must be a purchase with possession. His possession is an essential element of this purchase sub modo which alone can make the purchase valid as against the true owner after twelve years' enjoyment."

The learned Judges go on to say that the point becomes clearer when considered with reference to alienations by trustees, but the argument is the same, that the transfer or purchase is incomplete without a transfer of possession.

As to principle, the observations of the learned Judges seem to savour of an old heresy [Baisuraj v. Dalpatram (18)] which, after the decision of the Privy Council in Kalidas Mullick v. Kanhaya Lal Pundit (19), was discarded [Ugarchand Manackchand v. Madapa Somana (20). See also Trikam Madhav Shet v. Hirji Harjivan Shet (21), Narayan v. Laxuman (22) and Ramasami Ayyangar v. Marimuttu Bhattan (23). The question whether possession is necessary to complete a title is now concluded, for most purposes, by the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act. No doubt, when a trustee or mortgagee assumes to act as full owner the title he passes is invalid in the first instance as against the cestui que trust or original mortgagor. But I conceive that the pretended or false title imitates in its mode of creation and incidents the true title passed by a full owner. When possession is not required to complete the title in the one case it is not required in the other.

As to the precedents cited, what seems true is that in suits for possession to which Article 134 is a bar the defendant will probably or in most cases have had possession for upwards of twelve years. The cases do not decide that the defendant must have had possession for twelve years; his possession for twelve years is merely mentioned as a fact.

For instance, in the subsequent case of Dattagiri v. Dattatraya (24) the judgment refers to the fact of possession (page 369) but the conclusion is that the suit "is barred against the present defendant inasmuch as he holds under a purchase for valuable consideration dated more than twelve years prior to the commencement of the suit" (page 372).

So, the case of Maluji v. Fakirchand (25) on which the learned Judges particularly relied, amounted to no more than the application of Article 134 to the facts of the case. The judgment was delivered by Farran, C. J., and, simply stated, the case was as follows:—A mortgage was taken from a mortgagee assuming to act as full owner. The transferee, or second mortgagee, enforced his mortgage by suit against the original mortgagee and in execution purchased the property. The original mortgagor then sued to redeem the original mortgage. The twelve years' period prescribed by Article 134 having elapsed, it was held that the plaintiff was bound to redeem the second mortgage. It was further held that the plaintiff was not bound to recognize the absolute title which the second mortgagee set up under the execution-sale because twelve years had not elapsed from its date at the time of suit brought. In other words, the date of the transfer of the full title being within twelve years of the suit, the plaintiff was held, in regard to that title, not to be barred by Article 134. The position would have been much the same in the present case if the plaintiff here had sued to redeem the mortgage created by Naziranneesa. To such a suit, brought within the twelve years of the foreclosure decree, the foreclosure would probably have been no defence. This, however, is not a suit for redemption and I express no final opinion on the point.

Reference was also made for the plaintiff to certain observations in the judgment delivered by Stanley, C. J., in Huseni Khanam v. Ali Husain Khan (26). But those observations were obiter, and when the case came before the Privy Council it was decided that the whole suit was barred under Article 148. Bakhtawar Begam v. Husaini Khanam (27).

Lastly, there is the Madras Full Bench case Mulla Vittil Seeti Kutti v. Kunhi Pathumma (16) already referred to. The facts resembled the facts in the present case except that the property was transferred by a mortgagee. Opinion there was much divided. Wallis, C. J., and Coutts-Trotter, J., felt themselves bound, by the language of Article 134, to hold that the suit was barred. The three learned Judges who formed the majority were only united in holding the contrary. As stated in the head note, Abdur Rahim, J., and Seshagiri Aiyar, J., held that Article 134 applied to the suit but that time began to run 'not from the date of transfer but from the date of taking possession.' Srinivasa Ayyangar, J., expressly dissented from such a construction, but held that the Article was, in the circumstances, inapplicable and that it only applied in cases "where the transferee takes possession on the date of transfer and when the mortgagor is entitled even on the date of transfer to sue the transferee for possession." As Wallis, C.J., points out, that view "would practically exclude nearly all the cases which would otherwise come within the Article, as possession is rarely taken by the transferee on the date of the transfer." The difference of opinion among the majority seems to me to illustrate the difficulty of trying to force plain words into a mould for which they are not fitted. I can only say with great respect to all the learned Judges that I concur in the conclusion arrived at by the minority.

In the case before us, there is no particular hardship. There was no concealment. A suit was brought on the mortgage in 1904. Possession was taken by the transferee at latest in 1906. The present suit was not brought till 1913. There is nothing to show what was done with the money borrowed by the trustee. For all we know, it may have been applied in whole or in part to purposes connected with the trust.

The fact that Ramchandra's case (17) was decided in 1899 and that, so far as we are aware, the question it raises has not hitherto been discussed in Bengal, would seem to indicate that the question is not one of much importance in this province. I am not sure whether I fully appreciate the difficulties which seem to have been felt in Madras in the application of Article 134 to mortgages for long terms. But, apart from that, suits to recover possession are not the only remedy which the law provides. There is section 18 of the Act which is intended to meet cases of collusion. There are also declaratory suits. If, moreover, limitation were made to depend on possession it would still be possible for dishonest persons to leave the property apparently in the possession of the trustee or mortgagee. This could be done, for instance, by means of a sub-lease.

Before concluding, I ought to add that if it be relevant to consider at what point of time Kedar Nath or any person claiming under or through him first obtained possession, I see no good ground for differing on that issue of fact from the conclusion arrived at by the trial Court. There is no satisfactory evidence that either Kedar Nath or any successor of his entered into possession before possession was delivered by the Court to the assignee of the mortgage decree in March 1906. It is said that the probabilities are that Kedar Nath took possession under an instrument which entitled him to possession and purported to give him possession. But Kedar Nath died. His immediate successor was compelled to take legal proceedings to establish his title as such after which he foreclosed the mortgage by suit. As I have said, I do not feel justified in differing from the Subordinate Judge's finding. That, being so, the suit was brought within twelve years of the date on which possession was taken by the mortgagee from the trustee.

It seems to me quite possible, however, that if this question of possession had been agitated some years ago, it might have been decided differently.

In the result, I would allow the appeal on the ground of limtation and dismiss the suit with costs throughout.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—I agree with my learned brother in holding that this appeal must be decreed, and that the suit must be held to have been barred by limitation under Article 134 of the Limitation Act. If upon the evidence I had come to the conclusion, as my learned brother has, that the transfer in this case under the deed of mortgage, dated the 7th February 1899, was not accompanied by possession, I would have, perhaps, preferred to follow the decision of the majority of the Judges composing the Full Bench of the Madras High Court in the case of Mulla Vittil Seeti Kutti v. Kunhi Pathumma (16) but upon the view I take of the facts of this case that question does not arise. The evidence on the question of possession is meagre and unreliable on both sides. The onus to prove that the suit was within time was on the plaintiff. In my opinion, he has failed to discharge that onus. The probabilities are all in favour of the defendant. As a transferee of the foreclosure decree the defendant was not in a position of advantage to prove whether the mortgagee had obtained possession under his mortgage. The deed of mortgage recites that the mortgagee was put in possession of the mortgaged properties. There is no reason to suppose that this part of the agreement was not acted upon. There was no question of any khas possession being delivered to the mortgagee. The question of possession revolves itself into a question as to who was in receipt of the rents and the profits. By the terms of the mortgage deed the mortgagee was to account for the rents and profits so far as he was able to realise them and, after deducting certain expenses, any balance that might have been left was to be credited towards the interest on the mortgage-money. It is possible that the mortgagee thought that he need not be too assiduous in realising the rents as any deficiency in the realizations will have ultimately to be borne by the mortgagor and that he did not show any great vigour in pursuing his rights as a mortgagee in possession. It is also not unlikely that the mortgagee released the defects in his title and did not venture to press his rights too far. The recital in the preliminary decree upon the mortgage which shows that the plaintiff had asked for being put into possession is, in my opinion, not of any great value. It may be that the object was to obtain from Court a confirmation of the possession obtained under the mortgage-deed. In the absence of the pleadings in that suit, I can attach very little weight to the recital. The other circumstances relied upon by the Court below are equally inconclusive.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the balance of probability is on the side of the defendant and that the plaintiff has failed to show that the mortgage-deed was not followed by possession. On all other points I agree with my learned brother.

A. obtained a decree against X. for mesne profits of an estate which had been purchased by H. In execution of the decree, A. attached the estate, but objections were raised and the matter went in appeal to the High Court, and, in the meanwhile, the application for execution was struck off for default of the decree-holder. A fresh application for execution was made against H. but he objected that he had gifted the estate to his mother, who had sold it and the purchaser objected that he was not liable and his objection was allowed. A. then brought the present suit claiming to be entitled to put the property to sale in execution of his decree. The trial Court held that H. was personally liable but that his transferees were not as the execution having been struck off the attachment ceased to be effective and the transfer made by him

On appeal by A.:

First appeal from the decision of the Second Additional Subordinate Judge, Aligarh, dated the 30th July 1918.

Mr. Iqbal Ahmad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Peary Lal Banerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is decree holders' appeal arising out of an application for execution of a decree for mesne profits. It appears that on the death of one Mir Khan, who owned some immoveable property, one of his legal heirs, Musammat Bibi Jan, brought a suit for the recovery of possession of her legal share against her co-heirs and obtained a decree. She had also claimed mesne profits, but the determination of the amount of mesne profits was reserved for the execution department. On the 28th of August, 1905 a decree for mesne profits was passed in her favour. In the meantime, it appears that one Ganga Prasad, who was a mortgagee of a 5-biswa share in village Tatarpur from Mir Khan, had brought a suit for sale on foot of his mortgage-deed against all the heirs of Mir Khan including the present plaintiff and had obtained a decree for sale. After Bibi Jan had obtained her decree for possession, the share in village Tatarpur was sold by Ganga Prasad on account of his decree and purchased by Hayat Ali Shah. The latter was made a party to the proceeding relating to the ascertainment of the amount of mesne profits. On the 23rd of July 1906, the plaintiff-decree-holder attached the 5-biswa share in village Tatarpur. Objections were raised by some other judgment-debtors and an appeal came to the High Court; the record of the case having been sent for the application for execution was struck off on the ground that the decree-holder had failed to deposit necessary costs. When the record was returned a fresh application for execution was put in against Hayat Ali Shah and others, but this time an objection was made by Hayat Ali Shah that he had, on the 28th August 1905, gifted his share in village Tatarpur to his mother. The mother objected that she had sold it on the 16th of February 1909 to one Ram Prasad, and Ram Prasad objected that he was not liable to pay any mesne profits at all. It appears that the objection of Ram Prasad was allowed. On this, the plaintiffs' heirs brought a suit and claimed that they were entitled to put the share in village Tatarpur up for sale in execution of their decree for mesne profits. The learned Subordinate Judge who decided that case held that Hayat Ali Shah was personally liable but that his transferees were not liable inasmuch as the execution case having been struck off, the attachment had ceased to be effective and, therefore, the transfers made by Hayat Ali Shah were perfectly valid. The decree-holders, who were plaintiffs in that suit, appealed to the High Court. On appeal the High Court held that the attachment had really continued and that the two transfers made by Hayat Ali Shah and his mother were absolutely void, and that the decree holders were entitled to proceed to realise their money from Hayat Ali Shah by sale of his share in Tatarpur. The High Court in its judgment, dated the 1st of June 1915, held: "We think the Court below was wrong in holding that the property was not under attachment when the gift in favour of the judgment-debtor's mother was made. That gift having been made during the pendency of an attachment was void against the attaching creditor and the sale made by the donee falls with it." The High Court gave an opportunity to Hayat Ali Shah to apply for an amendment of the decree if he was right in his contention that the decree for mesne profits as against him was wrong. An application was made on his behalf but it was rejected. The High Court then, ultimately, allowed the appeal, set aside the decree of the Court of first instance and decreed the plaintiffs' suit with costs. On this, the decree-holders have again applied for execution of their decree against Hayat Ali Shah by sale of the 5-biswa share in village Tatarpur. Hayat Ali Shah raises the same objections over again and says that he is not liable to pay any mesne profits. The learnad Subordinate Judge has allowed his objections on two grounds: (1) He has held that Hayat Ali

Shah was not legally liable to pay the amount of the mesne profits; and (2) he is further of opinion that the decision in the declaratory suit does not operate as res judicata between the parties. The decree-holders appeal to this Court. In our opinion, although it is true that Hayat Ali Shah should not have been made liable for the mesne profits inasmuch as he had purchased this property in execution of a mortgage-decree against the heirs of Mir Khan including the original plaintiff Bibi Jan, yet we cannot ignore the fact that the decree for mesne profits was ultimately passed as a decree against him also and, further, we are also of opinion that the matter has been conclusively decided in the previous litigation. The relief claimed by the present plaintiffs in the previous suit was a declaration that they were entitled to sell this very property in execution of their decree for mesne profits as against Hayat Ali Shah. The suit was decreed by the High Court. We must take it that the decree-holders obtained the relief which they had claimed. It is true that in a case where a declaration is obtained by a decree-holder, but for some reason or other the property is not sold, then in a dispute which may subsequently take place between a judgment-debtor and his transferee, the decision may or may not operate as res judicata; but that point is not before us now. In the present proceeding the very decree-holders who had obtained a declaration, are seeking to execute their decree. We are of opinion that it is not open to Hayat Ali Shah to raise the same objection over again. He has no right to raise the objection that the decree-holders are not entitled to execute the decree. We accordingly set aside the order of the Court below and decree the appeal. We dismiss the judgment-debtors' objections with costs.

Lands which at the inception of the grant are service inams cease to appertain to the Zemindari and the right of resumption and re-grant inheres in the Government. They must be deemed to be inams continued by the Government within the meaning of section 17 of the Madras Proprietary Estates Village Services Act and the Government has the right to enfranchise them. [p. 714, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Bezwada, in Appeal Suit No. 22 of 1918, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Temporary District Munsif, Gannavaram, in Original Suit No. 584 of 1915 (B).

Mr. V. Ramadoss, for the Appellant.

Mr. V. Ramasam, (Government Pleader) for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The question in this case is, whether the Government is entitled to enfranchise certain lands in a Zemindari. These lands were at the inception, Karnam service Inam lands. In 1854, when an account was taken of the properties in the Zemindari, it was not denied by the persons in possession that they appertained to the Karnam service. The lower Courts have, on these and other facts, come to the conclusion that the Inam was continued by the Government within the meaning of section 17 of Act II of 1894, in lieu of services to be rendered as Karnam. This conclusion is attacked by Mr. Ramadoss with reference to certain observations of Sundara Aiyar, J. in Secretary of State v. Chinnapragada Bhanumurty (1). We shall consider how far that dictum affects the present case. As was pointed out by the learned Government Pleader, if before a Sannad is granted under Regulation XXV of 1802, certain lands were found to appertain to village services, the Government, by virtue of the prerogative reserved to them by section 4 of that Regulation, assumed control over such properties and excluded them from the assets of the Zemindari. Regulation XXIX of 1802 enabled the Government to obtain directly the services from the Karnams who were previously under the control of the Zemindars. Having regard to the fact that the lands granted in lieu of remuneration often changed hands and that the office-holders often found themselves in an impecunious position owing to the conduct of their predecessors, Act II of 1894 was passed fixing wages for the office: as a natural corollary from this, Government directed the enfranchisement of the lands previously held as service Inam. In these circumstances, it is difficult to see what right was left in the proprietor in respect of these lands. From the two Regulations we have referred to it is clear that lands granted to village officers like Karnams, etc., ceased to appertain to the Zemindari. The right of resumption, and re-grant, therefore, inhered in the Government. The Government were, therefore, entitled to enfranchise the land. As regards the Secretary of State v. Chinnaprogada Bhanumurty (1), the facts are not quite clear. Apparently, the whole of the village in which the land in question was situated was granted to an Agraharamdar. Whether before the granting of the Sanad the land in dispute had been granted for Karnam services or whether it was the Agraharamdars that made the grant to the Karnam is not clear. On these facts the lower Appellate Court in that case came to the conclusion that the lands were not service Inam lands; and one of the learned Judges who heard the second appeal, Sadasiva Aiyar, J., accepted that finding. Sundara Aiyar, J., apparently did not disagree with the finding in the case. He seems to have been inclined to the view that some overt act must be shown to have been done by the Government continuing the land in enjoyment of the office-holder as remuneration for doing the services. If the learned Judge intended to lay down that the facts that the land was originally service Inam, that it was excluded from the assets of the Zemindar in 1802, and that subsequently the Government took service from the Karnam and allowed him to enjoy the property would not enable a Court of Law to draw the inference that there has been a continuance of the grant within section 17 of Act II of 1894, we are unable to agree with him. In this case, on the facts found, there can be no doubt that the lands having originally been service Inam and having been excluded from the Zemindari the Government is entitled to enfranchise them.

The second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

APPEAL FROM APPELLATE DECREE No. 636 OF 1919.

RAGHUBAR RAM AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS, AND LOK NARAIN MALLAH AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 54—Injunction, whether can be granted to restrain wrongs arising out of tort.

The grant of an injunction is not restricted to wrongs arising out of contract only, but relief can also be given in respect of an invasion of the rights of any person resting on tort. [p. 715, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Patna, dated the 5th April 1917, confirming a decision of the Munsif, Patna, dated the 7th December 1918.

Mr. Lal Mohan Ganguli, for the Appellant.

Messrs. H. L. Nandkeolyar and Rai Tribhuan Nath Sahai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is directed against the decision of the District Judge of Patna, dated the 5th April 1917, confirming the decision of the Munsif, dated the 7th December 1918, and dismissing the suit of the plaintiff in part.

The decree was passed against the defendant No. 1 only and hence he alone is the appellant before us. He is a Choudhuri o carts in the town of Behar. The plaintiffs are the cartmen and ply their business between the Railway Station and the shops of Mahajans. They alleged that the defendant interfered with their business on three days 11th, 12th and 13th of December 1917, claiming from them illegal demands of Choudhriana at the rate of 1 anna per cart. The plaintiffs' case was that the Choudhriana was never paid to the defendant and was illegal and, consequently, the interference was also unjustifiable. They accordingly brought the present suit for the loss suffered by them on account of interference by the defendant, and for granting a perpetual injunction against him restraining him from causing any obstruction or interference in the plaintiffs' business in future.

There was a minor discrepancy in the evidence as to the date of the obstruction. In the evidence it was stated that the obstruction was from the 10th to the 12th, whereas the plaint stated it to be from the 11th to the 13th of December. The Court below has explained this discrepancy as being due to ignorance of the cartmen, but both the Courts below have held that the obstruction was caused for the number of days alleged by the plaintiffs. They have also held, upon a careful consideration of the evidence, that the defendant was not justified in causing obstruction to the plaintiffs and that they suffered damages in consequence of that obstruction. This being a finding of fact based upon legal evidence on the record is not open to challenge and the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellant has now conceded this. The amount of damages has also been fixed upon the evidence in the case, the result of which is that the amount actually claimed has been reduced by half. Rupees two per cart per day is certainly not an excessive loss to the plaintiffs. Therefore, the amount of damages must also be upheld.

Mr. Ganguly wanted to urge that the suit was not fit to be maintained inasmuch as it was affected by misjoinder of parties. This is based on the fact that the plaintiffs are a number of cartmen who are said to have suffered by the illegal act of the defendant, but the act complained of was in furtherance of a single object of the defendant, viz., to extort from the plaintiffs illegal cess of Choudhuriana. The fact that they were obstructed at different times does not affect the liability of the defendant, to all of them. The transaction was one and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to join in one suit against the defendants. This was the view taken by the Munsif and the defendant very rightly abandoned the aforesaid objection. The matter was never agitated in the Court of Appeal and it is not open to the defendant to re-open it in this Court, and, as observed above, there is no substance in the contention.

The decree of the Court below as to the award of damages to the plaintiffs cannot, therefore, be questioned and must be upheld.

The learned Vakil, however, contends that the plaintiffs were not entitled to a perpetual injunction against the defendant. This is based upon section 54 of the Specific Relief Act and the ground, principally, is that the claim for injunction is not based upon any obligation existing in favour of the applicants. In other words, Mr. Ganguly contends that the claim for injunction must be based upon some contract. It is too late to propound such a proposition inasmuch as the grant of an injunction is not restricted to wrongs arising out of contract only, but relief can also be given in respect of an invasion of the rights of any person resting on tort only. The first two clauses of section 54 no doubt deal with wrongs ex contractu, but the 3rd clause undoubtedly contemplates that a perpetual injunction can be granted irrespective of any contract, provided that there is an invasion or threat of an invasion on the plaintiffs' right to or enjoyment of any property. Perhaps, the attention of Mr. Ganguly was concentrated only to the first two clauses, for towards the conclusion of his argument, when his attention was invited to the last clause of section 54, he seemed to be lukewarm in his argument and but for the decision in the case of Gur Pershad v. Khuda Baksh (1), the point, I think, would never have been raised by Mr. Ganguly. In that case a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from taking Choudhuriana dues from the plaintiff and from using force of any kind was disallowed. The facts are too briefly stated in that case, and I am not sure whether they are similar to those in the present case. The reason for refusing an injunction, as stated in that judgment, is that no injunction could be granted "restraining the defendant from receiving any payment which the plaint might make to him (the defendant) voluntarily" and it seemed to the Court "unnecessary to grant an injunction restraining him from doing what the penal law already makes punishable." Under the terms of the section, no doubt, voluntary payment of Choudhuriana cannot be restrained. But, in the present case, the plaintiffs seek to restrain the forcible demand of the Choudhuriana and the illegitimate restraint caused to their business by the acts of the defendants. There is no reason why the defendants cannot be injuncted. If the learned Judge in the aforesaid case wanted to lay down a general law that an injunction can only be granted to prevent the breach of obligation existing in favour of the applicant, I would respectfully differ with the view. Their attention was probably not drawn to the last clause of section 54. The subject has been fully dealt with by Dr. Bannerjee in his book on Specific Relief Act and he has clearly shown from authorities that the relief in the nature of an injunction is not confined to wrongs arising out of a contract but is also applicable to trespass upon the civil rights in the nature of tort, and that the tort complained of need not violate any right to property. This is clearly illustrated by the fact that perpetual injunctions are often granted restraining a person from making defamatory statements in any publication. Injunctions are also granted against the custody of infants, marrying infant wards of Court, as well as against persons interfering with the rights connected with religious offices: Vide Soma Ballachariar v. Thiruvenkatachariar (2), Jugalkishore v. Lakshmandas (3) and Srinivasa v. Tiruvengada (4).

I have been taken through a number of authorities on the subject, both English and Indian. Most of them do not appear to exactly apply to the present case though the principles decided therein are of great assistance in understanding the true scope and meaning of the Chapter on Injunction in the Specific Relief Act. I am relieved from entering into the discussion of those cases, for it appears to me that the present case is governable by the observation of Jenkins, C. J., in the case of Apaji Patil v. Apa (5). After quoting section 54 of the Specific Relief Act, his Lordship observes: "It appears to us that where a legal right violated by another under colour of title, is established, the recurrence of violation cannot in ordinary cases be adequately met by damages, nor can those damages be satisfactorily ascertained. How, for example, can damages be an adequate relief to one who has established his right to the possession of land, if his possession be subjected to repeated obstruction by another or how can these damages be ascertained." In that case the defendant was interfering with the civil rights of the plaintiff to exercise his peaceful possession over his land. The view taken by the learned Chief Justice was followed in a latter case of the same Court in Bai Samrat v. Sardarsing Hamabhai (6). No doubt relief by way of perpetual injunction should be granted with caution and on weighing the probabilities and circumstances of each case and where, as in the present case, it is manifest from the pleadings in a case and the conduct of the defendant that, unless he be restrained by an order of the Court, there will be danger of the invasion of the rights of the plaintiff, there is no reason why the injunction should not be granted. The defendant asserts in his written statement his right to claim the cess of Chaudhuriana from the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have proved that they are not liable for the same. There is, therefore, every reason to apprehend that the plaintiffs' rights would be invaded by the defendant in future. Even if damages were the adequate relief for the obstruction caused to the plaintiffs on the present occasion, there can be no assurance that it would be an adequate relief in any subsequent interference, and I am, therefore, of opinion that it is not possible in such a case to award adequate pecuniary compensation. Therefore, the claim is not barred by section 56, clause (i) of the Specific Relief Act as is contended for by Mr. Ganguly and that it is absolutely necessary by means of a perpe-

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 315 OF 1917.

Construction of document—Deed of sale, followed by agreement of re-conveyance—Nature of transaction—Sale or mortgage.

In 1883 two ladies executed a sale-deed in favour of F. and B. and on the same day F. and B. executed an agreement in favour of the ladies to the effect that if, within five years, the ladies re-paid the amount of the consideration for the sale they would get back the property. In 1916 the husband of one of the ladies, the other having in the meantime died, brought the present suit on the allegation that the transaction evidenced by the two deeds was really a conditional sale, i. e., a mortgage, which mortgage he claimed to redeem. The trial Court dismissed the claim construing the two documents as showing two separate transactions, one an absolute sale and the other an agreement of re-conveyance within a specified time. On appeal:

Held, upon a comparison of the language of the two deeds that the sale was subject to the conditions of the agreement, and that the two deeds read together showed that the transaction entered into was a mortgage. [p. 720, col. 2; p. 721, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Moradabad, dated the 23rd of March 1917.

Messrs. B. E. O'Conor and Muhammad Ishaq Khan, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru and Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff-appellant in the lower Court for the redemption of an alleged mortgage-deed dated the 21st of July 1883. It appears that on that date two ladies Musammat Ishratunnissa and Musammat Shafkat-un-nissa executed a deed of sale in favour of Lala Fakir Chand and Lala Baldeo Sahai. The consideration for the sale was Rs. 6,125. On the same day (i. e., the 21st of July 1883) the two Lalas executed a deed of agreement in favour of the two ladies, in which, after reciting the fact of their purchase, they said that the purchase had been made subject to the condition that the two ladies could, on the payment of Rs. 6,125 within five years from the date of the execution of the agreement, get back the property. The two ladies are dead and so is Lala Baldeo Sahai. The plaintiff-appellant is the husband of Musammat Shafkat-un-nissa. He brought the suit out of which this appeal has arisen against the surviving vendee, Lala Fakir Chand, and the heirs of the other vendee. The claim was brought on the 12th of September 1916 on the allegation that the transaction evidenced by the two deeds of the 21st of July 1883 was really a conditional sale, i. e., a mortgage. The claim was resisted on various grounds but the principal plea was that the sale of the 21st of July 1883 was an out-and out sale and the agreement of the same day was a separate transaction for re-conveyance of the property within a specified period. As the claim has not been brought within five years of the execution of the agreement and as the claim was not for re-conveyance of the property but for redemption of the mortgage, the claim was not maintainable.

No evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant, by which we mean no oral or documentary evidence other than the two deeds, dated the 21st of July 1883. Some witnesses were examined on behalf of the defendants respondents to prove that the two deeds of the 21st of July 1883 evidenced really two separate transactions. The learned Subordinate Judge who heard the witnesses has not believed them, nor has their evidence been placed before us in this appeal. The case has been decided on the language of the two deeds of the 21st of July 1883, and in the light of the case-law put forward before the Court below. The learned Subordinate Judge yielded to the plea for the defence and construed the two documents of the 21st of July 1883 to mean that they showed two separate transactions, one an absolute sale and the other an agreement of re-conveyance within a specified time.

In appeal before us the appellant contests the conclusion at which the learned Subordinate Judge arrived. It is urged on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant that the language of the two documents of the 21st of July 1883, when closely examined, leads to but one conclusion, namely, that there was one transaction between the two ladies and the twoLalas and the transaction was a 'baibilwafa,' that is, conditional sale or mortgage. On the other hand, the learned Counsel for the respondents has maintained the position his clients took up in the Court below. Both parties have cited a number of authorities on the point. In our opinion, in a case like the present, the case-law cannot be a safe guide unless the language of the documents in all the cases is absolutely the same. Where a Court has to find whether a transaction which is embodied in two separate documents, is one transaction or the two documents express two separate transactions, the language of the documents is, if not the only at least, the important guide in arriving at the right conclusion. If we refer to the language of the documents in suit in the present case we find that in the sale-deed, after the usual recital of the fact of sale and the amount of consideration, the vendors said that they of their own free will and accord absolutely sold the Zemindari property together with * * * to Lala Baldeo Sahai and Lala Fakir Chand. The agreement which was executed at the same time by the two Lalas after reciting the property purchased by them, goes on to say that the property "has been purchased by us, the executants, for Rs. 6,125, on this condition that whenever, within five years, the vendor shall pay to us the amount of consideration mentioned in this document, we or our heirs shall have no objection in re-conveying the said aforesaid share. If we set up any plea the same shall be invalid and the vendors shall be at liberty to take legal steps and to have the property re-conveyed by us. But the condition is that the vendors should not borrow the money or mortgage or sell the property for payment of the amount due to us. On the contrary that amount should be the property of them. They shall also have to pay interest on the whole consideration at the rate of 10 annas per cent. per month out of which the actual produce of the village sold shall be deducted and they shall have to pay the balance along with the consideration money." Now, in our opinion, if the language of the two documents is put together and compared, it leads to the conclusion that the parties to the two documents were entering into one transaction and that transaction was, what is called in this country baibilwafa, i. e., a conditional sale. The reasons for holding this view are that, though the words "absolute sale" are used in the sale deed, yet the agreement distinctly admits that the sale is subject to the condition that the vendors could demand the return of the property on the payment of not only the consideration money but on the payment of consideration money plus interest at 10 annas per cent. per month after the accounts between the parties had been taken with regard to the realisation of the rents collected by the vendees during their period of possession. Now, if the parties intended to have two separate transactions, i. e., one an out-and-out sale and the other a right given by the vendees to the vendors of getting a re-conveyance within a specified period, there would be no necessity for saying that the sale was subject to re-conveyance, or that at the time of re-conveyance accounts should be gone into between the parties. The learned Counsel for the defendants-respondents has urged, and urged very strenuously, that the two documents of the 21st of July 1883 are really two separate transactions, and in support of his contention he advanced several arguments. He said that the transaction of baibilwafa, or conditional sale, was really a method adopted by the Muhammadans to evade the ecclesiastical law against paying or receiving interest. He referred to the short history of the origin of baibilwafa given in the book of Mr. Ghose on Mortgage Law at page 60. In the present case the parties lending the money or purchasing the property were Hindus who were not bound by any ecclesiastic rules of Muhammadan Law. There was no occasion for them to have entered into a transaction with the ladies of the nature of a conditional sale. In our opinion, there is no force in this argument for the simple reason that, though the doctrine of baibilwafa was introduced into this country by the Muhammadans, yet it seems to have been adopted by other communities also. It really depends upon the inclination or convenience of parties borrowing and lending money as to what means they should adopt of re-payment.

There are cases where both creditor and debtor were Hindus and yet the transaction between them was that of baibilwafa.

The case-law relied upon by the defendants-respondents is as follows:—Alderson v. White (1), Bhagwan Sahai v Bhagwan Din (2), Ghulam Nabi Khan v. Niaz-un-nissa (3) and Jhanda Singh v. Sheikh Wahid ud din (4). The remarks upon which reliance is placed by the learned Counsel for the respondents in the case of Alderson v. White (1) are as follows:—"These deeds taken together do not, on the face of them, constitute a mortgage, and the only question is whether, assuming the transaction to be a legal one, it has been shown to be in truth such as in the view of a Court of Equity ought to be treated as a mortgage transaction. The rule of law on this subject is one dictated by common sense, that prima facie an absolute conveyance, containing nothing to show that the relation of debtor and creditor is to exist between the parties, does not cease to be an absolute conveyance and become a mortgage merely because the vendor stipulates that he shall have a right to re-purchase." We are quite in agreement with the observations of the learned Lord Chancellor; but they do not in any way help the case for the defence. The very first sentence of the observation is that "these deeds taken together do not on the face of them constitute a mortgage." The language of the two deeds in the case of Alderson v. White (1) was such that it could not be said that the two deeds read together showed a transaction of mortgage. Further on, the Lord Chancellor goes on to say: "That prima facie an absolute conveyance containing nothing to show that the relation of debtor and creditor is to exist between the parties does not cease to be an absolute conveyance." It is quite true that in the present case the words "absolnte sale" are used in the sale-deed but the terms of the agreement stultify the significance of those words. Under the said terms the parties were, at the time of the demand of the vendors for re-conveyance, to go through the accounts of the realization of rents by the vendees and the vendors were to pay 10 annas per cent. per month interest on the sale-proceeds, and after casting of the accounts the price for re-conveyance was to be determined. These terms show clearly that the relation of creditor and debtor continued to exist between the two ladies and the two Lalas. No such terms found a place in the deeds produced in the case of Alderson v. White (1).

The case of Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhgawan Din (2) was also on facts quite different from the present case. The agreement in the case of Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (2) was as follows:—"However, I have, as a matter of favour, mercy, kindness and indulgence, executed this deed, and do hereby stipulate that if all these vendors will within a period of 10 years from the date of this deed pay in a lump sum, and without interest, the whole amount specified above, I shall accept the same and cancel this valid sale * * * * * I shall not claim interest from the vendors, nor will they demand profits from me after the expiry of the term." The last sentence shows clearly how different the case of Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (2) was from the case before us. Moreover, in the case of Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (2) the vendee was extending a favour to the vendor giving the latter an opportunity to re-purchase the property within 10 years on the payment of only the sale price, distinctly stating that the vendor will not be entitled to any account of the rents of the property sold and that the vendee will claim no interest. In the case before us the agreement of the 21st of July 1883 given by the two Lalas has not been given as a matter of indulgence. On the contrary, the agreement is to the effect that the sale is subject to the agreement and the terms contained in the agreement.

un-nissa (3) was similar in facts to that of Bhagwan Sahai v Bhagwan Din (2). In the case of Ghulam Nabi Khan v. Niaz-un nissa (3), the sale deed contained the following recital: "The sale deed had become absolute and final and that the contracting parties had no right to cancel the sale and to demand restitution of the consideration money, and that the vendor has no right to any share in the property sold." The agreement merely contained a stipulation for re-purchase. On comparing the terms of the two documents a Bench of this Court in the case of Ghulam Nabi Khan v. Niaz-un-nissa (3) came to the conclusion that the two deeds showed two separate transactions, namely, one of an out-and-out sale and the other of a re-conveyance. The learned Judges made the following remarks, which we think pertinent to the argument under consideration: "Whether a transaction is a bona fide sale with an agreement for re-purchase, or a mere mortgage in the form of a sale, must depend on the intention of the parties to be gathered from the language in which the transaction is carried out, supplemented, it may be, by oral evidence. If we attach their true meaning to the recitals which we have referred to above, we think it must be held that the transaction was intended to be an out and out sale with an agreement for re-purchase." In our opinion the case of Ghulam Nabi Khan v. v. Niaz-un-nissa (3) was distinctly decided on the facts as found and gathered from the documents of sale and re-conveyance. We have already shown that the language of the two documents was quite different to that of the documents before us.

The last case is that of Jhanda Singh v. Sheikh Wahid-ud-din (4). In that case there were three documents for consideration before the Court. One was a sale-deed, dated the 29th of August 1852; the second was a bond of the same date; and the third was an agreement executed seven days after on the 5th of September 1852, undertaking to re-convey the property within a specified period to the vendor on receipt of the sale consideration. The language of the sale-deed showed that it was an absolute sale on the face of it. The agreement was executed seven days after and the language of it showed that the opportunity given to the vendor to re purchase the property was in no way a condition governing the sale but was a matter of indulgence. The relevant words of the agreement were "that the executants are now willing to hold and treat with kindness the vendors and that of their own free will they (the executants) covenant in writing that if the vendors, after the lapse of nine or ten years from the date of the execution of the deed, pay the executants the purchase-money mentioned in the sale-deed, i. e. a sum of Rs. 5,500, out of their own pocket without mortgaging or selling this property to other persons, the executants shall forthwith execute a fresh re sale-deed on receipt of this sum." It is thus obvious that the facts in the case of Jhanda Singh v. Sheikh Wahid-ud-din (4) also were quite different from the facts of the present case. In our opinion the case of Jhanda Singh v. Sheikh Wahid-ud-din (4) does not bear out the contention for the defence. We would here remark that, towards the end of their judgment, their Lordships of the Privy Council, after reciting the rule laid down by the Lord Chancellor in Alderson v. White (1), say as follows: "It may not be applicable to the transactions governed by the Muhammadan Law. It was apparently held applicable by Sir Barnes Peacock, who had vast experience of India and its people, to the case before him." We take it from these observations that the principle laid down by the Lord Chancellor in the case of Alderson v. White (1) is applicable only where the two documents, namely, one of sale and the other of re-conveyance, show really two separate transactions. In England, where the transaction of baibilwafa, or conditional sale, is not known, and where the drafting of documents is in the hands of trained and skilled men, it is easy to find out whether two or more documents evidenced one or separate transactions. In this country, where documents are drawn up by Patwaris and petition writers, they are written in stereotyped phraseology. The word "Katai," for example, on which great stress was laid by the defence, (which means absolute) is really used by the petition-writers and Patwaris, who are the usual scribes of such deeds of sale, as a matter of form without understanding what it means. However, in the present case, as we have pointed out, a comparison of the language of the two deeds distinctly shows that the sale was subject to the conditions of the agreement, and that the two deeds read together leave no doubt that the transaction of the 21st of July 1883 entered into between the two ladies and the two Lalas was that of a mortgage.

For these reasons, we allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and remand the case to the lower Court for trial on the merits as to the remaining issues. As to costs, we allow to the appellant the costs in this Court including fees on the higher scale. The costs in the Court below will be costs in the cause.

JUDGMENT.

KINCAID, A. J. C.—The facts of this case have been stated by Mr. Rupchand, the learned Pleader for the appellants, somewhat as follows:—

The plaintiff (respondents) filed a suit to recover from the defendant (appellants) a sum of Rs. 20,046, being damages for failure to take delivery of 250 tons of sugar of August-September 1917 shipment. The sugar contracts were admittedly made in the usual terms. The plaintiffs, who were the sellers, tendered 125 tons of August shipment and 70 tons of September shipment. On 15th February 1918 they tendered a further 45 tons of September shipment on 25th June 1918 and the remaining 10 tons of September shipment on 6th July 1918. This was a breach of the agreement and the defendants refused to accept delivery. The plaintiffs, however, asserted that Government had made a requisition on all the steamers and that it had been impossible for them to ship the August-September shipment in time. Direstly they were able to do so, they had shipped the sugar and tendered it to the defndants who should have taken delivery of it under the terms of the contract, because the goods had been detained by 'Force Majeure.'

The defendant's reply was that there was shipping available at Java provided the plaintiffs had been willing to pay the higher rates demanded by the shippers and the defendants declared that that they could prove this by the evidence of certain persons resident in Java. They applied for a commission and eventually filed interrogatories. These, however, Kemp, A.J.C., rejected for the reasons given in his order of 7th July 1919. Against that order the defendants have filed Miscellaneous Appeal No. 35 of 1919. At the hearing, Mr. Elphinstone for the plaintiffs respondents raised the preliminary objection that neither an appeal nor an application for revision lay against the order of the learned Additional Judicial Commissioner.

Mr. Rupchand has not pressed on the Court that an appeal lies and, as the present order is not a decree and is not one of the orders mentioned in section 104 of the Civil Procedure Code, we dismiss the appeal. The important question, however, is, whether, as Mr Rupchand had contended, an application for revision lies. Now, Mr. Kemp, A. J. C.'s order is admittedly an interlocutory order. The defendants, if the suit goes against them, can undoubtedly advance Mr. Kemp, A. J. C's., refusal to allow their interrogatories as a ground of appeal from the final decision of the lower Court. In these circumstances, can they come here in revision now ?.

This question has been often agitated in the various Courts of India. We shall deal with the decisions Court by Court beginning with our own. In the case of Mir Hasseinali Khan v. Mir Abdul Hussein

Khan (1) Pratt, J.C., observed: "A preliminary objection is taken that this application for revision is incompetent. This objection must prevail. The order of the lower Court refusing to return the plaint was either an interlocutory order or a decision on an issue. In the former case, section 622 does not apply, Motilal v. Nana (2)," In SantdasDayaldas v. MangatramBhojraj (3), the Judges did not go quite so far but the Court said, "Even assuming that this case is one in which our powers under section 622, Civil Procedure Code, might be properly exercised, we consider it undesirable to apply these special powers where relief can be obtained by the ordinary procedure." In Mir Hassanalikhan v. Mir Abdul Hussein Khan (4), Pratt, J. C., re-affimed the principle laid down by him in Santdas Dayaldas v. Mangatram Bhojraj (3). His words were,—"The High Court refuses to interfere in revision with interlocutory orders because, under Civil Procedure Code, section 591, they can be made ground of objection in the appeal from the decree." Lastly, Pratt,J.C., in SeumalNihalchand v. Purcomal(5), observed "As the applicant had another remedy of which he has not chosen to avail himself we will not interfere in revision." We have thus three cases, all decided by a Judge of great eminence, in which this Court has unambiguously affirmed the principle that where the applicant has another remedy, e.g., as here, by final appeal, it will not entertain an application for revision.

We next come to the Bombay cases. The first case is that of Motilal v. Nana (2). It was the basis of Pratt, J. C's. decisions and is as emphatic as any of his. Sargent, C. J.'s words were,—

"The expression 'case' in section 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure may be, as stated by the Court in Dhapi v. Ram Pershad (6), wide enough to include an interlocutory order. But a word of such general import must be controlled by due regard to the purpose with which section 622 was framed. This, it cannot be doubted, was to enable a party to a suit to get a decision or order of a lower Court rectified by the High Court, when there would otherwise be no remedy. In the case of those interlocutory orders (such as the present one), against which no immediate appeal lies, a remedy is still supplied by section 591, which provides that the order may be made ground of objection in the appeal against the final decree". In Damodar v. Rughunath(7) Fulton, J., expressed himself in very similar terms: "The order complained of is interlocutory and, if erroneous, may form a ground of appeal against any decree that may be passed in the suit. We must, therefore, reject the application"

The next case brought to our notice was Miya Mahomed Haji Jan Mahomed v. Zorabi (8). There the defendants sought to reverse on appeal an order directing the issue of a commission for the examination of witnesses. Their Lordships held that this order was not a judgment within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent and that no appeal lay against it. It is, thus, hardly pertinent but the learned Counsel who quoted it relied on this authority to contend that had a revision application laid against such an order, the defendants could have approached the High Court in revision.

The fourth Bombay case is Bai Atrani v. Deepsing Baria (9). The facts were that the District Judge granted a temporary injunction restraining the defendant No. 1 from adopting a son pending the decision of the suit. Against this injunction an application was made to the High Court in revision and the objection was taken that the District Judge's order was an interlocutory order and that no application under section 115 (old section 622) Civil Procedure Code lay Their Lordships overruled the objection. But their order, so far from being at variance with that of Sargent, C. J., in Motilal v. Nana (2) was really consistent with it. Batchelor, J., said:—"That purpose (i.e., of the section), he (Sargent, C. J.) observes, was clearly to enable a party to obtain a rectification of a decision or order of a lower Court by the High Court when there would otherwise be no remedy. In the facts then before the Court a remedy was supplied by section 591 of the Code of 1882 and on that ground it was decided that the revisional jurisdiction of the Court could not be successfully invoked. Mr. Rao contends that this decision in Motilal's case (2) is in favour of the present petitioner, inasmuch as in the circumstances of this application the applicant has no other remedy available to him, and may, if this petition is summarily dismissed, be exposed to injustice, otherwise incapable of remedy.....we must, therefore, in accordance with the Chief Justice's ruling, enquire whether, in this particular case, a remedy against the order of injunction was supplied to the present petitioner."

The learned Judge eventually came to the conclusion that the petitioner had no remedy. "It seems to me impossible to say that the injury caused by the order, if it is wrong, may not be irremediable; for the petitioner, or the boy chosen for adoption, may well die long before this litigation reaches its end. That being so, I think that, consistently with the ruling in Motilal v. Nana (2), we ought to hold that this application is competent under section 115."

Let us next consider the Allahabad cases. The first is that of Harsaran Singh v. Muhammad Raza (10); there a suitor had presented an application for leave to sue as a pauper not personally but by his Pleader. He moved the High Court in revision but their Lordships' ruling, pronounced by Straight, J., was as follows:—

"We are clearly of opinion that this application was inadmissible and cannot be entertained. Section 622 of the Civil Procedure Code does not, in our judgment, apply to a proceeding of so purely an interlocutory character as that mentioned in section 592. The application is rejected with costs."

In Chattar Singh v. Lekhraj Singh (11) the lower Court had set aside an award, made on a reference to arbitration under Chapter XXXVII of the Code on the ground of the arbitrator's misconduct. An application for revision was made to the High Court who passed the following order:—

"We are of opinion that we have no power of revision under section 622. The contention that the proceeding for arbitration is a decided case in which no appeal lies within the meaning of the section, and, therefore, open to revision under section 622, is not tenable. The proceeding is of an interlocutory character only, made in the course of a suit; it is part of a case which is still undecided, and in which an appeal lies from the final decree. It was not the intention to allow revision of interlocutory proceedings, in the course of a suit, which do not determine it. The order, which is the subject of this application, will be open to revision by appeal from the final decree in the suit, and, even if section 622 allowed of it, it would be highly inexpedient for us to interfere at this stage of the case. We dismiss the application with costs."

In Farid Ahmed v. Dulari Bibi (12) the District Judge had transferred a suit from the file of a subordinate Court to his own file on the plaintiff's application. The defendants prayed the High Court to revise the order of transfer. The plaintiffs objected that it did not lie. Oldfield, J.'s judgment was as follows:—

"We are of opinion that the plaintiff's objection is valid that this is not an order which we can revise under section 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, as it is an order made in a suit, and there is an appeal in the case from the final decree".

In the case of Chattarpal Singh v. Raja Ram (13) the lower Court rejected an application for leave to sue as a pauper. The applicant aproached the High Court, but his application was rejected. The grounds, however, of the learned Judges were different. They held that it had not been shown that the Judge had exercised his judisdiction with "illegality or material irregularity." This decision, therefore, is hardly pertinent to our enquiry.

The last Allahabad case is that of Muhammad Ayub v. Muhammad Mahmood (14). A Subordinate Judge had granted the plaintiff leave to sue as a pauper. The defendant moved the High Court to revise the Sub-Judge's order. In a short but very clear judgment Chamier, J., observed: "Under the present Code of Civil Procedure it seems to be quite clear that the 'case' must have been decided before the High Court can interfere in revision. I am not prepared to subscribe to the view that no proceeding can be a 'case' unless it terminates in a decree. But, giving the word 'case' the widest meaning that was given to that word in section 622 of the Code of 1882, I am unable to hold that the order against which this application for revision is presented decided any 'case'. It appears to me that there is a clear distinction between the case of an application for permission to sue or appeal in forma pauperis being dismissed or rejected, and the case in which a similar application is allowed. In the former, it may be said that the case has been decided, while in the latter the order appears to be merely interlocutory."

Let us now address ourselves to the decisions of the Madras High Court. In Nizam of Hyderabad, In re (15) a Sub-Judge had passed two interlocutory orders in one of which he declined to issue a commission for the examination of certain witnesses, in the other he ordered the production of certain documents by the plaintiff. An application was made to the High Court to revise both orders. In the course of a judgment rejecting the application Muttusami Ayyer, J., remarked,—

"No appeal is allowed by section 588 from either of these orders whilst section 591 prescribes the course to be followed in regard to defective interlocutory orders. I do not consider that section 622 is applicable to them and it pre-supposes a decision or an order in the nature of a decree and that no other remedy is provided for specially by the Code."

In the case of Veerabadran Chetty v. Natarajа Desikar (16) the appellant had obtained a decree against the head of a Mutt and attached certain gold and silver articles.

The head of the Mutt died and his successors contended in execution proceedings that the attached articles belonged to the Mutt and not the deceased and, therefore, could not be sold. The appellants applied for a summons on the head of the Mutt to appear as a witness. The latter asked for a commission pleading that he knew none of the facts in the case and that the only wish of the appellants was to put pressure on him. The Sub Judge refused to issue a commission. The head of the Mutt applied in revision to the High Court and Boddam, J., reversing the Sub-Judge's order granted a commission. The appellants went in appeal to a Divisional Bench but they refused to set aside Boddam, J.'s order. Here, therefore, we have a case where the High Court of Madras revised an interlocutory order of a lower Court.

In the case of Maruthamuthu Pillai v. Krishnamachariar (17) a lower Court refused to issue a commission for the examination of witnesses, the High Court reversed the lower Court's order. But their Lordships did this not under section 622, Civil Procedure Code, but under clause 15 of the Letters Patent. This case, therefore, is not pertinent to our enquiry.

In the case of Balamoney v. Ramasami Chettiar (18) a District Munsif refused to allow a plaintiff to inspect certain documents produced in Court by the defendants in a sealed cover. The plaintiff went to the High Court in revision. But their Lordships observed: "following the decision in Nizam of Hyderabad, In re (15) and Motilal v. Nana (2) we must refuse to interfere in revision with the order of the District Munsif."

In a later case, Somasundaram Chettiar v. Manicka Vasaka Desika Gnana Sammanda Pandara Sannidi (19) the want of jurisdiction in a High Court, however, under section 622 to revise an interlocutory order was doubted. Their Lordships observed: "It is therefore, unnecessary to rely on section 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but, after the careful argument which we have listened to, we desire to say that, we are not to be understood as holding that section 622 would not authorize us to interfere as the order of the lower Court was an interlocutory one." As a matter of fact, their Lordships interfered with the lower Court's order under section 15 of the Charter Act. The above passage, therefore, must be regarded merely as an obiter dictum.

Only one Punjab case has been brought to our notice, namely, that of Louis Dreyfus and Co. v. Khillu Ram (20). The defendants, it appears, had tendered as evidence during the progress of a suit an award which, as they claimed, operated as res judicata. The Sub Judge overruled their plea and they applied to the High Court to revise his ruling. Shadi Lal, J., dismissed the application observing: "Now it is beyond dispute that an appeal shall lie from the final decree in the suit, and that the party aggrieved will then be entitled to impeach the decision of the Court on the question of res judicata, as well as on other points decided against him. This Court has consistently held that it will not interfere with an interlocutory order made in a suit over which the Court has jurisdiction, where an appeal is allowed from the final decree, or the applicant has another remedy open to him whereby he may obtain the relief sought by him."

There remain the decisions of the Calcutta High Court. The first case quoted to us was that of Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Baksh Singh (21). This authority is, however, hardly pertinent. The Privy Council therein reversed the decision of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh in that he had no jurisdiction to set aside, under section 622, Civil Procedure Code, a decision of a District Court merely because it was erroneous, provided that the lower Court had the necessary jurisdiction to decide the case.

The second case, Dhapi v. Ram Pershad (6), is more pertinent. The lower Court ordered the defendant to give inspection of certain documents. The defendant moved the High Court to revise the lower Court's order. The High Court set it aside. In the course of his judgment, Norris, J., remarked, after referring to some of the rulings already examined by us,—

"These cases no doubt decide in so many words that section 622 of the Civil Procedure Code does not apply to interlocutory orders where there is an appeal from the final decree. I confess that, after a careful consideration of the judgments, I am unable to concur in the interpretation placed on section 622 of the Civil Procedure Code. I think that the word 'case' in section 622 of the Civil Procedure Code is wide enough to include an interlocutory order, and that the words 'record of any case' include so much of the proceedings in any suit as relate to the interlocutory order. It is easy to imagine cases where irremediable injury may be done to a party by an interlocutory order made without jurisdiction, and, unless the words of the section are clear beyond all doubt to the contrary, I cannot believe that the Legislature intended such injury to remain without a remedy." Here, again, we have a ruling that a High Court can interfere in an interlocutory order under section 622.

In the third case, Gobinda Mohan Das v. Kunja Behary Das (22). A Sub-Judge, at the request of the plaintiff, ordered the defendants to produce a quantity of documents in Court. The defendants applied in revision to the High Court. Their Lordships granted the application, but under section 15 of the Letters Patent. They refused to consider the question as to their powers under section 622, Civil Procedure Code. This case, therefore, cannot be said to help us.

The fourth Calcutta case brought to our notice is that of Amjad Ali v. Ali Hussain (23). The plaintiff had applied to the lower Court for inspection of the disputed property. The Sub-Judge had rejected his application and he moved the High Court to revise his order. Their Lordships granted the application observing,—

"As regards the second point, namely, whether this Court ought to interfere with an interlocutory order made by the original Court in the exercise of its discretion, it cannot be disputed that, if a proper case is made out for interference, this Court is not powerless. It is sufficient to refer to the case of Gobinda Mohan Das v. Kunja Behary Das (22) where it was pointed out that the test to be applied is, whether irreparable injury would be caused to one of the litigants, if matters were not set right." Their Lordships then went on to hold that grave complications would obviously follow if the inspection were not granted and set aside the lower Court's order. It must be conceded that, at first sight, this case seems in favour of Mr. Rupchand's clients for, although their Lordships held that the test was whether irreparable injury would follow, they actually revised the order merely in view of "grave complication." But in a later case, Chandi Roy v. Kirpal Roy (24), Carnduff, J., explained that he and Mookerji, J., had acted in exercise of the powers conferred by section 15 of the Charter Act. Amjad Ali v. Ali Hussain (23), therefore, does not help our investigation. On the other hand in Chandi Roy v. Kirpal Roy (24) one of the trying Judges let fall the obiter dictum "Speaking for myself, I should have thought that interlocutory orders did not come within the scope of this section." (Section 115, Civil Procedure Code).

The last Calcutta case is that of Kumar Chandra Kishore Roy v. Basarat Ali Chowdhury (25). The Munsif of the first Court set aside an auction-sale on various grounds. The auction-purchaser appealed to the District Judge who allowed the appeal. A revision application made to the High Court was rejected on the ground that, even if the District Judge had made an error, section 115 did not confer on the High Court jurisdiction to revise his order. This case, therefore, is scarcely pertinent to our enquiry.

Leaving the decisions of the Indian High Court, Mr. Rupchand relied on the case of Balakrishna Udayar v. Vasudeva Aiyar (26) But that was not an appeal from an interlocutory order and, therefore, is beside the point.

It is clear, from the above examination of the authorities, that although Norris, J., of Calcutta and Boddam, J., of Madras held that the High Court could revise an interlocutory order the great majority of the learned Judges took an opposite view. The Sind cases by which we are bound and the Bombay decisions to which this Court has always paid peculiar respect all support the objection of the learned Counsel for the respondent that where there is a remedy by way of final appeal no application for revision lies. Mr. Rupchand has argued that his client will suffer an irremediable injury if his witnesses are not examined. But when his client appeals from the final decision of the lower Court, if adverse to him, he can ask the Appellate Court to grant him a commission for the examination of his Java witnesses. The delay may involve him in temporary hardship and inconvenience but not in! irremediable injury. On the other hand, it is clear that if this Court were to arrogate to itself jurisdiction to revise interlocutory orders, there is no limit to the applications under section 115 which the ingenuity of a defendant or his Pleader could devise if he saw that a case was going against him in the lower Court. Following, therefore, the decisions of this Court in Mir Husseinali Khan v. Mir Abdul Hussein Khan (1) and of the Bombay High Court in Moti Lal v. Nana (2) we allow the respondent's objections and, holding that we have no jurisdiction under section 115 to revise the order of Kemp, A. J. C., we dismiss the application for revision with costs.

RAYMOND, A. J C.—A preliminary objection has been raised that neither the appeal nor the application for revision are competent. There can be very little doubt that no appeal lies against an order refusing the issue of a commission. Mr. Rupchand contended that, as the refusal to issue the commission was tantamount to shutting out the defence evidence on an important matter in controversy in the suit the rights of the defendants in the suit had been thereby determined and thus the order of the lower Court was a decree within the meaning of section 2, clause 2, Civil Procedure Code. I cannot conceive any justification for construing the definition of a decree in the manner suggested. The words "conclusively determines" in the definition of a decree must not be overlooked. The refusal to issue a commission does not conclusively determine the rights of the parties with regard to any of the matters in controversy in the suit. The suit has not yet been heard, much less determined, and until judgment is given, it cannot be said that the rights of the parties have been conclusively determined. According to Order XX, rule 6 a decree has to sepecify the relief granted or other determination of the suit. But in the present case it is obvious that no relief has been granted to the plaintiff nor has the suit been determined. As was said in Udharam v. Secretary of State (27), an interlocutory decision on each and every point in controversy between the parties does not fall within the definition of a decree within the meaning of section 2 clause 2, Civil Procedure Code. I am of opinion that the order of the lower Court refusing to issue the commission is purely an interlocutory order against which no appeal is provided for by the Code of Civil Procedure. In Tuljaram v. Alagappa (28) it was held that an order refusing to issue a commission, however serious the results may be to a party, is purely an interlocutory order, I refer to the remarks at page 20 of this Volume*. I do not think it necessary to elaborate this point at any length, because it seems to me there is no scope of any difference of opinion on the point that no appeal lies.

The substantial question in this case which has been strenuously argued by Counsel on either side, is, whether this Court should exercise its revisional jurisdiction under section 115, Civil Procedure Code, and allow the applicant the remedy he seeks in respect of an interlocutory order passed against him by the lower Court.

Much argument has been addressed to us on the interpretation that should be placed on the word "case" as used in the section under consideration. It has been contended with some force that this word is not to be limited to proceedings that terminate in a decree but would and does comprise interlocutory orders. In view of the point on which I propose to base my judgment, it is unnecessary to determine whether the word "case" is wide enough to include interlocutory orders. I have perused the various rulings that have been cited to us, and, beyond the decision in Dhapi v. Ram Pershad (6), there has been no definite and explicit pronouncement on the question whether the word "case" would cover interlocutory orders. Speaking for myself, I have grave doubts whether section 115, Civil Procedure Code, was intended to apply to interlocutory orders. The words of the section are: "The High Court may call for the record of any case which was decided by any Court subordinate to such High Court", and it seems to me difficult to say that an interlocutory order is equivalent to a "case decided". It is true that there is no definition of the word "case" in the Code, but if the Legislature intended that it should include interlocutory orders, appropriate language would have been used instead of words which convey a different meaning. However, for the purposes of the present application, I shall assume that the word "case" is of wide and comprehensive import and does include interlocutory orders. The order complained of is the refusal by the lower Court to issue a commission for the examination of certain witnesses who, the defendants say, will prove an important point in controversy between the parties. Defendants complain that the order of the lower Court is illegal and will result in irreparable injury to them. Now, there is not the slightest doubt that, in the event of a decree being passed against them in the suit in which the interlocutory order is made, they will have the right of appeal and equally, there is no doubt that when appealing against the final decree the defendant will be perfectly justified, in terms of section 105, Civil Procedure Code to set forth as a ground of objection in the memorandum of appeal "any error, defect or irregularity in any order affecting the decision of the case." Indeed, Mr. Rupchand himself has not contested, as he could not well contest, that he would be debarred from challenging the legality of the order in question in any appeal that he may file against the decree. His complaint may be summed up as follows:—"why not now remedy the injustice that has been caused to me and direct the lower Court to grant my application for the examination of my witnesses on commission and thereby enable me to have on the record all my evidence on an important point in issue in the suit." The precise question, therefore, that arises in this case may be formulated as follows:—"Are the provisions of section 115, Civil Procedure Code, intended to apply to an interlocutory order passed in a suit, when the party aggrieved by the order can, under section 105, Civil Procedure Code, in his appeal against the decree in the suit, complain of the error, defect or irregularity in any such order affecting the decision of the case? Though I do not pronounce any opinion whether the order of the lower Court is sustainable or otherwise, there cannot be a shadow of a doubt that the refusal to issue a commission and thus shut out important evidence for the defence must affect the decision of the case.

I shall at this stage refer to the case law on the point. The first decision which strongly appeals to me, though the judgment is very brief, is Motilal v. Nana (2). In this case Sargent, C. J., said that section 622 of the Code of 1882 (which substantially corresponds with section 115 of the Code of 1908) was framed to enable a party to a suit to get a decision or order of a lower Court rectified by the High Court when there would otherwise be no remedy. In the case of those interlocutory orders (such as the present one) against which no appeal lies a remedy is still supplied by section 591 (section 105 of the present Code,) which provides that the order may be made ground of objection in the appeal against the final decree. In our Court, this judgment was followed in Mir Husseinali Khan v. Mir Abdul Hussein Khan (1) where, on a preliminary objection taken that an application for revision was incompetent, Pratt, J. C., in upholding the objection said: "the order of the lower Court refusing to return the plaint was either an interlocutory order or a decision on an issue. In the former case section 622 does not apply....In the latter case the proper remedy is by appeal from the final judgment and decree." In Mir Hasanalikhan v. Mir Abdul Hussein Khan (4) it was pointed out that, "The High Court refuses to interfere in revision with interlocutory orders, because under section 591, Civil Procedure Code, they can be made ground of objection in the appeal from the decree. But in cases where the Court of Appeal could grant no relief for any damage that might be caused if such an order is carried out the High Court will interfere in revision." In the latter contingency the Court held that the order is not interlocutory but final. In Nand Ram v. Bhopal Singh (29) it was held that an application under section 115, Civil Procedure Code, cannot be entertained in case of those interlocutory orders against which though no immediate appeal lies, a remedy is supplied by section 105 which provides that they may be ground of objection in the appeal against the final decree. In Nizam of Hyderabad, In re (15) it was held that under section 622, Civil Procedure Code, interlocutory orders passed under section 387 refusing an application for the examination of witnesses on commission cannot be revised, as section 591 prescribes the course to be followed in regard to defective interlocutory orders. Muttasami Ayyar, J., said: "I do not consider that section 622 is applicable to them and it pre-supposes a decision or an order in the nature of a decree and that no other remedy is provided for specially by the Code."

In the case reported as Louis Dreyfus and Co. v. Khillu Ram (20) decided by the Punjab Chief Court it was held that the Court will not interfere with an interlocutory order made in a suit over which the trial Court had jurisdiction when an appeal is allowed from the final decree or the applicant has another remedy open to him whereby he may obtain the relief sought by him. In Chattar Singh v. Lekhraj Singh (11) Oldfield, J., used language which may aptly be applied to the present case:—"The proceeding is of an interlocutory character only, made in the course of a suit; it is part of a case which is still undecided, and in which an appeal lies from the final decree. It was not the intention to allow of revision of interlocutory proceedings, in the course of a suit which do not determine it." Farid Ahmed v. Dulari Bibi (12) is to the same effect. In Bai Atrani v. Deepsingh Baria (9) it was held that the application to the High Court was competent under section 115 against an order granting the temporary injunction as the order was a "case decided in which no appeal lies." within the meaning of the section and, as Hayward, J., pointed out, it was not an order affecting the decision of the suit in which it was made and so could not be questioned on the final appeal from the decree under section 105.

Mr. Rupchand has strongly relied on the case of Dhapi v. Ram Pershad (6) decided by a Division Bench in Calcutta. In this case Norris J., held that the word "case" is wide enough to include an interlocutory order and that the words "record of any case" include so much of the proceedings in any suit as relate to the interlocutoy order. He added: "It is easy to imagine cases where irremediable injury may be done to a party by an interlocutory order made without jurisdiction, and unless the words of the section are clear beyond all doubt to the contray, I cannot believe that the Legislature intended such injury to remain without a remedy." It must not be overlooked that in Dhapi v. Ram Pershad (6) the order of the lower Court was made without jurisdiction and there is no express finding whether the order is or is not one that could be objected to in the final appeal, and, further, the view of the applicability of section 622 to interfere with interlocutory orders in the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court is that of one of the Judges alone in the Division Bench. The ruling in Sivaprosad Ram v. Tricomdas (30) is hardly applicable to the present case. This case mainly proceeded on the powers of the High Court to interfere with interlocutory orders when they might lead to failure of justice or irreparable injury, under section 15 of the Charter Act. It was not expressly decided that section 115 empowered the High Court to revise interlocutory orders. There is no doubt that the High Courts have power to interfere, under section 15 of the Charter Act, with interlocutory orders passed by subordinate Courts and the Privy Council has so held in a case reported as Nilmoni Singh v Taranath (31) and similar rulings are to be found in Gobinda Mohan Das v. Kunja Behay Das (22) and Amjad Ali v. Ali Hussain (23). But that Act is not applicable to this Court and we are to be guided by the provisions of section 115, Civil Procedure Code alone. The case reported as Balakrishna Udayar v. Vasudeva Aiyar (26) can afford very little assistance to the applicant in this case. There it was held that the proceedings by petition to the Civil Court which were adjudicated upon constituted a case within the meaning of section 115, Civil Procedure Code, and consequently revision was permisible.

In my opinion, it is not the policy of the law and certainly it would not be expedient if parties aggrieved by interlocutory orders in a pending suit were to be permitted to invoke the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court to rectify every injury, real or imaginary, to their rights. Section 105, Civil Procedure Code, clearly provides the remedy where an erroneous order affecting the decision of the case is made by the lower Court during the pendency of the suit. Without discussing the merits of the present case, it appears to me that the order of the lower Court refusing to issue a commission for the examination of some defence witnesses may be attended with serious results to the defendant's case; but there is nothing to prevent the defendant from questioning the legality of the order in the appeal against the final decree. It may be a hardship to the defendant that he should be compelled to go on appeal, but it is our business to administer the law as it stands. As I understand the law, section 115 is not intended to apply to an interlocutory order in a pending suit which, though erroneous, the Court has jurisdiction to make, and the legality of which can be challenged in an appeal against the final decree.

To interfere, in our revisional jurisdiction with an order such as the one in the present case, would be not only to render the provisions of section 105, Civil Procedure Code nugatory, but to subvert the purpose for which section 115 was framed.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the application for revision is incompetent and I would dismiss it with costs on the applicant.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.
CIVIL REVISION No. 150 OF 1919.
March 30, 1920.
Present:—Mr. Justice Rafique
MURTAZA KHAN—DECREE-HOLDER—APPLICANT
versus
LALTA SINGH—AUCTION-PURCHASER—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115—Revision—Interlocutory order—Arbitrary order—High Court, interference by.

In a suit for a declaration that certain property sold in execution of a decree was not liable to attachment and sale and that it belonged to the plaintiff and not to the judgment-debtor in execution of the decree against whom the property was sold, the plaintiff impleaded the holder of the decree, the judgment-debtor and the auction-purchaser as defendants. The auction-purchaser made an application to the Court to direct his co-defendant, the decree-holder, to deposit in Court the amount realised by the auction-sale, and an order was made accordingly. On revision:

Held, (1) that the order was not open to appeal but a revision was competent:

(2) that the order was arbitrary and uncalled for and must be set aside.

Civil revision against the order of the Munsif, Cawnpore, dated the 24th November 1919.

Mr. Kailas Nath Katju, for the Applicant.

Mr. Uma Shankar Bajpai for Mr. Vishnu Nath, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—The facts which have given rise to this revision are as follows:—

One Bhadani executed a deed of mortgage in respect of a house in favour of the applicant, Murtaza Khan. The latter sued for recovery of his money and obtained a preliminary decree on the 15th July 1918. Subsequently, a final decree was drawn up in favour of Murtaza Khan on the 5th of June 1919. In execution of that decree the mortgaged property, that is, the house, was put up to sale on the 23rd of July 1919 and was purchased by one Lalta Singh. The sale was confirmed on the 26th of August 1919. From the sale proceeds the decree of Murtaza Khan was paid off on the 30th of August 1919 and the balance of the sale price was paid to the other creditors of Bhadani, the judgment-debtor. Ram Prasad instituted a suit on the 31st of July 1919 for a declaration that the house sold on the 23rd of July 1919 in execution of the decree of the 6th of May 1919 was not liable to attachment and sale as it belonged to him and not to Bhadani. The claim was brought against Lalta Singh the auction-purchaser, Bhadani, the judgment-debtor and Murtaza Khan, the decree-holder. On the 10th September 1919 Lalta Singh filed an application before the Munsif asking him to call upon Murtaza Khan to deposit the decretal amount that he had realised through Court on the 30th of August 1919 on the ground that in case the suit of Ram Prasad succeeded Lalta Singh, the auction-purchaser, would stand to lose his money, as Murtaza Khan was a poor man. The Munsif allowed the application on the 24th November 1919 directing Murtaza Khan to deposit the money that had been paid to him on account of the decree by Court on the 30th of August 1919. Two days after, that is, on the 26th November 1919, at the instance of Lalta Singh, the Munsif issued a warrant of arrest against Murtaza Khan for the realisation of the money. Murtaza Khan has come up in revision to this Court. He challenges the order of the Munsif dated the 24th of November 1919 and contends that the order is not justified under the law or by any just or equitable consideration. He describes the order as arbitrary and without any justification. On behalf of Lalta Singh two objections are taken to the application. The first is a preliminary objection based on the case of Nand Ram v. Bhopal Singh (1) and is to the effect that no revision lies from an interlocutory order, the order under revision being described as an interlocutory order. I do not think that the objection on behalf of the opposite party has any force. In the case of Nand Ram v. Bhopal Singh (1) it was laid down that no revision lay to this Court from an interlocutory order which order could be contested in appeal. In the present case, if Ram Prasad succeeds, Murtaza Khan cannot go up in appeal against Ram Prasad and object to the order of 24th November 1919 in his grounds of appeal, because the order does not in any way affect the merits of the case of Ram Prasad. The second objection on behalf of the opposite party is that Murtaza Khan is a man of straw and if he is not made to deposit the money that he realised from Court on account of his decree now, Lalta Singh, the auction-purchaser, in case of the success of Ram Prasad will be unable to get back his money. This objection is really irrelevant. The fact that the decree-holder is a poor man, which fact by the way is not admitted, will not enable Lalta Singh to ask the Munsif to pass an order which is not warranted by law. The learned Vakil for Lalta Singh has been unable to show to me any provision of the law under which an order of the kind that is under discussion can be passed by a Court of law. The order is an arbitrary one and quite uncalled for. I, therefore, accept the revision and set aside the order of the lower Court, dated the 24th of November 1919. The applicant will get costs of this application.

Co-owners—Ouster—Sole possession and enjoyment of profits—Presumption.

Sole possession and enjoyment of profits by one co-owner continuously for a long period without any claim or demand by any person claiming under the other co-owners is evidence from which an actual ouster of the other co-owners may be presumed. [p. 732, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the Officiating Subordinate Judge, Shahabad, dated the 28th April 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, Buxar, dated the 31st August 1918.

Mr. Parmeshwar Dyal, for the Appellants.

Mr. N N. Sen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs sought for a declaration of their title to 4 annas share in 12 bighas 15 kathas of land in Mouzas Gangapur and Dhanbakhra. They claimed that the disputed lands were kept joint after a partition between two brothers, Janki Pandey and Atma Ram Pandey.

The plaintiffs are the descendants of one branch of Janki's family and the defendants Nos. 8, 9 and 10 of another branch; the defendants Nos. 1 to 7 are the descendants of Atma Ram, but in the Record of Rights the disputed lands were all entered in the names of defendants Nos. 1 to 7. The defendants Nos. 1 to 7 were also recorded in the landlord's Sheristá.

The plaintiffs alleged that in 1324 they were refused joint possession of the disputed land by the defendant Nos. 1 to 7, and so asked for a declaration of their one-fourth share in the lands and for joint possession, or, in the alternative, for partition.

The defendants Nos. 1 to 7 contended that the properties were self acquired properties of their ancestors and that they had been in exclusive possession of them for more than 12 years.

The Munsif found that there had been a partition more than 25 years ago and that the onus lay on the plaintiffs to show that the lands in suit remained joint after partition. He found the story of the defendants that the lands were self-acquired properties of their ancestors was not proved, but that the leases and rent receipts stood in the names of the defendants' ancestors, while the plaintiffs were unable to produce any receipt showing joint possession later than the year 1293. He held that the plaintiffs had failed to establish joint possession at the time of, or before the survey, and had also failed to rebut the presumption raised by the survey entry and also the presumption of the property being the separate and exclusive property of the defendants after partition. He dismissed the suit.

The learned Subordinate Judge on appeal found that the partition took place more than 48 years ago and that the plaintiffs had shown by receipts that they held joint possession until 1300 F. S. and so they had the advantage of the presumption as to continuity of possession as co-owners; and, exclusive possession however long continued by other co-owners not being able to create any title in their favour as against the plaintiffs, he found that the silent exclusive possession by the defendant Nos. 1 to 7 would not take away the title of the plaintiffs as the possession of the defendants would be construed as on behalf of their co-owners, the plaintiffs. He allowed the appeal.

Before me it is contended that, though the principle of law propounded by the Subordinate Judge is correct, namely, that long and exclusive possession by a co-tenant cannot be held to be adverse to that of the other co-owners, still the circumstances of this case show that the exclusive possession of the defendants practically amounted to an ouster. The learned Vakil relies on the case of Gangadhar v. Parashram Bhalchandra (1) where it was held that sole possession by one tenant in common continuously for a long period without any claim or demand by any person claiming under the other tenant-in-common is evidence from which an actual ouster of the other tenant-in-common may be presumed. Lord Denman in Culley v. Doe d. Taylerson (2) said: "No doubt exclusive receipt of profits continuously for a long period may point to an ouster, but the Court must be satisfied that such taking of profits is an indication of a denial of rights in other co-tenants to receive them". Similarly, in Ayennessa Bibi v. Sheikh Isuf (3) it was held that to establish adverse possession by one tenant in-common against his co-tenants there must be an exclusion or an ouster and the possession subsequent to that exclusion or ouster must be for the statutory period. There it was mentioned that the circumstances that have to be taken into consideration are, among others, the relationship of the parties, their position, the mode of life in the particular community to which the parties belong, the character of the property, and other circumstances of a similar character.

It is urged by Mr. Parmeshwar Dayal for the appellants that in the present case the parties belonged to the same village and were all agriculturists; that it was found that for 25 years, although the partition had been 50 years ago, the plaintiffs had not been in possession, and that in 1912 at the last survey and settlememt operations after contest between the parties the defendants Nos 1 to 7 were alone recorded. It is true that where joint possession has been found it may be presumed to continue but the only evidence of joint possession is provided by a few receip's up to the year 1893, and since then there is not the least sign that the plaintiffs had any joint possession. The evidence, therefore, of joint possession after the partition is very slender. On the other hand, considering that the defendants Nos. 1 to 7 alone are entered in the landlord's Sherista and considering that they alone are recorded in the Record of Rights, while, as Mr. Parmeshwar Dayal points out, that the parties all lived in one village and were agriculturists, I think that it can be safely inferred and believed that all the circumstances of the case point to the fact that there was an exclusion of the plaintiffs by the defendants and an ouster of the plaintiffs. The entry in the Record of Rights was not rebutted and I, therefore allow the appeal and setting aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court, restore that of the Munsif.

FIRST APPEAL FROM ORDER No. 150 OF 1919.

BALLEO SINGH—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

Registration Act (XVI of 1908), s. 17—Compromise, petition of, filed in mutation proceedings—Registration, whether necessary—Family settlement, nature of—Party, whether can resile from settlement—Consideration.

In a mutation proceeding a petition of compromise was filed reciting that the parties had effected a mutual settlement fixing the shares which each was to get in the property, and asking that the mutation of names might be effected in accordance therewith. In a suit by one of the parties to the settlement for a larger share in the property than he got under the settlement, the question was whether the petition of compromise, being unregistered, was admissible in evidence:

Held, per Kanhaiya Lal, J., that as the object of the petition was directly to obtain mutation in a particular manner and not to declare any rights, it was admissible in evidence for determining whether such a settlement as was set out therein had taken place, and that, even if registration was necessary, the petition would, nevertheless, be admissible in evidence as collateral evidence of the agreement, though it might not operate to effectuate a valid transfer of rights. [p 734, col. 2; p. 738, col. 1.]

Per Piggott, J.—As the petition of compromise contained an authoritative admission by each party as against the other of the title of the other party to whatever share had been agreed upon amongst them, the petition was a document purporting to declare the rights of the parties concerned in immoveable property, and as that property was worth more than Rs. 100 it was inadmissible in evidence, and was of no effect as a document of title. [p. 739, cols. 1 & 2.]

A family settlement of disputed claims does not necessarily involve the transfer of a right from one person to another, consequently, such a settlement is unaffected by any of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, and as the consideration for such a settlement is the mutual promise made, or forbearance shown by one party to the other, it is not open to either party thereto, in the absence of fraud or undue influence, to resile from it afterwards. [p. 734, col. 2; p. 735, col. 2.]

Appeal from the order of the District Judge, Moradabad, dated the 11th September 1919.

Messrs. M. L. Agarwala and B. E. O'Conor, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru and Dr. S. N. Sen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

KANHAIYA LAL, J.—The dispute in this appeal relates to certain property which belonged to Narpat Singh, who died childless in April 1912. He had six nephews alive at the time of his death. Out of them three, namely, Raghubar Singh, Tura Singh, and Rewat Singh, were the sons of his brother, Ganpat Singh; one, Baldeo Singh was the son of his brother, Dalip Singh; and the remaining two, Gajram Singh and Genda Singh, were the sons of his brother, Roshan Singh. Ganpat Singh, Dalip Singh and Roshan Singh had died in the lifetime of Narpat Singh and had been living separately from him; so were their sons. On the death of Narpat Singh an application for mutation of names was presented by Raghubar Singh, Tura Singh and Gajram Singh on behalf of themselves and their minor brothers Rewat Singh and Genda Singh, for the entry of the names of all the nephews in respect of the estate left by the deceased in equal shares. An objection was filed by Baldeo Singh, claiming a half share in the said property on the ground that Ganpat Singh had been adopted in another family and that, according to the custom prevailing in the tribe to which the parties belonged, the nephews of a deceased co-sharer were entitled to inherit his property per stirpes. A settlement was eventually arrived at whereby a one third share was allotted to the sons of Ganpat Singh, now represented by the plaintiffs, a one third share to Baldeo Singh, and a one-third share to the sons of Roshan Singh. In pursuance thereof, an application was filed in the mutation proceeding on the 7th of August 1912 stating that the parties had arrived at a settlement amongst themselves fixing the shares which each was to get in the property of the deceased, and asking that the mutation of names might be effected in accordance therewith. The petition contained a detail of the landed property left by Narpat Singh, with a specification of the share which each party was to hold. Subsequently, they divided the house property also and undertook to pay the debts due by Narpat Singh in the same proportion. Certain agreements were executed and registered by the parties to evidence the latter transactions.

The allegation of the plaintiffs, who are the descendants of Ganpat Singh, is that the consent of the sons of Ganpat Singh had been obtained at the time of the settlement by fraud, that one of the sons was a minor at the time, and that the other sons were of immature understanding. They claimed that they were entitled to a half share in the property left by Narpat Singh and sued for the recovery of such portion as the defendants held in excess of their half share with mesne profits. The trial Court found against them and dismissed their claim. The lower Appellate Court allowed their appeal and remanded the suit to that Court for a decision on the merits.

The trial Court found that no deception had been practised by the defendants and that the settlement made was binding on the parties. The lower Appellate Court did not determine whether any fraud or deception had been practised. It treated the petition of compromise, filed in the mutation proceeding, as inadmissible for want of registration and from the observation made by it that the parties had apparently acquiesced in the arrangement for some years and that the representatives of each of the brothers of Narpat Singh had discharged one-third of his debts, it might be inferred that it was inclined to hold that some such arrangement had taken place but no explicit finding was recorded by it.

The first question for consideration in this appeal is, whether the petition of compromise filed in the mutation proceeding purported or operated to create, extinguish or declare any rights in immoveable property of the value of over rupees one hundred, and required registration. The petition does not by itself purport to create or extinguish any right to or interest in immoveable property. It does not even purport to declare any such interest. It begins by reciting that a mutual settlement had taken place whereby the shares of each of the contending parties had been fixed in a particular manner and then goes on to ask that the mutation of names may be effected in accordance with the shares specified in the application. The recital in question was intended to serve merely as a prelude to the operative part of the petition and cannot independently of the operative part serve as a valid test for determining whether the petition in question required registration. As pointed out in Sakharam Krishnaji v. Madan Krishnaji (1) and in Satrohan Lal v. Nageshar Prasad (2), the expressions "create" "assign" "limit" or "extinguish" imply a definite change of legal relation to property by an expression of will embodied in the document referred to, and the expression "declare" must import a similar meaning. An acknowledgment might serve as evidence of the right acknowledged but it might not have been made with an intent to "declare" that right. A letter containing an admission, direct or inferential, or a recital that a partition has taken place or a settlement has been arrived at in a particular manner, does not "declare" a right. That term implies a declaration of will made in writing to serve as evidence thereof and not a mere statement of fact. Unless such a distinction is accepted, all correspondence and petitions would have to be excluded, from which any admission or acknowledgment might be gathered of a right or interest, the instrument of which, if there was one, would need to be registered.

The object of filing a petition of compromise in a mutation proceeding is to intimate to the Court in which that proceeding is pending that the matters in contention between the parties have been settled out of Court and do not any longer require determination, and that the mutation of names may be effected in accordance with that settlement. Indirectly, the petition reciting the settlement might serve in a future proceeding as evidence of the terms of the settlement, but its object is directly to obtain mutation in a particular manner and not to declare any rights.

The petition in the present case asked that the mutation of names should be effected in accordance with the settlement arrived at after stating what the nature of that settlement was. It was, to use the language of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Pranal Anni v. Lakshmi Anni (3), a mere step of judicial procedure and did not require registration. A mutation proceeding is a proceeding in which evidence can be taken and the rights of parties determined in a summary manner unless adjusted out of Court, and, as their Lordships of the Privy Council observed in Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (4), the provisions of section 17 of the Registration Act do not apply to proper judicial proceedings, whether consisting of pleadings filed by the parties or of orders made by the Court. As the petition contained nothing more than a recital of the oral settlement effected out of Court it should not have been excluded by the lower Appellate Court from consideration in determining whether such a settlement had taken place.

The next question is, whether such a settlement could have been effected out of Court so as to affect immoveable property of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards otherwise than by a registered instrument. Section 9 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) says that a transfer of property may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by law. A family settlement of disputed claims does not necessarily involve the transfer of a right from one person to another. In Stapilton v. Stapilton (5) it was held that "an agreement entered into upon a supposition of a right, or of a doubtful right though it afterwards comes out that the right was on the other side, shall be binding, and the right shall not prevail against the agreement of the parties, for the right must always be on one side or the other; and, therefore, the compromise of a doubtful right would be a sufficient foundation of an agreement". Commenting on that decision, the Editors of the Leading Cases in Equity say:—"From the case of Stapilton v. Stapilton (5) the current of authorities has been uniform, and wherever doubts and disputes have arisen with regard to the rights of different members of the same family and fair compromises have been entered into to preserve the harmony and affection or to save the honour of the family, those arrangements have been sustained by this Court, albeit, perhaps, resting upon grounds which would not have been considered satisfactory, if the transaction had occurred between mere strangers, and a family arrangement may also be implied, without any express written contract, from a long course of dealing between the parties," (Ibid, page 254).

In Gordon v. Gordon (6) Lord Eldon observed: "Where family agreements have been fairly entered into, without concealment or imposition upon either side, with no suppression of what is true, or suggestion of what is false, then, although the parties may have greatly misunderstood their situation and mistaken their rights, a Court of Equity will not disturb the quiet, which is the consequence of that agreement".

In a settlement of a doubtful right truth may be on either side but the essential effect of the settlement is that further trouble or investigation is put an end to and a settlement is concluded to restore harmony. Such a settlement does not necessarily imply a transfer of property or rights by one party to another. It proceeds, in the language of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rani Mewa Kunwar v. Rani Hulas Kunwar (7), on the assumption that there was an antecedent title of some kind in the parties and the agreement acknowledges and defines what that title is. In Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (8), their Lordships of the Privy Council, referring to a compromise entered into between certain members of a family by which they had settled their disputes and divided the family property, quoted with approval certain observations in Lalla Oudh Beharee Lall v. Ranee Mewa Koonwer (9) wherein the learned Judges had said: "The true character of the transaction appears to us to have been a settlement between the several members of the family of their disputes, each one relinquishing all claim in respect of all property in dispute other than that falling to his share, and recognising the right of the others, as they had previously asserted it to the portion allotted to them respectively. It was in this light, rather than as conferring a new distinct title on each other, that the parties themselves seem to have regarded the arrangement, and we think that it is the duty of the Courts to uphold and give full effect to such an arrangement".

If a family settlement does not involve the transfer of any rights in immoveable property from one party to another and merely defines or acknowledges the antecedent rights of contending members of the family which were till then involved in doubt and uncertainty or settles disputes relating thereto, such a settlement does not fall within the purview of any of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) and need not be reduced to writing. The consideration for such a settlement is the mutual promise made or forbearance shown by one party to the other and it is not open to either party to such a settlement to resile from it afterwards. The position of the parties is necessarily altered by such a compromise so that if the question is afterwards opened up they cannot always be replaced as they were before the compromise. Any one of them may be in a less favourable position for renewing his litigation, he may have to undertake an additional trouble and expense in again getting up his case and he may no longer be able to produce the evidence which would have proved it originally. It is thus a detriment to the party consenting to a compromise, arising from a necessary alteration in his position which prevents the other party from going behind it and no Court of Equity would permit a settlement into which the parties have entered with open eyes to be re opened with impunity. The defendant Baldeo Singh was denying the right of the sons of Ganpat Singh to succeed to the property of Narpat Singh on the ground that Ganpat Singh had been adopted in another family. If his objection had been tried and found to have been valid the plaintiffs would not have been entitled to any share. He was also setting up a custom by virtue of which according to his contention the nephews were entitled to inherit per stirpes. It is unnecessary to enquire whether his pleas were well founded or not. If he chose to surrender his objections and to reduce his claim from a half to one-third in consideration of the sons of Ganpat Singh and Roshan Singh consenting to allow him that share as if the inheritance had devolved per stirpes, it would be inequitable to permit the plaintiffs or the descendants of Roshan Singh now to go behind that settlement and to re-open matters which the object of that settlement was to set at rest once and for ever.

The settlement here made was evidently not confined to the landed property left by Narpat Singh, for, soon after, the parties had succeeded in getting the mutation of names effected in accordance with that settlement, they proceeded to divide the house property and to apportion the liability for the payment of the debts due by Narpat Singh in a similar proportion. They have been in possession in accordance with that settlement since and have paid the debts due by Narpat Singh as if the plaintiffs and defendant No. 1 and the other defendants had been entitled to a one-third share each in the property of the deceased.

In Kanhai Lal v. Brij Lal (10) where upon the death of a person governed by the Mitakshara Law his nephew and some other members of the family disputed the right of his widow to succeed to his property and a compromise was entered into by which the property was immediately divided and the right of the nephew to succeed as the adopted son of another deceased uncle was recognised, it was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in a suit brought after the death of the widow of the original holder by the nephew aforesaid and his brother, claiming the entire property as reversioners, that he was stopped by reason of his having entered into the agreement of compromise and obtained benefit thereunder from claiming as a reversioner.

In Hardei v. Bhagwan Singh (11) where a widow had divided certain property in her lifetime between her daughters and daughter's sons in absolute right, surrendering her own interest therein, and a sale was subsequently made by one of her daughters in respect of the property which had been allotted to her share, the validity of which was challenged by another daughter after the death of the widow, their Lordships similarly held that the arrangement so made was binding on the daughters after the death of the widow. They referred to the evidence showing that the said arrangement had been acted on in the lifetime of the widow and observed:—"The true inference appears to their Lordships to be that, at a time when Pato (the widow) was claiming to be absolutely entitled to the property in her possession, and when her rights and those of her daughters were in doubt, the members of the family agreed and arranged among themselves that the whole property should be at once divided among the daughters and their sons then living, the mother surrendering her claims and each daughter accepting the property allotted to her in severalty in lieu of the undivided share in the whole estate which would have devolved upon her on her mother's death and abandoning her right of survivorship on the death of either of her sisters. Whether this arrangement is bindig on the grandsons cannot be determined in this suit, and on that question their Lordships express no opinion. But the plaintiff, at all events, is bound by her own agreement; and in view of this fact, and of the favour shown by the Courts to family arrangements and the long period of time which has elapsed since the arrangement was made, she cannot now be allowed to repudiate the agreement and to impeach a sale which was made upon the faith of it."

The learned Counsel for the plaintiffs-respondents relies on certain decisions of this Court in Bharosa v. Sikhdar (12), Bhagwan Sahai v. Harchain (13) and Rustam Ali Khan v. Gaura (14). But, as pointed out by Chamier, J., in the first of the cases above referred to (at page 1000),* it is unsafe to assume in the case of every compromise that a party had some antecedent title to the property allotted to him. Some compromises, as he said, certainly rest on no such assumption and it often happens that property is conveyed by one party to another in consideration of the abandonment of a claim by the other. In the second case above referred to the petition of compromise filed in the Revenue Court dealt with matters beyond the scope of the enquiry pending before the Revenue Court, one of which afterwards became the subject of contention in the Civil Court, and it was distinctly recognised that, though the petition of compromise which was tendered in evidence as a title-deed was not admissible in evidence to prove that a transfer of ownership was effected, undoubtedly it could, along with the order passed thereon, be admitted in evidence and must be taken into account, for what it might be worth, in deciding the issues raised in the civil suit. In the last case mentioned above there was evidently no completed settlement of the dispute, for the petition of compromise was repudiated, after it was filed, by one of the parties thereto and mutation of names was effected in his favour regardless of its terms.

A reference has also been made to the decisions in Kashi Kunbi v. Sumer Kunbi (15) and Jagrani v. Bisheshar Dube (16). In the former case a compromise was filed in a civil suit, embodying provision as to the right of pre emption, which was not embodied in the decree, and it was held by this Court that the petition of compromise, so far as it purported to confer a right of pre emption outside the scope of the suit, could not affect immoveable property, a right to which could be created only by a registered instrument. In the latter case, the daughter of the last male owner was induced to withdraw her claim to mutation of names in her favour in consideration of certain bonds, which the brother of the last male owner had agreed to execute in her favour, but which she never received, and the consideration of the compromise was found to be inadequate. There was no proof of any valid family arrangement independently of the petition of compromise which it was held was ineffective to operate as a relinquishment by the daughter of her right to the property in question because the compromise evidencing the relinquishment was not registered.

It is noticeable, however, that none of the learned Judges who decided that case was in favour of excluding the petition of compromise from evidence altogether. Richards, C. J., said that it could be admitted in evidence provided it was otherwise relevant to the case.

In holding that the petition required registration he was evidently influenced by the consideration that the mutation proceedings were not judicial proceedings, in which a decree could possibly be passed which would have the effect of transferring the interest of any of the contending claimants; but, as pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sadik Husain Khan v. Hashim Ali Khan (17), even uncontested mutation proceedings are proceedings of a quasi Judicial character, and contested mutation proceedings are much more so. The rights created by the orders passed in such proceedings cannot be displaced except by a civil suit or appeal. Tudball, J., said that the petition of compromise did not purport to be a deed of relinquishment and did not, therefore, require registration, and he added that, where a family settlement bona fide and free of fraud had been made and acted upon by all the parties, even though a full and proper document was not duly executed and registered, the Courts could not refuse to go behind it. Rafique, J., said that, if the compromise filed before a Revenue Court was merely an intimation of the fact of a compromise already made, and nothing more, then the question of the admissibility of the document was irrelevant. These cases do not, therefore, help the plaintiffs.

The circumstances attending the filing of the petition of compromise, read with the orders passed thereon and the subsequent conduct of the parties in dividing the house property and apportioning their liability for the payment of the debts due by Narpat Singh in the proportion in which the landed property was divided and coupled with the subsequent enjoyment of the said properties by each of them and the payment of the debts due by Narpat Singh in accordance with that settlement, lead irresistibly to the conclusion that an oral settlement had been made at or about the time when the disputes connected with the mutation proceedings arose, and that, in pursuance of that settlement, a petition of compromise was filed in the mutation proceeding and the division of the house property and the apportionment of the debts were afterwards effected.

I may add that, even if the petition of compromise required registration, it would still be admissible in evidence as collateral evidence of the agreement which the plaintiffs seek to impeach, though it might not operate to effectuate a valid transfer of rights, and, inasmuch as it has been acted upon and the parties have enjoyed benefits thereunder irrespective of what might have been or might not have been their respective rights in the property from which they received those benefits, neither party can be allowed to resile from the arrangement then made.

In Mdhomed Musa v. Aghore Kumar Ganguli (18), their Lordships of the Privy Council pointed out that, even though the compromise and the decree taken together were considered to be defective or inchoate as elements making up a final and validly concluded agreement for the extinction of the equity of redemption, the actings and the conduct of the parties founded upon the performance or part performance of such an agreement were sufficient to cure all defects; for equity will support a transaction clothed imperfectly in those legal forms to which finality attaches after the bargain has been acted upon.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed and the case sent back to the lower Appellate Court with a direction to reinstate the appeal under its original number and to dispose of it after the determination of the other points involved therein, in the manner required by law. The costs here and hitherto will abide the result.

PIGGOTT, J.—I agree that in this case the order of remand cannot be supported on the grounds on which it proceeds, and that the appeal ought to be further heard by the lower Appellate Court in order to determine the points raised in the memorandum of appeal to that Court but not decided. The question of the use, as documents of title, of petitions presented to Courts of Revenue, or of the orders of the said Courts on such petitions, has been felt in this Court to be a difficult one and I am not prepared to say that all the reported decisions of learned Judges of this Court on the point are to be easily reconcilable. The present in some ways is a typical case, though it is distinguished by one or two features which make the case for the defendant-appellant in this Court much stronger than it would, in my opinion, otherwise have been. When a proprietor of revenue paying property dies, it becomes the duty of the Revenue Court to ascertain on whom that property has devolved and to cause proper entries to be made in the various records of proprietary rights maintained under the provisions of the Land Revenue Act. When there is a dispute amongst parties, claiming one another the right of succession to the whole or to any part of the property, the proceedings in the Revenue Court usually begin, as they did in this case, with an exact ascertainment of the nature of the dispute and the conflicting claims of the various parties to it.

The duty of the Revenue Court after this stage is clearly laid down in the Land Revenue Act. It must first endeavour, if possible, to ascertain which of the parties is in effective possession and, if satisfied on this point, its order will merely be that the party ascertained to be in possession be recorded as proprietor in the village papers. Such order will not serve as a document of title. It is expressly left open to any party dissatisfied with that order to assert his claim before a Civil Court of competent jurisdiction. If the Revenue Court is unable to satisfy itself as to the actual possession over the disputed property, it may enter into an enquiry on the question of title and direct entries in the village records to be made in favour of the party with whom, in the opinion of the Revenue Court, the best title prima facie appears to rest an order of this kind again cannot serve as a document of title, for the right of the disappointed party to litigate matters in the Civil Court is expressly reserved by the Land Revenue Act itself. Now we come to the question of what is to happen if the rivals come to an agreement amongst themselves Theoretically, such an agreement might be strictly limited in its scope, that is to say, the disputants might agree to enter into possession for the present in such and such shares, expressly reserving their right to bring the matter to issue before a Civil Court. Practically, in nine cases out of ten, if the parties come to an agreement, they mean it to be a final settlement and do not contemplate further litigation in any Court. Even then, if the parties were always advised by a competent lawyer, the regular course for them to follow would be to present a petition before the Revenue Court simply stating that, having come to an agreement amongst themselves, they have taken effective possession of the disputed property in such and such shares, and praying that the fact of their possession may be recognised by appropriate entries in the village papers.

Such a petition would be open to no objection whatever on the score of want of registration, but neither could it be set up in any possible eventuality as a document of title. The trouble is that the parties generally prefer to approach the Revenue Court with a petition which, at the time, they hope will serve as a document of title, that is to say, as an authoritative admission by each party, as against the other, of the title of the other party to whatever share has been agreed upon amongst them. In my opinion, any petition so drafted as to satisfy these conditions becomes a document purporting to declare the rights of the parties concerned in immoveable property and if that property is worth more than Rs. 100, it requires registration. In the absence of registration, it is not admissible in evidence and is of no effect as a document of title.

I fully recognise the fact that reported judicial decisions are not unanimous on this point, and that, in laying down this proposition, I am to a certain extent differing from the judgment which has been delivered by my learned brother, but I have stated the law as I understand it to be and I think I can found myself with confidence on the latest Full Bench decision of this Court on the subject, Jagrani v. Bisheshar Dube(16). There are cases, however, and, in my opinion, this is one of them, which are not concluded by the above considerations. The actual agreement come to by the parties is a matter of oral arrangement amongst themselves antecedent to, and sometimes quite independent of, the drafting of the petition presented to the Court of Revenue. In the present case, for instance, the property left by the deceased comprised house property as well as revenue paying property and there were debts which would have to be paid by the heirs and successors of the deceased in proportion to whatever share they took in the inheritance. I think it is clear that, in the present case, the parties entered into an agreement which completely covered the entire question of the disputed inheritance. They executed a properly registered deed defining their respective rights in the house property and that deed is, beyond question, a valid document of title and binding on the parties They also proceeded to pay off the debts in the proportion in which they took the inheritance. This point was established by evidence which was not questioned in the lower Appellate Court. The only difficulty in the way of the defendant-appellant in resisting this suit is that he holds no clear document of title in respect of the revenue paying property. Now, the agreement come to by the parties in this case was undoubtedly of the nature of a family settlement of doubtful claims. At least, we are bound to treat it as such, unless and until the finding of the Court of first instance that there was no fraud or undue influence employed by the defendant appellant in bringing about the agreement is reversed on appeal. When such an agreement decides a bona fide disputed claim to immoveable property, particularly when the dispute is between members of the same family, I do not think that it is correct to treat the transaction as if there had been a conveyance of immoveable property by any one party to any other. No doubt, theoretically, on the law and the facts of each particular case, the title was with one of the parties to the dispute and not with the other, and some learned Judges have, consequently, treated all cases of this sort on the assumption that the question of title can be fought out in a subsequent litigation, and that, once it has been ascertained, all the transactions connected with the agreement come to between the parties must be treated as a conveyance of immoveable property by the party in whom it has been ascertained that the title really vested in favour of the opposite party. I am not sure that one case, at least, of my own could not be quoted against me, which seems to some extent to rest upon this view, although I think the facts of that case were clearly distinguishable from those now before us; at any rate, I take this opportunity of recording my opinion, arrived at after further consideration, that it is not correct to deal with the matter on the basis above suggested. The whole question in issue in a case like the present is, whether the plaintiff is to be permitted to prove his title, as he claims that it existed independently of and antecedently to the family arrangement. The question is, whether the arrangement itself does not bind the parties to it. In this view of the matter, there does not seem to be room for the contention that the arrangement arrived at on the family compromise amounted to a conveyance by one party to the other. Over and above this, even if it were correct to hold that, from a certain point of view, a conveyance of some sort may be said to have taken place, I still think that the transaction would be wholly unaffected by those provisions of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) which require an instrument in writing registered, for the purpose of effecting certain kinds of conveyance. I quite fail to see how a distribution of property amongst the parties like that which I am considering could be called either a sale, or an exchange, or a gift. If so, it follows that the parties to such an arrangement are not bound to execute an instrument in writing at all. The only difficulty will be that, if any one of the parties subsequently elects to resile from the arrangement and to set up the title he had originally claimed for himself, the opposite party may find it difficult to prove what the arrangement was. Of course, if the entire settlement is reduced to writing, the provisions of the Registration Act, and possibly also those of section 91 of the Indian Evidence Act, will come into force; and some of the reported decisions, more particularly those of Mr. Justice Chamier, to which reference was made in the course of argument, really proceed upon this view of the matter. The present case, in my opinion, falls outside the scope of these considerations. The settlement arrived at between the parties was not reduced to writing at all in its entirety. Nowhere did the parties reduce to writing the agreement they had come to about the settlement of the debts due from the deceased proprietor They merely gave practical effect to the arrangement they had arrived at. The question of the house property they settled by executing a valid registered instrument. The petition which they addressed to the Revenue Court, although I am disposed to agree with the learned District Judge that on its terms it did amount to an instrument declaring the rights of the parties in the property to which it referred, and was, therefore, subject to the Registration Law, nevertheless cannot be treated as an instrument in writing recording the terms of the arrangement arrived at between the parties. The difficulty about proving what the arrangement in respect of the revenue paying property was, is completely obviated because there is abundant evidence as to the nature of the arrangement, and the order passed by the Revenue Court in mutation proves that it was part of the arrangement between the parties that they should take possession of the revenue paying property in certain specified shares. For these reasons I am of opinion that the defendant was entitled to set up this family arrangement as a complete answer to the plaintiffs' claim, subject only to a finding in his favour of the pleas taken in the 4th and 5th paragraphs of the memorandum of appeal to the Court below. I therefore, concur, in the order proposed by my learned brother.

BY THE COURT.—The appeal is allowed and the case sent back to the lower Appellate Court with direction to reinstate the appeal under its original number and to dispose of it after the determination of the other points involved in the appeal in the manner required by law. The costs here and hitherto, including in this Court fees on the higher scale, will abide the result.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 62, 97—Patni, sale of—Sale set aside—Suit by auction-purchaser against landlard for rent paid, whether lies—Limitation.

A Patni was sold at the instance of the landlord for arrears of rent. The Patnidars instituted a suit to have the sale set aside and impleaded the purchaser of the Patni as a defendant. The sale was set aside and possession with mesne profits awarded against the purchaser and the landlord directed to refund to the purchaser the purchase-money which he had paid. More than three years afterwards, the purchaser instituted the present suit against the landlord and the Patnidars to recover the sum paid by him as rent for the period of his possession but gave up his claim against the latter:

Held, (1) that as the suit was instituted more than three years after the sale was set aside and more than three years after the last payment was made on account of rent, it was barred by limitation under Article 62 or Article 97 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act. [p. 742, col. 1.]

(2) that in any case the suit did not lie against the landlord. [p. 742, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—A Putni, belonging to the defendants other than the defendant No. 1, was sold by the defendant No. 1, the Maharaja of Burdwan, under the provisions of Regulation VIII of 1819 for arrears of rent. In due course, the Putnidars instituted a suit to have the sale set aside, and the sale was set aside in proceedings properly taken under section 14 of the Putni Regulation. To those proceedings the plaintiffs, who had purchased the Putni at the sale, were made parties. In the decree made by the Court, it was directed that the Maharaja should refund to the present plaintiff who were the auction-purchasers the purchase-money which they had paid, amounting to Rs. 600 with interest. It was further directed that the original Putnidars were to recover possession of the property from the present plaintiffs with mesne profits. In that connection, there was an important direction in the judgment which the Court delivered. The amount of mesne profits, says the learned Subordinate Judge, "will be ascertained in execution when the amounts spent by defendants in connection with the Putni for the management and payment of rent and other necessary things will be taken into account." The Court, therefore, clearly contemplated that when the mesne profits payable by the plaintiffs were ascertained the plaintiffs would put forward their counter-claim on account of rent and other outgoings. We are told that the decree was put in execution for the mesne profits. But the present plaintiffs in those proceedings omitted and, in our opinion, wrongly omitted to make any claim for the amount of the rent which they had paid to the Maharaja during the period for which they were in possession and in receipt of the profits. Instead of making that claim at that appropriate time, they brought the present suit in which they sue the Maharaja of Burdwan and the original Putnidars for the sum which they paid to the Maharaja by way of rent. There appear to us to be several answers to the suit, more than one of which is fatal to the plaintiff's case.

In the first place, the suit was instituted more than three years after the date of the decree of the first Court setting aside the Putni sale. It was also instituted more than three years after the last of the payments made on account of rent. Whether, therefore, Article 62 or Article 97 of the Limitation Act applies, the suit is barred by limitation. In that connection we need only refer to the recent decision of the Privy Council in Hukum Chand Boid v. Pirthichand Lal (1).

The same case is also authority for the proposition that a suit for rent paid to the Zemindar by the auction purchaser of a Putni during his period of possession will not lie against the Zemindar. We see nothing contrary to justice or good conscience in the Maharaja of Burdwan keeping the rent which has been paid to him by the plaintiffs. Apart from that, the point is, in our opinion, concluded by the decision of the Privy Council.

Then, there is the further question whether, under section 14 of the Putni Regulation, a separate suit of this kind is admissible. In the case to which we have already referred the Privy Council appear to us to have expressed a strong inclination in favour of the view that the remedies provided by section 14 are exclusive. Their opinion is no doubt expressed in guarded language. But apart from some such countervailing, consideration, as a long and uninterrupted course of practice, we apprehend that their Lordships are disposed to regard the remedies provided by the Regulation as the only remedies which the law provides. In view, however, of the finding already arrived at on the subject of limitation, it is unnecessary for us to express a final opinion on that question in the present case. The learned Vakil for the auction-purchasers, the plaintiffs, relied on the decision of this Court in Radha Madhub Samonta v. Sasti Ram Sen (2), where the claim was made against the original Putnidars. We may point out that there is an earlier decision of this Court with a contrary implication in Suresh Chandra Mukhopadhya v. Akkori Singh (3). This case does not appear to have been cited before the Bench which decided the later case. Reference may also be made to Tara Chand v. Nafar Ali (4).

As regards the original Putnidars, who were also impleaded as defendants in this suit, the plaintiffs appear in the Court below to have given up their claim as against them. The learned Vakil who appears for the plaintiffs before us has pressed us somewhat strongly to exercise in favour of the plaintiffs the power given to an Appellate Court by rule 33 of Order XLI, Civil Procedure Code. In view, however, of the fact that the plaintiffs made no claim in the execution proceedings and that we are not acquainted with all that took place in those proceedings, and also in view of the grave doubt which arises whether such a suit lies, we are unable to accede to his request. Moreover, the claims against the Putnidars would also, it appears, be barred by limitation under Article 61.

In the result, we set aside the judgment and decree of the Court below and dismiss the plaintiff's suit. The appellant, the defendant No. 1, is entitled to his costs in this Court and in the Court below. We assess the hearing fee in this Court at five gold mohurs.

Execution first appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Allahabad, dated the 19th of February 1919.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Appellant.

Mr. Gokul Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an application for execution of a mortgage-decree. It appears that on the 2nd of January 1918 one Kanhya Lal obtained a final decree for sale of two villages Pasi and Amilia and one house against Thakur Prasad, the present respondent. In execution of a simple money-decree against the latter, half of Pasi and the whole of Amilia and the house were sold at auction and purchased in the name of Hem Chandra on the 20th of March 1918. Subsequently, on the 7th of April 1918, Dr. Mukerji, the father of Hem Chandra, purchased the whole of the mortgage, decree from Kanhya Lal. Dr. Mukerji having got his name substituted in place of the original decree-holder under an order, dated the 24th of August 1918, proceeded to execute the decree and wanted to realize the whole of the decretal amount by sale of only half the share in village Pasi, which was still owned by Thakur Prasad. The judgment-debtor put in objections to the application for execution and pleaded that it was Dr. Mukerji himself who had purchased part of the mortgaged property at auction in the name of his son Hem Chandra, who was a mere benamidar. He further pleaded that, inasmuch as Dr. Mukerji, who was himself interested in part of the mortgaged property, had acquired the mortgage decree, the decree had become incapable of execution. The Court below found that Dr. Mukerji was the real purchaser of part of the mortgaged property and, although it did not hold that the decree had in consequence become incapable of execution, it held that the mortgagee decree holder must give credit for the proportionate part of the decretal amount which was a charge on the property purchased by himself. The decree-holder has appealed to this Court and the judgment debtor has filed cross objections. In appeal, the finding of the Court below that Dr. Mukerji was the real auction-purchaser has not been challenged, but it has been strongly urged that a mortgagee is entitled to realize the whole of the mortgage debt from any part of the mortgaged property he likes, and that the execution Court is not competent to go behind the decree and consider the question of apportionment, which must be left to be determined in a subsequent contribution suit,

Now, it is a well established principle of law that, when a mortgagee acquires a part of the mortgaged property, the integrity of his mortgage is broken and he can no longer compel the mortgagor to pay the whole of the mortgage-money before redeeming his share of the mortgaged property. Such a principle is expressly embodied in section 60 of the Transfer of Property Act. The same principle has been applied to a suit for sale brought by a mortgagee after having acquired part of the equity of redemption. A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, in Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (1), held that where a mortgagee purchases a part of the mortgaged property such purchase has, in the absence of fraud, the effect of discharging and extinguishing that portion of the mortgage-debt which was chargeable on the property purchased by him, that is to say, a portion of the debt which bears the same ratio to the whole amount of the debt as the value of the property purchased bears to the value of the whole of the property comprised in the mortgage. In this case, however, the mortgagee having purchased a moiety of the mortgaged property was seeking to bring to sale the other moiety of the mortgaged property for recovery of only a moiety of the amount due on the mortgage, and was not trying to realize the whole of the mortgage money. It was the mortgagor who raised the point that, inasmuch as the difference between the real value of half the mortgaged property, if sold unincumbered, and the price paid for it by the mortgagee was equal to the amount due upon the mortgage, the mortgage-debt must be taken to have been extinguished. Banerji, J., in delivering the main judgment of the Court, pointed out that when the mortgagee bought a portion of the mortgaged property, the rights of the mortgagee and the mortgagor, as regards the portion purchased, became vested in the same person, and the result was that a part of the mortgage debt was wiped out by reason of this fusion of interests and the balance only was recoverable from the remainder of the mortgaged property. The Court thereupon held that only so much of the debt could be held to be discharged as was proportionate to the value of the property in respect of which the confluence of rights had taken place.

The question that remains to be considered is, whether there is any difference in principle in the case where it is after the decree for sale and not before it, that the mortgagee acquires a part of the mortgaged property, or, what comes practically to the same thing, where a co mortgagor acquires the mortgagee's rights. The contention for the appellant is that the effect of the passing of the decree is to put it beyond the competence of the Court to consider whether there should be any proportionate reduction in the amount sought to be recovered. It is true that an execution Court cannot go behind the decree and must execute it as it finds it, and it is also true that, ordinarily, it is open to the mortgagee to recover the whole of his mortgage money from any part of the mortgaged property he likes and that the mortgagor cannot insist that the mortgaged properties should be sold in any particular order. But, if the vesting of part of the equity of redemption in the mortgagee is tantamount to a discharge or satisfaction of a proportionate part of the mortgage-debt, there is no reason why an execution Court should not recognize it and go into the question of the extent to which the decree has been satisfied. Section 47, Civil Procedure Code, would then be comprehensive enough to cover the case.

No reported case, which can be said to be on all fours with the present case, has been brought to our notice, and the nearest approach to it, to which our attention has been drawn, is the case of Kudhai v. Sheo Dayal (2). That was a case where a joint decree for possession by redemption of a house was passed in favour of Kudhai and several other persons against the mortgagees. Subsequent to the decree, the rights of all the decree holders, other than Kudhai, passed to the judgment-debtors. Kudhai sought execution in respect of the whole house and the mortgagees judgment-debtors objected that, in consequence of the events that had happened, Kudhai was not entitled to get possession of the whole house. Mahmud, J., after remarking that the question raised in that case was not free from difficulty principally because the Code of Civil Procedure contained no express provision to meet cases such as this, was clearly of opinion that, "when subsequent to a decree a portion of the rights to which the decree relates devolves either by inheritance or otherwise upon the judgment-debtor, or is acquired by him under a valid transfer, the decree does not become incapable of execution, but is extinguished only pro tanto." The learned Judge based this rule upon "the common principle of jurisprudence that a person cannot at one and the same time unite in himself two opposite characters. For instance, a person cannot be his own creditor, or the mortgagee of his own rights and it is upon this principle that the doctrine of merger, and what would in Roman Lawlbe called confusio, proceed."

In our opinion the rule enunciated by Mahmud, J. is based on a sound and equitable principle of law and clearly applies to the case before us. Dr. Mukerji has become owner of the equity of redemption in the bulk of the mortgaged property and has also acquired the whole of the mortgage-decree. The legal effect of these devolutions of interest is an extinguishment of his decree pro tanto. It is, therefore, no longer open to him to say that in spite of the bulk of the mortgaged property having vested in him, his mortgage-decree still remains intact, and the Court cannot take into account the rateable liability of the property purchased by him but must allow him to realize the whole of the decree from the remainder of the property. It would be a very cumbersome and circuitous procedure, indeed, if the law were that Dr. Mukerji should realize the whole of the decretal amount in this proceeding, and then refund the excess amount realized by him in a subsequent regular suit for contribution brought against him by the mortgagor. We are satisfied that this is not the law.

Although the judgment-debtor had filed cross-objections to the effect that, in consequence of the vesting of the mortgagee's rights in a person who is himself interested in part of the equity of redemption, the decree has become incapable of execution, the plea has not been pressed before us, and it has been conceded by the learned Advocate for the respondent that the provisions of Order XXI, rule 16, do not apply to a mortgage-decree for sale. And we know of no provision of law or principle of equity under which a complete extinguishment of the decree can take place in such circumstances.

We accordingly dismiss both the appeal and the cross-objection with costs including fees in this Court on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

A suit for possession of land upon which there is an incumbrance is not barred merely because the notice, under section 167 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, annulling the incumbrance was not issued till after the institution of the suit. Such a suit can be decreed subject to the reservation that the incumbrance is annulled by notice within the period of one year of the plaintiff becoming aware of it. [p. 747, col. 1.]

Adverse possession is an incumbrance which can be annulled by a purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree. [p. 748, col. 1.]

EASIN v. INTIJENNESSA BIBI.

Appeal against the decree of the Officiating Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court, Tippera, dated the 20th of January 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, 2nd Court at Nabinagore, dated the 22nd of March 1918.

Babu Akhoy Kumar Banerjee, for the Appellant.

Babu Probodh Chandra Kar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is by defendant No. 6. The suit was originally brought in respect of three plots, but for reasons into which it is not now necessary to enter the subject-matter of dispute was eventually reduced to plot No. 3. The suit was dismissed by the Munsif but decreed on appeal by the Subordinate Judge for the whole of plot No. 3 with the exception of 5 gandas.

The holding of which this plot formed a portion originally belonged to one Ujir Ali. A rent-decree was obtained against him, and in execution of that decree the holding was sold and brought ostensively by defendant No. 10. Subsequently, defendant No. 10 executed a release in favour of the plaintiff. He also executed a release in favour of defendant No. 12 which in appearance was prior in date to the release to the plaintiff. But it has been found by the Appellate Court that that release was antedated and, in fact, the plaintiff's lease was prior. The Court has further found that defendant No. 10 was really the benamdar for the plaintiff, the purchase having been made with her money. The defence of defendant No. 6 was that he had bought part of the land from Ujir Ali in 1302, and that he had bought 5 gandas from Nural Islam. It is in respect of the 5 gandas portion that the suit has been dismissed. We are now concerned with the rest of plot No. 3.

The points taken before me are, first, certain points in connection with section 167 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Secondly, that the suit was untenable in view of section 66 of the Code of Civil Procedure; thirdly, that the original decree in execution of which the property was sold to plaintiff was bad in law, and, fourthly, that the suit was barred by limitation. I may mention at once that the third ground formulated by the learned Pleader in this appeal was subsequently withdrawn by him he saying that he was not in a position to press it. I shall, therefore, confine myself to the other three points urged by him.

The point taken with reference to section 167 is that the suit could not proceed because the notice required by that section to be given to the incumbrancer for the purpose of annulling the incumbrance was not given until after the institution of the suit, and there are subordinance objections that the notice in itself was invalid. To explain the general objection that the suit was bad because the notice had not been given in time it is necessary to point out that the suit was instituted in May 1917, issues were framed on the 12th July 1917 and the notice was given at some subsequent date, though the learned Pleader is not able to tell me exactly what that date was. Under section 167 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, notice is to be given within the year from the date of the sale or from the date on which the purchaser first has notice of the incumbrance. In the present case it appears that the purchaser did not have notice of the incumbrance until the written statement was filed, in fact it was the written statement which gave him notice. The learned Pleader for the appellant, however, argues that, even in spite of that fact the suit cannot proceed and he refers, to support his argument, to the case of Radhay Koer v. Ajodhya Das (1) relying in particular on these observations of the learned Judges: "The plaintiff must seek title as it stood on the date of the institution of the suit, and that the incumbrance subsists until notice under section 167 has been properly served upon the incumbrancer." The incumbrance in the present case, I may here note, is of the nature of title acquired by adverse possession against the previous tenant. That that would be an incumbrance is not disputed. The case cited is not on all fours with the case now before me. In fact, it is the converse case to the present. There the purchaser was the defendant and he sought to defend a suit brought against him for possession by the incumbrancer by giving notice under section 167 after the institution of the suit. No doubt, the observations that the plaintiff must succeed on the title as it stood at the date of the institution of the suit are observations of general application and the principle need not be disputed. But there is a case in this Court which has direct bearing on the question now before me. In Second Appeal No. 1928 of 1899 [Gopinath Biswas v. Radha Shyam Poddar (2)] this very question appears to have been raised. There the notice under section 167 was served after the institution of the suit. The learned Judges in disposing of the question remarked with reference to the incumbrance: "The plaintiff was first made aware of it, when it was pleaded in the written statement. We think the plaintiff had a good cause of action and was entitled to recover the property from the defendants subject, however, to the conditions that the incumbrance would stand good if not annulled within one year of the plaintiff becoming aware of its existence. The plaintiff's right of action which was good and valid when the suit was brought could not be taken away by what was brought to his notice, for the first time, in the defendant's written statement. We are not now concerned to enquire whether the plaintiff has not taken any action to annul the incumbrance. We have only to see whether he had a right to be put in possession of the tenure at the time he brought his suit, and, as we have found that he was so entitled, we affirm the decree of the lower Court with this reservation that the incumbrance would stand good if not annulled within one year of the plaintiff's knowledge thereof." So that this case is not merely an authority for the proposition that a notice served subsequently to the institution of the suit would be sufficient for the purpose of the plaintiff, but it is further authority for the view which was taken by the Subordinate Judge, though he does not give his ground for taking the view, that the notice did not appear to be necessary. For the effect of that judgment is not only that a suit is not barred when the notice is not issued till after the institution of the suit but also that a suit for possession can be decreed subject to the reservation that the incumbrance is annulled by notice within the period of one year of the plaintiff's becoming aware of it. That being so, the first point, in my opinion, fails.

A further point is taken with reference to this notice and, that is, that it was not properly signed. It is argued that such a notice must be signed either by the purchaser himself or by a duly authorized agent. The Subordinate Judge has said that the notice was signed by the plaintiff's agent. The notice itself has been referred to by the learned Pleaders. It appears to have been signed by the Mukhtar of the plaintiff on behalf of the plaintiff that is, the signature is what is ordinarily known as a bakalam signature, which is equivalent to the signature of the person himself. But it is said, and this point was apparently given effect to by the first Court, that the Mukhtarnama did not give the Mukhtar authority to sign a notice under section 167. We do not know whether authority of any other kind was given, whether the plaintiff gave the Mukhtar verbal instructions to sign notices for her, or whether it was the fact that the Mukhtar signed because the plaintiff could not write. There may be various reasons for the notice going in the way it did. It seems to me that all these are matters which cannot be entered into at this stage. No issue was raised as to the validity of the notice in itself, as to whether it was a notice in proper form or whether it was properly served. The only issue in connection with section 167 was Issue No 4. That was: "Is the suit maintainable in its present form without annulling incumbrance under section 167 of the Bengal Tenancy Act?" That was the general issue framed because of the allegation that no notice had been given annulling the incumbrance. This issue was framed before the notice was given and, therefore, it is perfectly clear that any question raised by that issue could not possibly raise the question as to whether the notice in itself had the essentials of a valid notice. The other questions, such as the signature on the notice or the method of service, were never raised. No doubt, there were some remarks by the first Court and by the second Court which might have point if such an issue had been raised But I do not think that a Court of second appeal ought to proceed on the assumption that all evidence available was given on points which in fact had never been put in issue. That being so, no effect, in my opinion, should be given to the argument that the notice was not properly signed. A similar objection as to the method of service of the notice not being correct was hinted at, but the learned Pleader for the appellant frankly admitted that he could not press it now.

(2) 58 Ind. Cas. 671; 24 C. W. N. 657.

Then, I come to the second point taken, namely, that section 66, Civil Procedure Code, bars the suit. That section says that "no suit shall be maintained against any person claiming title under a purchase certified by the Court, on the ground that the purchase was made on behalf of the plaintiff. "In terms, that section does not apply to this case, because the suit is not brought against a person claiming title under a certified purchase. The plaintiff has been found to be the real purchaser. It is true that the objection might apply as regards defendant No. 10, but defendant No. 10 is not the appellant here, and that section would be no reason for holding that the suit is barred against defendants other than defendant No. 10.

I have already stated that the third ground mentioned has not been pressed. That brings me to the fourth point, that the appeal is barred by limitation. I must confess that I feel some difficulty in appreciating this argument. The purchase was in April 1912. The suit was brought in May 1917. So far as I understand the argument of the learned Pleader, it is this, that because his client was in possession in 1302 and may or may not have acquired title by adverse possession against the original tenant, therefore, he has acquired title by adverse possession against the present plaintiff. If that were a good ground it would be quite unnecessary to discuss section 107. The Court proceeded on the footing that the adverse possession against the original tenant was an incumbrance which could be annulled. The argument loses sight of the fact that the purchase was made in execution of a rent-decree and was not merely a purchase of the right, title and interest of the original tenant.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

There is a cross-objection which is not pressed and is dismissed.

The mere fact that the word "review" is used in such an application would not change the character of the application. [p. 749, col. 1.]

It is not necessary in every case to have the support of a section of the Civil Procedure Code to empower a Court to pass an order not expressly or impliedly forbidden and which is essential in the interests of justice. Civil revision from the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Multan, dated the 25th January 1919.

Mr. Ram Chand Manchanda, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Badar ud-Din Kureshi, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts in this case are that the plaintiffs' suit was dismissed on the 9th October 1918 by Lala Hari Chand, Senior Subordinate Judge, under Order IX, rule 8, Civil Procedure Code, owing to the absence of the plaintiff and his Pleader. The same day the Pleader applied for the restoration of the suit on the ground that his client was ill with high fever and that, at the moment, he had been in another Court. On the 22nd November this application was consigned to the Record-Room in default of the appearance of the plaintiff. On the 19th December 1918, the plaintiff made an application which he described as one for a review of the order of the 22nd November. This application was dismissed by M. Zafar Ali, Senior Subordinate Judge, on the ground that Lala Hari Chand had been transferred and had not issued notice prior to transfer and he had, therefore, no jurisdiction to entertain the review. For the petitioner it is contended that the wording of the application of the 19th December shows that the application was one asking for a restoration of the suit and not an application for a review. This is so. He also contends that no section, Order, or rule was quoted, or relied on, in the application and that his client should not suffer for an erroneous word used by a petition-writer. He contends that the application was one under Order IX, rule 9, read with sections 141 and 151 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that the lower Court had jurisdiction to entertain the application. He relies on Manakji v. Suramal (1), a decision of the Judicial Commissioner, Nagpur. That decision is on all fours with the facts of this case except that the application was not described, nor purported to be an application for review. I am inclined to agree with the conclusions arrived at in that case, namely, that section 141, Civil Procedure Code, would cover such a case. At the same time, I do not agree that the learned authors of Woodroffe's and Amir Ali's edition of the Civil Procedure Code are supporting a contrary proposition. Apparently, the learned authors have expressed no opinion and have merely stated that in certain rulings section 141 was held to apply to certain specific proceedings. That may well be.

I agree with the remarks well expressed in Hukum Chand Boid v. Kamalanand Singh (2). It is not necessary in every case to have the support of a section of the Civil Procedure Code to empower a Court to pass an order not expressly or impliedly forbidden and which is essential in the interests of justice. The provisions of the Civil Procedure Code are by no means exhaustive. In my opinion, justice should not be denied on some technical objection with regard to the introduction of the word "review" when, as a matter of fact, the application itself shows that it was an application for restoration of the suit.

For the above reasons, I accept this revision and set aside the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, dated the 25th January 1919, and direct him to hear the application on its merits as an application for the restoration of the suit.

On the 6th January 1916, plaintiff instituted the present suit against the District Board of Manbhum and the Municipality of Purulia claiming damages for personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence and breach of duty of one or both of the defendants. Plaintiff's case was that, on 5th August 1915, whilst driving along a road his trap struck against a heap of road gravel lying on the side of the road, and owing to the impact he was thrown to the ground and sustained a compound fracture of the right leg: he was treated locally for a few days and on 24th September was removed, under medical advice, to Calcutta for treatment where, on 7th October, his leg was amputated below the knee. The defendants set up pleas in bar by limitation; the District Board relying on section 146 of the Bengal Local Self-Government Act, and the Municipality on section 363 of the Bengal Municipal Act. The trial Court found that the acts complained of were within the two sections relied on; that the cause of action arose on the 5th August; that no fresh cause of action accrued on the 7th October when plaintiff's leg was amputated, and the suit having been instituted after the expiry of three months from the earlier date, it was barred by limitation. Plaintiff appealed contending that the act complained of was not anything done under the provisions of the two Acts mentioned, that the cause of action arose on 7th October when his leg was amputated and not on 5th August, and that, in any case, a fresh cause of action arose on 7th October; that section 146 of the Bengal Local Self-Government Act did not apply to a suit against the District Board as an incorporated body and was, therefore, no bar. The plaintiff conceded that an action against the Municipality was covered by section 363 of the Bengal Municipal Act:

Held, (1) that as the duty of the defendants in connection with the road arose out of the Statutes themselves, and as it was the omission to perform this duty which gave rise to the cause of action, the negligence relied on by the plaintiff came within the purview of the sections mentioned; [p. 752, col. 1.]

(2) that no fresh cause of action accrued to the plaintiff on the 7th October as the amputation of the limb was merely a development of the original injury the cause of action for which arose at the time the injury was sustained; [p. 753, col. 2.]

(3) that section 146 of the Local Self-Government Act provides the limitation for bringing a suit against the members of any District Board, and that upon a proper construction of the provisions of the Act, that section had no application to a suit against the District Board as a separate legal entity, and that, consequently, as against the District Board, the suit was not barred by limitation and the plaintiff was entitled to a decree. [p. 755, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Purulia, dated the 18th December 1916.

JUDGMENT.

DAWSON MILLER, C. J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Purulia dated the 18th December 1916, in a suit instituted against the District Board of Manbhum and the Commissioners of the Purulia Municipality claiming, damages for personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence and breach of duty of one or both of the defendants. According to the plaintiff's case, as alleged in the plaint, he was driving along the Indigo Factory road at Purulia, where he resided, taking a friend to the Railway Station at about 6 o'clock in the morning on the 5th August 1915. Whilst so doing, in order to avoid a collision with a tikka gharry, which was approaching from the opposite direction, he took his trap to the left side of the road with the result that the left wheel of the trap struck against a heap of road gravel which was lying on that side and owing to the impact the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and suffered a compund fracture of the right leg. After being treated at the local Hospital, where he was attended by the Civil Surgeon, he was taken to his own bungalow a few days later. At first the injury was not considered to be of a very serious nature, but, later on, complications, supervened and, on the 24th September, under medical advice, he was removed to Calcutta for further treatment, and on the 7th October following it became necessary to amputate his leg below the knee.

Being uncertain whether the District Board of Manbhum, which we are told was the rural authority, or the Municipality of Purulia, which is apparently the urban authority, was responsible for the upkeep and repair of the road where the accident happened he made them both defendants to the present suit, which was instituted on the 6th January 1916, and he claims one lakh of rupees as damages against the defendants or such of them as may be found liable. Each of the defendants appeared and filed a written statement setting up various pleas in defence. Each of them also sets up a plea in bar by limitation under the provisions of certain Acts of the Bengal Legislative Council requiring, as they contend, suits of this nature to be brought within 3 months of the date when the cause of action accrued. The Act relied on by the Manbhum District Board (defendant No. 1) is the Bengal Local Self Government Act of 1885, section 146 of which provides that, "No suit shall be brought against the members of any District Board, Local Board or Union Committee, or any of their officers, or any person acting under their direction, for anything done under this Act, until the expiration of one month next after notice in writing has been delivered or left at the office of such Board, or Committee and also (if the suit is intended to be brought against any officer of the said Board or Committee or any person acting under their direction) at the place of abode of the person against whom such suit is intended to be brought, stating the cause of action and the name and place of abode of the person who intends to bring the suit * * * * * * * *

* Every such action shall be commenced within three months next after the accrual of the cause of action and not afterwards".

The Act relied on by the Purulia Municipality is the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884, section 363 of which provides that, "No suit shall be brought against the Commissioners of any Municipality, or any of their officers, or any person acting under their direction, for anything done under this Act until the expiration of one month next after notice in writing has been delivered or left at the office of such Commissioners," and proceeds in exactly the same form as the Act of 1885 just quoted, the words "such Commissioners" taking the place of the words "such Board or Committee" in the other Act.

Several issues were framed in the suit, the fourth of which raised the question whether the claim was barred by limitation under the provisions of the section quoted. The case came on for trial before the Additional Subordinate Judge on the 18th December 1916, and, at the request of the defendants, the learned Judge proceeded to decide the question of limitation first, as, in the event of the plea being upheld, it would be unnecessary to decide the other issues in the case, he came to the conclusion that the acts complained of on the part of the defendants came within the purview of the two sections relied on. He further found that the cause of action arose on the 5th August when the accident had happened, and that no fresh cause of action accrued on the 7th October when it became necessary to amputate the plaintiff's leg, and that the suit not having been brought until after the expiry of three months from the earlier date it was barred by limitation.

From this decision the plaintiff has appealed. He contends, first, that the negligence or breach of duty of the defendants was not anything done under the provisions of the two Acts in question and that, this being a question of fact, ought to be determined before it can be held that the case comes within the operation of the sections. Secondly, he contended that the cause of action for the present suit in which he claimed damages for the loss of his leg arose not on the 5th August but on the 7th October when the leg was amputated, and that, in any case, if the cause of action arose on the earlier date giving him a right to claim for actual and contingent damage including the loss of his limb, nevertheless a fresh cause of action arose when that contingency in fact occurred. Thirdly, he contended, although this point was not raised in the Court below, that section 146 of the Local Self-Government Act, did not apply to a suit brought against the District Board as an incorporated body but to a suit brought against the members of any District Board in their personal capacity and was, therefore, no bar to the present suit.

For the purpose of deciding this preliminary question it must be assumed that the allegations in the plaint are accurate. With regard to the first point, the plaintiff contends that the negligence alleged against the defendants giving rise to his cause of action is not necessarily negligence arising in the performance of something done under the Acts in question, and that, before it can be held that the section applies it must be determined whether the acts complained of were in fact acts done under the powers conferred by the Statute. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the plaint in order to see how the plaintiff's case is framed. After stating the facts I have already referred to, he pleads in paragraph 12 of the plaint that, "The plaintiff has further been informed that the heap of road gravel had been negligently stacked there and allowed to remain there causing a considerable encroachment on the road itself and as it was not removed but allowed to remain for several months it became a compact mass hard enough to throw off the wheel that came in contact with it and the plaintiff was thus thrown off his trap and fell down on the road". Paragraph 13 reads,—"That the plaintiff believes that the defendants had no right to leave the gravel on the road causing thereby a considerable encroachment on the same and that it was their duty not to stack the said heap on the road and, at any rate, to remove the same after it was no longer required and if the same had been removed there would not have been any such accident and the plaintiff would not have met with the serious injury that has been caused to him". Paragraph 14 reads,—"That the plaintiff has not been able to ascertain which of the two defendants collected the heap on the road or was bound to remove the same so as to allow the entire width of the road to be used as such but he believes that one of the defendants, if not both, was bound to do the same and he is entitled to his damage from either of the defendants or both".

The first observation I wish to make upon this form of pleading is that it is not in accordance with the provisions of Order VI, rule 2 of the Civil Procedure Code relating to the manner in which the facts relied on shall be pleaded. That rule provides that, "Every pleading shall contain, and contain only, a statement in a concise form of the material facts on which the party pleading relies for his claim or defence, as the case may be, but not the evidence by which they are to be proved." The paragraphs in the plaint to which I have just referred are hardly statements of fact at all except in so far as the plaintiff's state of mind or belief is concerned which is not material in a pleading of matters of this sort and is, if anything, merely [evidence] I will assume, however, that what is stated as the plaintiff's information and belief is meant to be stated as an allegation of fact. Even then, however, it is nowhere alleged that the defendants or either of them stacked the gravel or caused it to be stacked on the road. In fact, the plaintiff alleges in paragraph 14 that he has not been able to ascertain which of them collected the heap on the road or was bound to remove it, but he believes that one of the defendants, if not both, were bound to do so and that he is entitled to damages. It is clear, therefore, that the negligence relied on in the plaint is the failure of the defendants to remove the obstruction which had been negligently placed there by some body unknown, and as it was the duty of one or both of them to remove it they have failed in this duty, which is the negligence complained of. Now, it is manifest that the only duty imposed upon the defendants in connection with the road is that arising out of the Statutes themselves and it is the omission to perform this duty which gives rise to the cause of action. The words used in the sections relied on by the defendants are "anything done under this Act", and where the words in a Statute used in connection with an offence or a civil wrong refer to acts done they must be held to extend also to illegal omissions (see section 4 (2) of the Bihar and Orissa General Clauses Act, 1917), and it is this omission which arises under the Statute, or not at all, which is complained of. In my opinion, it must be taken that the negligence relied on by the plaintiff comes within the purview of the sections mentioned.

The second question is, whether a fresh cause of action arose when the plaintiff's leg was amputated. I am unable to assent to the proposition that, where personal injuries are occasioned by a negligent act of the defendant a fresh cause of action arises whenever the damage suffered becomes aggravated. It is well settled that the plaintiff in such a case is entitled to compensation not only for damage actually visible at the time when the suit is instituted, or at the time of the trial but even for such consequential damage as may reasonably be expected to arise in the future from the wrongful act complained of. Had the plaintiff instituted the present suit and brought it to trial before the 7th October he would have been entitled to claim both for present and prospective damages arising from the injury and if, subsequently, it became necessary to amputate his leg a fresh suit for damages would not have been maintainable. This arises from the maxim nemo debet bis vexari, pro una et eadem causa and it follows that, if a fresh cause of action arose upon a subsequent loss of the injured limb, his further suit would not be barred. This was decided as long ago as the reign of William III [see Fetter v. Beal (1)] where it was decided that the plaintiff who had sued the defendant for assault and battery and recovered a sum of £11 could not afterwards bring a fresh suit on the ground that, subsequently, part of his skull had come out of his head by reason of the battery. It was contended on his behalf that the recovery in the former action was only for the bruise and battery but that here there was a mayhem by the loss of the skull giving a fresh cause of action, but this contention was rejected by the Court on the ground that the jury, in the former action, considered the nature of the wound and gave damages for all the damages that it had done to the plaintiff. In Hodsoll v. Stallebrass (2) Littledale, J., observed with respect to an action by a master for beating his servant per quod servitium amisit: "It is argued that a fresh action might be brought from time to time; but that is not so, the action being founded, not upon the damage only, but upon the unlawful act, and the damage. Without the special damage this action would not be maintainable at the plaintiff's suit. A fresh action could not be brought unless there were both a new unlawful act and fresh damage". In the present case, although there was aggravated damage and possibly fresh damage, there was no new unlawful act. If the plaintiff's contention be accepted it would logically follow that in many cases a new cause of action would arise every day after the injury was received. If a person were deprived of his arm, and were thereby prevented from following his occupation of a musician, he would each day suffer further loss by reason of his diminished earnings in that profession and he might not be able to follow any other. But it cannot be contended that a fresh cause of action arose each day. The plaintiff relied on the case of Darley Main Colliery Company v. Mitchall (3), where the House of Lords held that the lessees of coal under the plaintiff's land were liable for subsidence of the plaintiff's land caused by lack of support owing to the defendants working a mine, although the plaintiff had recovered damages for a previous subsidence some 12 years earlier, and the defendants had ceased working the mine since the earlier date. The second subsidence was not a further development of the first. It was in a different part of the plaintiff's land. Their Lordships held that, in such a case, the cause of action was not complete until the damage actually occurred, but Lord Halsbury in his speech was careful to point out, "No one will think of disputing the proposition that for one cause of action you must recover all damages incident to it by law once and for ever. A house that has received a shock may not at once shew all the damage done to it, but it is damaged nonetheless then to the extent that it is damaged, and the fact that the damage only manifests itself later on by stages does not alter the fact that the damage is there; and so of the more complex mechanism of the human frame, the damage is done in a railway accident, the whole machinery is injured though it may escape the eye or even the consciousness of the sufferer at the time; the later stages of suffering are but the manifestations of the original damage done, and consequent upon the injury originally sustained". Lord Bramwell, in the same case, observes: "It is a rule that when a thing directly wrongful in itself is done to a man, in itself a cause of action, he must, if he sues in respect of it, do so once and for all. As, if he is beaten or wounded, if he sues he must sue for all his damage, past, present and future, certain and contingent. He cannot maintain an action for a broken arm and subsequently for a broken rib though he did not know of it when he commenced his first action". In the case before their Lordships' House the cause of action was not complete until the damage was actually done, the lack of support was not in itself a matter which gave rise to a cause of action but it was this lack of support coupled with the injury sustained thereby. As Lord FitzGerald in his speech stated: "There was a complete cause of action in 1868 in respect of which compensation was given but there was a liability to further disturbance. The defendants permitted the state of things to continue without taking any steps to prevent the occurrence of any future injury. A fresh subsidence took place, causing a new and further disturbance of the plaintiff's enjoyment, which gave him a new and distinct cause of action". In cases, such as that of the Darley Main Colliery Company, the cause of action does not arise until actual damage ensues and it is for that damage only that the suit is maintainable, but in cases of personal injury a fresh cause of action does not arise by reason of the mere aggravation of the original injury and without any further wrong on the part of the defendant. If the plaintiff should suffer a fresh injury by a subsequent collision with the same heap of gravel, assuming the defendants to be liable at all, a fresh cause of action would arise but in the case before us the amputation of the limb was merely a development of the original injury the cause of action for which arose at the time when the injury was suffered.

The plaintiff contended that in the present case, as no previous suit had been brought, he could found his action upon the loss of his leg by amputation on the 7th October and that the maxim nemo debet bis vexari had no application. The maxim, however, is based upon the hypothesis that a fresh cause of action does not arise in such cases and this is in accordance with the decision in Carey v. Metropolitan Borough of Bermondsey (4). Reliance was placed by the plaintiff upon section 24 of the Limitation Act but, in my opinion, that section has no application to the circumstances of the present case. The question is, when did the cause of action arise, and that question I have already dealt with. The illustration to that section also seems clearly to shew the class of cases which the Legislature had in contemplation. Upon this part of the case, I think, the plaintiff's contention must fail.

The third point taken by he appellant was not urged in the Court below, but, as it depends upon the construction of the Statute it is open to the appellant to raise it here. It is admitted that it only applies in the case of the District Board of Manbhum as it is conceded that an action against the Municipality is covered by section 363 of the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884. In that Act, section 23 provides that " The Commissioners shall, in the name of their Chairman, by the description of 'The Chairman of the Municipal Commissioners of.....,' be a body corporate, and have perpetual succession and a common seal, and in such name shall sue and be sued," and the Act throughout in speaking of the body so incorporated refers to it as the Commissioners. In the Bengal Local Self-Government Act of 1885, however, the matter stands differently. By section 20 of that Act it is provided that " Every District Board shall be a body corporate by the name of 'the District Board of (name of district)' and shall have perpetual succession and a common seal, with power to acquire and hold property, both moveable and immoveable, and, subject to any rules made by the Lieutenant Governor under this Act, to transfer any such property held by it, and to contract and do all other things necessary for the purposes of this Act, and may sue and be sued in its corporate name." Throughout the Act, when referring to the body so incorporated, it speaks of it as the ' District Board" and not as the " members of the Board " and, when intending to refer to the members of the Board as individuals, it speaks of them as "members constituting the District Board," or in other terms apt to describe them. (See section 132A). Section 142 contemplates certain kinds of suits against individual members of a Union Committee, Local Board or District Board for loss, waste or misapplication of any money or other property belonging to the District Board, Local Board or Union Committee, and provides that such member shall not be liable unless the loss, waste or misapplication is a direct result of his negligence or misconduct while a member of one of these bodies. Section 146, which is the limitation section relied on by the defendants, the Manbhum District Board, provides that, "No suit shall be brought against the members of any District Board, Local Board or Union Committee or any of their officers or any person acting under their direction for anything done under this Act, etc., and that every such action shall be commenced within three months next after the accrual of the cause of action and not afterwards." It cannot be disputed that an action may be brought against some or all of the members of the District Board in their individual capacity and not as a body corporate and, in my opinion, it would be straining the language of the Act to interpret it as including a suit against the District Board which has a separate legal existence in the words "The members of any District Board". It was urged before us by the respondent that the wording of the section indicates that a suit against the District Board was clearly contemplated as the section speaks of a suit not only against "the members of the Board" but also against any of their officers or any person acting under their direction. It is argued that the officers and other persons there mentioned are the Officers of the Board or persons acting under the direction of the Board and not of the individual members of the Board and that, therefore, the words "members of any District Board" must be taken to refer to the Board itself. It is also contended that it would be a strange result if a suit against the individual members were barred by this section whilst the Board itself was left without the privilege of that immunity. Whatever force there may be in this argument, I think we are bound to construe the words of the section in their plain and natural meaning, and where the Act throughout speaks of "the District Board" when intending to refer to that corporation and refers to a member or members of the Board or other local authority when intending to indicate them personally, I think it would be a straining of the language of the section to hold that the words there used were intended to indicate not what they say, namely, the members of the District Board, but the District Board itself as a separate legal entity.

I think that this appeal, in so far as it is against the District Board of Manbhum, should be allowed with costs of the appeal, and to this extent the decree of the lower Court should be varied. I do not think we should vary the order as to costs in the Court below as this point was not there raised. In so far as the appeal was against the Commissioners of the Purulia Municipality, it is dismissed with costs to those respondents.

JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, J.—This is an appeal against an order dismissing an application for stay of proceedings under section 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act.

The facts as set suit in the judgment of the Court below are shortly as follows. On the 6th December 1917, a contract was entered into whereby the defendants, Joy Lall and Co., sold on behalf of Gopiram Bhotica the plaintiff, for their order and on their account to their principal certain goods which are set out in the document. The contract contains an arbitration clause providing that any dispute whatsoever arising on or out of the contract shall be referred to arbitration. Disputes arose with regard to the contract and thereupon the brokers, Joy Lall and Co., on the 18th November 1919, referred the matters in dispute to arbitration of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. Before any arbitration had taken place, on the 18th December 1918, the plaintiffs instituted the present suit, asking for a declaration that there was no contract and seeking to restrain the defendants from proceeding with the arbitration. A rule was issued for the grant of an interlocutory injunction, was heard in December 1918, and judgment was reserved, but it was not till the 4th June 1919 that Mr. Justice Chaudhuri restrained the defendants from proceeding with the arbitration. An appeal was presented by the defendants against this order of Mr. Justice Chaudhuri; that appeal was allowed on the 2nd December 1919,* and, as a result, the interlocutory injunction was dissolved. Thereupon, the present application was made on the 4th December 1919 for stay of proceedings under section 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act. Mr. Justice Greaves has held that the application must be refused on the ground that the applicants had taken steps in the proceedings within the meaning of that section. In our opinion this view cannot be supported.

Section 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act is in these terms:—"Where any party to a submission to which this Act applies, or any person claiming under him, commences any legal proceedings against any other party to the submission, or any person claiming under him, in respect of any matter agreed to be referred, any party to such legal proceedings may, at any time after appearance and before filing a written statement or taking any other steps in the proceedings, apply to the Court to stay the proceedings and the Court, if satisfied that there is no sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred in accordance with the submission and that the applicant was, at the time when the proceedings were commenced, and still remains, ready and willing to do all things necessary to the proper conduct of the arbitration, may make an order staying the proceedings."

A preliminary objection has been taken that the order made by Mr. Justice Greaves refusing to stay proceedings under this section, is not a judgment within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent and is not appealable. In support of this argument, reliance has been placed upon a decision of this Court in The Justices of the Peace for Calcutta v. Oriental Gas Company (1) It is not disputed that the case is not precisely in point: there the appeal was preferred against an order issuing a mandamus and it was held by the Court of Appeal that the order was not a 'judgment' inasmuch as it did not determine the merits of any question between the parties. Sir Richard Couch, C. J., defined the term 'judgment' as used in clause 15 to mean a decision which affects the merits of the question between the parties by determining some right or liability. He then proceeded to point out that there may be an obvious difference between an order for the admission of a plaint and an order for its rejection. The former determines nothing, but is merely the first step towards putting the case in a shape for determination: the latter determines finally, so far as the Court which makes the order is concerned, that the suit, as brought, will not lie. The decision, therefore, is a judgment in the proper sense of the term. This definition is further exemplified in the judgment of Sir Richard Couch in the case of Hadjee Ismail Hadjee Hubbeeb v. Hadjee Mahomed Hadjee Joosub (2) where he held that an order determining that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain his suit on the Original Side of this Court was a 'judgment' within the meaning of the Letters Patent. He observed that the decision was of great importance to the parties: it was not a mere formal order or an order merely regulating the procedure in the suit, but one that had the effect of giving a jurisdiction to the Court which it otherwise would not have and it might fairly be said to determine some right between them, viz, the right to sue in a particular Court, and to compel the defendants, who were not within its local jurisdiction, to come in and defend the suit, or if they did not, to make them liable to have a decree passed against them in their absence. The test formulated by Sir Richard Couch has been repeatedly applied by this Court in principle in later cases: Mathura v. Haran Chandra Shah (3) and Budhu Lal v. Ohattu Gope (4). In the case before us, section 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act entitles the applicant to apply under that section to the Court to stay legal proceedidgs. Mr. Justice Greaves has held, by his order, that the applicant was not, in the circumstances of this case, competent to avail himself of the benefit of that section by reason of steps taken by him in the proceedings in the suit. This decision virtually determines that the controversy between the parties must be decided by this Court and not by arbitration. In our opinion, this determination is a 'judgment' within the meaning of the Letters Patent, and as such is appealable under clause 15.

The question next arises, whether the view taken by Mr. Justice Greaves can be supported on the merits. Mr. Bose has expressed his inability to support the order on the ground mentioned in the judgment. The learned Judge has held, in the first place, that the appeal against the order of Mr. Justice Chaudhuri did not constitute taking a step in the proceedings within the meaning of section 19. This view is clearly right. Section 19 contemplates the institution of a suit, notwithstanding an agreement to refer to arbitration, and authorises the defendant in such suit to apply for stay before he has filed his written statement or taken any other step in the suit. It is difficult to appreciate how this can stand in the way of the defendant in the circumstances of the present case. If a contrary view were taken, the result would follow that the defendant would be deprived of his right to appeal against the adverse order made in the proceedings instituted by the respondent himself. The learned Judge, however, has held, in the second place, and in support of his view has referred to the decision in Adams v. Catley (5), that certain grounds taken in the memorandum of appeal presented by the defendants to this Court, when they appealed against the order of Mr. Justice Chaudhuri, constituted the taking of a step in the proceedings within the meaning of section 19. Those grounds have been placed before us and Mr. Bose has frankly conceded that he cannot explain how the grounds can be treated as "taking a step," which, to operate as a bar, must, as pointed out already, be taken in the suit. The decision mentioned by the learned Judge clearly does not support his view. In that case, a party to a submission against whom legal proceedings had been commenced by another party to the submission applied to the Court for stay of proceedings until security for costs was given, and it was held that he had taken steps in the proceedings so as to disentitle him to apply under section 4 of the Arbitration Act of 1889 to have the proceedings in the action stayed. There the defendant had applied to the Court to stay the proceedings until security for costs was given, and this implied that if such security was given, the action might proceed. Mr. Justice Mathew said that the defendant had done two things which were objected to as being "steps in the proceedings" so as to disentitle him to apply under section 4 of the Arbitration Act. The first was that he had applied for and obtained a statement of claim. It was saidb that this was really a part of the appearance as indicated in Ives & Barker v. Williams (6). However that might be, it was quite clear that the other thing which he had done, viz, applied for a stay until security for costs had been given was a step in the proceedings within the section. By asking for security, the defendant had shown his willingness to proceed in the action if that security were given and showed also that he was not complying with the condition in the section that he should be ready and willing to go to arbitration, clearly those reasons have no application to the circumstances of this case.

I see no escape from the conclusion that the order made by Mr. Justice Greaves cannot be supported, and that this appeal must be allowed with costs in both Courts, with the result that application under section 19 is granted.

JAI KISHEN DAS v. ARYA PRITI NIDHI SABHA.

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Lahore, dated the 19th April 1915.

Messrs. Manohar Lal, B. N. Kapur and Balwant Rai, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Oertel and Azimullah, for Fazl Ilahi, Messrs. Durga Das and Dharm Chand, for the Arya Priti Nidhi Sabha, Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an action brought by the plaintiffs, who are appellants before us, for possession of 4 kanals and 4 marlas of land against defendants Nos. 1 and 2, and, in the event of the plaintiffs' failure to recover possession, for damages against the remaining defendants. The Subordinate Judge has dismissed the suit in toto, and on this appeal preferred by the plaintiffs the main question on the merits is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to damages, as the finding of the Subordinate Judge in favour of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 has not been seriously contested in this Court.

The facts bearing upon the dispute between the parties are briefly as follows:—On the 16th September 1907 Chiragh Din and his son, Muhammad Bakhsh, the predecessors of defendants Nos. 3 to 8, sold to the plaintiffs 79 kanals and 4 marlas of land situate at Naulakha, near the Railway Station, Lahore. The property sold comprised several plots of land contiguous to one another which formed part of different khasra numbers specified in the sale-deed. The price paid by the vendees to the vendors was Rs. 83,160, and was calculated, as expressly stated in the deed, at the rate of Rs. 1,050 per kanal. It is alleged in the plaint that the vendors put the plaintiffs in possession of the entire area sold to them, and that it was on a subsequent date that the plaintiffs were evicted from 4 kanals and 4 marlas by defendants Nos. 1 and 2 claiming to be the owners thereof on the ground of their prior title. The plaintiffs further asserted in paragraph 3 of the plaint, and this assertion was expressly admitted in the written statement on behalf of the vendors' successors-in-interest who contested the suit, that the vendors had assured the vendees "that they were the sole owners of the land sold and that there was no defect in their title." The defendants, however, pleaded that the plaintiffs were, at the time of the suit, in possession of the entire property sold to them; and that, at any rate, the measure of damages should be the price paid by the vendees for the area in question.

Before dealing with the merits of the case, we must refer to a preliminary objection raised by Mr. Oertel on behalf of the respondents that the appeal has abated and should fail on that ground. It appears that of the six defendants who were sued as the representatives of the deceased vendors, four died during the pendency of the appeal, and that no application to implead their legal representatives has been made by the appellants. They, however, contend that these persons were not necessary parties to the litigation, and that there was, therefore, no need to implead their legal representatives. It is common ground that these four persons were the two widows and two daughters of the deceased Muhammad Bakhsh, and the plaint shows that they were impleaded as defendants simply because it was said that they stated themselves to be the deceased's heirs. We find that three of them, though duly served, did not appear in the trial Court at any stage of the case, and the proceedings were consequently ex parte against them, and that the fourth person was the mother of Fazal Ilahi (defendant No. 2) who, as the son of Muhammad Bakhsh, claimed to be the sole heir of the vendors and repudiated the assertion as to defendants Nos. 3 to 7 being their heirs. It is to be observed that this lady, on whose behalf there was an appearance in the trial Court, identified herself with the defence put forward by Fazal Ilahi, and that both of them were defended by the same Pleader. Considering that the plaintiffs impleaded all the relatives of the vendors ex majori cautela without making any definite assertion that all of them were entitled to be regarded as their heirs; that Fazal Ilahi, the only male member of the family, claimed to be the sole heir; that this claim was endorsed by one of the four persons who died during the pendency of the appeal and was not demurred to by the remaining three, and that Fazal Ilahi has since succeeded in establishing in a Court of Justice his right to succeed to the estate left by the deceased to the exclusion of the female members of the family (though we are told that an appeal is pending against that judgment), we hold that, so far as the present litigation is concerned, the deceased persons were not necessary parties, and that the appeal can proceed without impleading their representatives.

It is to be observed that the representatives of the vendors were, qua the claim for damages, joint debtors of the plaintiffs, and the latter could, according to the law declared by section 43 of the Contract Act, have sued any one or more of them to recover the whole of the damages. It is, however, urged that the option given by the aforesaid section should be exercised before the institution of the suit, and that it is now too late for the plaintiffs to elect the debtor or debtors from whom they should recover the money. It is true that the judgment in Rao Ghulam Muhammad Khan v. Nahar Ali (1) supports this contention, but the learned Judges, who decided that case, did not consider the question whether the right to sue survived against the surviving defendant or defendants alone within the meaning of Order XXII, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue the subject any further, because, on the special facts set out above, we consider that Fazal Ilahi alone should be treated for the purpose of this litigation as the representative of the vendors.

Coming now to the merits, we find that one Mirza Asad Beg was the original proprietor of a large estate comprising the land in dispute, and that he proceeded to sell his property in parcels. It appears that in 1905 the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 purchased from him a certain area, and similarly Chiragh Din and Muhammad Bakhsh purchased another plot of land out of that estate a portion of which was sold by them to the plaintiffs in 1907. It is claimed on behalf of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 that the land in dispute formed part of the property sold to them by Mirza Asad Beg, and this claim has not been resisted before us. It may be that the boundaries of the estate purchased by the aforesaid defendants were not clearly demarcated, the result being that the plot in dispute was treated as part of the land sold to the plaintiffs. It appears that the latter took possession thereof soon after the sale in their favour. When they, however, proceeded to parcel out their estate into small plots for building purposes and to sell them to different persons, the said defendants, discovering that the land in dispute belonged to them, successfully asserted their right and recovered possession of the land.

Mr. Manohar Lal for the plaintiffs has not been able to show that his clients are entitled to the land in dispute as against defendants Nos. 1 and 2. Indeed, the learned Counsel has made no real attempt to impeach the finding of the Subordinate Judge on the subject, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to discuss the matter any further. Suffice it to say that the plaintiffs have not established their title to the land, and cannot, consequently, recover possession from defendants Nos. 1 and 2.

As regards damages, the Subordinate Judge finds that in field No. 951 the plaintiffs hold 5 kanals and 1 marla short of the area specified in the sale-deed, but that in field No. 955 they possess 18 marlas in excess of what they are entitled to under the conveyance. According to this finding, which is supported by evidence, the plaintiffs would require 4 kanals and 3 marlas in order to make up the entire area sold to them; but Mr. Oertel contends that just as they have some area in excess in field No. 955, so they possess a larger area in other fields than that awarded to them by the sale-deed; and that this excess would be sufficient to compensate them for the above deficiency. This contention was not put forward in the trial Court, but it is clear that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any damages, if they have received, irrespective of the plot in dispute, 79 kanals and 4 marlas, the area sold to them. The matter can easily be settled by measurements to be made on the spot.

The terms of the conveyance make it absolutely clear that the vendors sold 79 kanals and 4 marlas to the plaintiffs, and calculated the price at the rate of Rs. 1,050 per kanal. It therefore, follows that if the vendees got less than that area, it is the duty of the vendors either to make good the deficiency, or to pay damages for the loss thus caused to the vendees. It appears that field No. 951 was wrongly shown in the revenue record as having a larger area than it really contained, and the learned Subordinate Judge holds that the result of this wrong measurement is "that out of 41 kanals plaintiffs are only 4 kanals short, whereas defendants Nos. 1 and 2 are 3 kanals short in 20 kanals, and defendants Nos. 3 to 8 are 15 marlas short in 5 kanals." The learned Judge, therefore, finding that the plaintiffs have suffered least of all by reason of the deficiency in the area of field No. 951, has disallowed their claim for damages.

We are unable to concur in this conclusion. As stated above, the vendors expressly sold a certain area and realised as price, not a round sum, but a sum arrived at after calculating the price at Rs. 1,050 per kanal. It is obviously their duty to deliver that area free from any defect in title. It is no answer to the vendees' claim that the vendors got from their transferor less than what they bargained for. If they have suffered, they can adopt such remedy against their transferor as is open to them: but the plea ad misericordiam cannot furnish a valid defence to the plaintiffs' claim. It is to be observed that, after making the sale in favour of the plaintiffs, the vendors still kept some land with them and it cannot, therefore, be said that they were not in a position to deliver to the vendees the entire area mentioned in the deed.

In view of the terms of the deed, the admission as to the guarantee of title contained in the written statement, and the law on the subject declared by section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act, we must hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for any deficiency in the area sold to them. Following the rule laid down in section 73 of the Indian Contract Act, which does not exclude from its operation the case of damages for the breach of a contract relating to immoveable property, we are of opinion that the measure of damages is the price of the land at the time of eviction. This is the rule laid down in Nagardas Soubhagyadas v. Ahmedkhan (2) and has since been affirmed in Ranchhod Bhawan v. Manmohandas Ramji (3) and Nabin Chandra Saha v. Krishna Baroni Dassee (4).

Upon the record as it stands we are unable to determine the date on which the eviction took place, nor is there any evidence to show what the price of the property was on that date. The learned Subordinate Judge having dismissed the claim as to damages on a preliminary point has not recorded any finding on issue No. 5 which dealt with the amount of damages. We are, therefore, constrained to remand the case for determination of the amount of damages, if any, sustained by the plaintiffs.

Accordingly, while dismissing the appeal against defendants Nos. 1 and 2 with costs we set aside the decree dismissing the claim for damages, and remit the case for redecision with reference to the foregoing remarks. The costs as between the plaintiffs and the defendants other than defendants Nos. 1 and 2 shall abide the event.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s. 177—Appeal—Proprietary title, meaning of.

Under section 177 of the Agra Tenancy Act an appeal lies to a District Judge from the decision of a Revenue Court in a suit in which the question of proprietary title has been in issue in the Court of first instance and is a matter in issue in the appeal The words "proprietary title," however, refer not to a disputed title to a tenure or a tenant's right but only to the Zemindari, consequently, an order of ejectment in a suit by a usufructuary mortgagee of a fixed rate tenure in which the defendant pleads that he is not the plaintiff's sub-tenant, is not appealable to the District Judge as there is no question of proprietary title involved in the suit. [p. 761, col. 1.]

KUNJI LAL MONOHAR DAS v. DURGA PRASAD.

Second appeal against the decision of the District Judge, Ghazipur, dated the 5th December 1917.

Mr. M. L. Agarwala, for the Appellant.

Mr. Lakshmi Narayan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are simple. The plaintiff-appellant before me is the father of the defendant respondent. The property in dispute between them is a part of a fixed rate tenancy. The father brought a suit in the Revenue Court for the ejectment of the son on grounds specified in section 50 of the Tenancy Act. The son in reply pleaded that he and his father constituted a joint Hindu family, and that that family was the owner of the rights in the land and that he was not his father's sub-tenant. I may note here that the father is the usufructuary mortgagee of the fixed rate tenure and not the original owner. The Court of first instance, that is, of the Assistant Collector, decided in favour of the plaintiff and decreed the ejectment. The defendant filed an appeal in the Court of the District Judge. The District Judge allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit. The plaintiff has come here in second appeal. The first point taken before me is that the lower Appellate Court had no jurisdiction as no appeal laid to it from the decision of the Assistant Collector. It appears that this plea was not taken in the Court below as it might well have been taken. Under section 177 of the Tenancy Act, an appeal lies to the District Judge from suits in group (e) of the Schedule attached to the Act in which the question of proprietary title has been in issue in the Court of first instance and is a matter in issue in the appeal. It has been ruled clearly, in a case very similar to the present one, by a Bench of this Court that the words "proprietary title" do not refer to a disputed title to a tenure or a tenant's right but they include only titles to the Zamindari and not titles to tenant's right. The decision is to be found in Niranjan v. Gajadhar (1). The decision of a single Judge of this Court was considered in that case and was overruled. In that case also there was a dispute as to a fixed rate tenancy and the dispute was as to the title to the tenure just as it is in the present case. It is, therefore, clear that no appeal laid to the Court below. I must, therefore, allow the appeal. I set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and direct that the memorandum of appeal be returned to the defendant respondent, who was the appellant in that Court, so that he may be able to present it to the proper Court. The plea of jurisdiction was not taken in the Court below and, in these circumstances, I direct that the parties bear their own costs both of this Court and of the lower Appellate Court.

Order set aside.

The parties, with full knowledge of the restrictions imposed by Government as regards the affreightment of goods by rail, and that it was impossible without a priority certificate to get goods sent by rail, entered into a contract for the purchase and forward delivery of linseed, assuming that, by the time of the performance of the agreement, the normal state of affairs would have returned. When, however, the time for performance of the contract arrived, the restrictions had not been removed and it was impossible for the seller to make delivery. In these circumstances, a case was stated for the opinion of the Court upon the rights of the buyer and seller under the contract:

Held, that, in the circumstances, the contract had become void before breach, and the seller was excused from the performance thereof, and that, consequently, the buyer was not entitled to recover any compensation from the seller. [p. 765, col. 1.]

Messrs. B. L. Mitter, and K. P. Khaitan, for the Plaintiff.

Messrs. S. K. Banerjee, for the Defendant.

KUNJI LAL MANOHAR DAS v. DURGA PRASAD.

JUDGMENT.—This is a special case for the opinion of the Court upon the rights of buyers and sellers under a contract that was made on the 5th November last year. That was a contract for the sale of 50 tons new crop up-country small grain linseed and by the terms of the contract it is perfectly clear, that the method by which the contract was to be carried out was, by having the goods put on rail at the up-country station and transmitted in that manner to the Kidderpore Docks. It appears that the harvesting of this linseed begins in the month of March and that the despatch of it would, in ordinary circumstances, be commenced in the month of April. Now, at the time the contract was made, the position as regards the affreightment of such goods by rail was that all the railway wagons for the purpose were under the control of Government and that, without a certificate from the proper officer of Government, it was impossible to get the goods sent by rail and it was well known to the parties at the time when they entered into the contract that that was the position. As regards getting the certificate from the proper officer of the Goverment at the time this contract was made, I collect that it was known to the parties that such a certificate was, at that time, not being granted for the purpose of ordinary commercial contracts such as this. Now, under these circumstances, the question arises whether the contract has become void by reason of the impossibility or illegality of its performance, and, it is to be observed, that, although at the time the contract was made it would have been impossible to do what the contract contemplated, nevertheless, the contract was a forward contract to be performed in the future, and the finding of fact upon the special case before me is that, when the contract was entered into, it was assumed that the Armistice having been arranged in Europe, Government would, by the time linseed deliverable under the said contract would have to be despatched, give up the control, that all the restrictions would be removed and the Railway Company would accept linseed for despatch from up-country to the Kidderpore Docks. It is not clear whether the control by Government was under statutory authority or how otherwise, but it must, I think, be taken by me as in the nature of an act of State which gives rise to a duty upon the subject as well as an act which rendered the performance of the contract impossible. The statement in the special case, "that it was assumed that Government would give up the control" is taken by me as intending to say that it was a pre-supposition of both parties to the contract, a common postulate between the buyer and seller at the time the contract was made. Now, under these circumstances, the question presented by this contract is somewhat interesting and I think novel. There can be no doubt that the rules applicable to an obligation created by a contract are distinct from those applicable to an obligation which the law itself imposes upon the subject. So far as obligations imposed by the law are concerned, the act of God, for example, is regarded as a complete answer. The law does not itself impose an obligation which is to be carried into effect when an impossibility comes in, but so far as obligations created by a contract are concerned, the rule is very different. Prima facie, when the party has not qualified his obligation, he must be taken to have weighed and accepted the risk of his not being able to carry out the contract. This is quite clear as regards impossibility of performance which is relative to the ability or circumstances of the party himself. It is also a general rule as regards an impossibility which is absolute, such as an impossibility created by a breakdown on a railway system, but while this is the general rule, it is a rule which is not of universal application, for example, from the nature of the contract itself, the qualification may be clearly implied. A contract of marriage, a contract of partnership, a contract of service are all contracts with regard to which it is clear that, if one of the parties dies, or becomes so ill as to be unable to perform his part of the contract, the contract is at an end and there is no claim for damages for breach of contract. Another class of exception is to be seen in cases of bailment or of the lending of particular chattel. Such cases have been reviewed in the leading case of Taylor v. Caldwell (1) and the principle which was there laid down by Mr. Justice Blackburn in this manner :—"This rule is only applicable when a contract is positive and absolute and not subject to any conditions either express or implied, and there are authorities, which, as we think, establish the principle that, where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled, unless, when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrives, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing of existence as the foundation of what was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract, is not to be construed as a positive contract but as subject to an implied condition that the party shall be excused, in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without the default of the contractor." The well-known series of cases known as The Coronation Cases show that where contracts have been made upon the footing that a particular event is going to take place, the principles of Taylor v. Caldwell (1), will apply. The contract will be impliedly conditional upon that event or state of things being present at the time when performance is due. The principle of Taylor v. Caldwell (1) is not merely a principle to be found in that branch of law which concerns particular things "de certo corpore" but is a general principle applicable to contracts where parties contract upon a common postulate: the contract will be impliedly conditional upon that common assumption holding good and will not be enforced by the Court so as to throw upon one of the parties a risk which neither of the parties intended that he should bear. Now, the present case is, I think, an inverted example of a case within that principle. It is not the case of people assuming a continuance of a state of circumstances at the time the contract was made. It is quite clear that, if the circumstances had continued as the same, the contract would have been futile and commercially insensible. The parties were contracting not on the continuance but on a change in the circumstances, and the question is whether it is right to apply the principle of an implied condition to that state of affairs. It is to be observed that this is a forward contract and, as I read the statement of facts by which I am bound in the special case, the assumption of both parties at the time in spite of the existing state of affairs was that the normal state of affairs would have returned by the time of the performance of the agreement. It is not generally easy to suppose that there can be any assumption with regard to a change of circumstances but when a state of things that exists is abnormal and temporary and looks as if it was coming to an end there is no impossibility in the change of circumstances being regarded by both parties as being absolutely certain and being, as this case states, the assumption upon which the contract was made. If this were a matter which was being decided as regards the facts before me, it is evident that the fact that it was regarded as certain that the normal state of circumstances would be resumed, would be a double edged consideration. If there was so little risk, it may well be that the seller was content to take it; but I have not got to consider this case from the point of view of the correct inferences to be drawn upon contested facts. I have got to consider this case upon the facts as given to me. When I find it stated that this was the common assumption of both parties, I take that to mean that if I throw the risk upon either one of these parties, it would be throwing upon him something which the other party himself did not intend that he should bear.

Now, with regard to this matter of an implied condition; the nearest case has been cited to me and that is Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders and John Batt & Co., In re (2). That was a contract for the shipment of aluminium to Vladivostock, and, so far as I am concerned with that case, it was regarded as a contract for shipment from England. The contract was made in August 1915 and the shipment was to be in December; that is to say, there was no question of the war coming to an end or of the parties being sure that in a few months' time the normal state of things would have been resumed. The contract was made with no express condition as to the performance of it and the question was whether, as it was impossible to ship alnmininm from England owing to Ordinances which had been made in connection with the war, the seller's obligation was to be regarded as absolute or not. That case was decided upon the principles of law which were laid down in "The Moorcock" (3), that, if an implied condition is absolutely necessary to give that effect to the transaction which the parties must have intended at all events, this condition is to be implied. The principle is both positive and negative. Where it is necessary for that purpose, an implication will be made; and no further implication will be made than is necessary to give such efficacy to the transaction as must have been intended at all events. Applying those two principles of that case, the conclusion of the Court of Appeal was that the contract really was that the seller would use his best endeavours, would do everything reasonable to obtain permission to effect shipment, and that if he did that, and did not succeed, he was not liable for damages. Now, in this case the only difference of fact is that the parties were not contemplating the getting of priority certificates under existing conditions. They were contemplating such a change of circumstances as would make this unnecessary. But the principle seems to be the same. In order to give business efficacy to this contract and to give it the minimum that the parties must have intended, I think the parties are to be regarded as contracting upon the footing of a common assumption, contracting without the intention that either of them should bear the risk which, in the events that have happened, has ultimately come about. It may be said that, in order to give business efficacy to the transaction, it is not necessary upon these facts to imply a condition. This has often been argued in such cases for the reason that, although the seller cannot deliver the goods, he can always do one or other of two things. He can always either deliver the goods or pay damages. That argument seems to me to be fallacious. When you are considering the intention of the parties when they were making this contract, I think it is of importance to remember that the intention of the parties is that the contract shall be fulfilled. Contracts are not based upon the assumption of a breach being made. Commercial men know that contracts are often broken but the intention of the parties is not that a contract shall be broken and damages shall be paid. The intention of the parties is that it shall be carried into effect. I do not put this forward as a first principle. In the well-known case of Sanders v. Maclean (4) certain observations of Lord Justice Bowen may be taken by way of contrast. The learned Judge there says that, "the contract of merchants, it is never superfluous to remark, is not based upon the supposition of possible frauds. The object of mercantile gentlemen is to prevent the risk of insolvency, not of fraud, and any one who attempts to explain fully the law of merchants will soon find himself lost, if he begins by assuming that merchants conduct their business on the basis of attempting to insure themselves against fraudulent dealings; on the contrary, credit, not distrust, is the basis of commercial dealings." This is not true of the possibility of breach of contract. The contract of merchants is based upon the possibility of breach of contract, upon the possibility of damages having to be paid particularly in the case of goods for which there is in the full sense of the word a "market". The principle which I have been alluding to is not a principle which is in the least analogous to that of Lord Justice Bowen. The principle simply is this, that when you are having regard to the intention of parties at the time of entering into the contract, the lawyer is apt to make a mistake if he assumes that the intention of the contracting parties is to bring about a state of circumstances such that the legal remedy of damages will require to be resorted to, lawyers assuming that it will pervert the intention of commercial men in cases of this sort. That being so, and applying the principle that this contract was not a contract made indifferently for the sale of goods or for the payment of damages, but a contract for the delivery of goods, it seems to me that performance is impossible, that the contract having been made upon the assumption that the normal state of things would have come into existence by March or April of this year, the intention of the contract would be perverted, if I was to hold that the sellers are to insure the buyers against this chance of the control of Government going on. For these reasons, I answer the questions which have been put to me in this way:—

First:—Did, in the circumstances hereinbefore mentioned, such a contract become void and were the sellers excused from the performance thereof? My answer is, yes, the contract became void before breach.

Secondly:—Are the buyers entitled to recover any compensation from the sellers? I answer that, no, either in respect of goods which were lying ready at the up-country station which the Railway Company refused to accept for despatch or in respect of goods which were not so delivered. I answer "no" to both parts of the second question because the performance having become impossible, no tender could have had any effect upon the Railway Company.

It is important in this case to add that this decision proceeds entirely upon the facts as given to me by agreement, not only the facts as regards the contract and the position of Railway traffic but also the facts stated as regards the assumptions and intentions of the parties. When the latter class of facts is not the same, it is very probable that different considerations altogether will prevail.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 426 OF 1917.

KHARIDAR KAPRA COMPANY (LIMITED—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT versus DAYA KISHEN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Partnership—Hindu Law—Joint family—Managing member entering into partnership—Liability of other members.

Where the managing member of a Hindu joint family enters into a partnership but does not enter into any transactions in a representative capacity, or hold himself out to be the head of a joint family, the other members of the family cannot be treated as partners in the partnership so as to make the family property liable on the death of the managing member. [p. 768, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Cawnpore.

Mr. B. E. O'Conor, The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Kailas Nath Katju, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Surendro Nath Sen, Pearey Lal Banerji and Radha Kant Malaviya, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This suit was brought by the Kharidar Kapra Company, a limited liability company registered under the Indian Companies Act, carrying on business at Cawnpore as importers of, and dealers in, cloth. They sued through their managing director Raghunandan Lal. Their cause of action was stated to arise out of the following facts. There had been in Cawnpore one Girdhari Lal, a broker, and also a dealer in cloth on his own account. This Girdhari Lal undoubtedly had for a number of years relations of various kinds with the plaintiff company. He earned brokerage from them in connection with their dealings and we see no reason to doubt that, at times at any rate, he entered into special contracts with them, as, for instance, by offering to bear some specified share in the expenses of a particular deal in cloth and to share in the resultant profit or loss in the same proportion. These, of course, were contracts of partnership pure and simple. In other cases, apparently, Girdhari Lal would take a specified number of bales of cloth on his own account out of some large consignment ordered by the company and would leave the cloth of which he thus became the owner in the hands of the company, subject to a general adjustment of accounts between them after the cloth had been sold. This Girdhari Lal died on the 19th of August 1913 and the suit, out of which this appeal arises, was instituted on the 3rd of January 1917. There were five defendants impleaded: one was the widow of Girdhari Lal and another was the widow of his predeceased brother Banwari Lal. The second and third defendants are minors, being the sons of the aforesaid Banwari Lal, and, therefore, nephews of Girdhari Lal, although it has been alleged that one of them had been adopted by

Girdhari Lal as his own son; this point, however, is immaterial. The first and principal defendant was one Daya Kishen whose father, Mangat Rai, was the own brother of Sham Lal, father of Girdhari Lal. It was alleged in the plaint that the ledger account which the company kept up from year to year showing all their dealings with Girdhari Lal was continued after his death. There were sales of cloth to Girdhari Lal's credit and he was charged with the price of cloth purchased on his account, in accordance with the alleged agreement that this charge should only be brought into the account after the cloth had been disposed of. Further, it was alleged that the profit and loss account of a large number of transactions in which Girdhari Lal had been a partner with the plaintiff-company was finally made up, some years after Girdhari Lal's death, in the month of July 1916. In fact, it was alleged that accounts had been made up twice, once about February 1915 and the second time in July 1916. The plaintiff-company alleged that all the persons impleaded as defendants were members of a joint undivided Hindu family with Girdhari Lal, deceased; that Girdhari Lal acted as the head and manager of that joint family; that the business relations of the company, whatever they amounted to in law, were with the joint family as such, and, therefore, continued uninterrupted after the death of Girdhari Lal. It was further alleged that Daya Kishen himself in substance accepted this position, that he carried on, after the death of Girdhari Lal, various branches of business which his cousin had hitherto been conducting and, in particular, dealt with the plaintiff-company as representative of the joint family in succession to Girdhari Lal. It was alleged that both the settlements of account previously referred to were made with Daya Kishen and that the accounts were checked and passed by him. It was further alleged that brokerage due from the plaintiff-company to Daya Kishen had been credited in the ledger account kept up in the name of Girdhari Lal, with Daya Kishen's full consent. Finally, it was alleged that on the 22nd of September 1916 Daya Kishen had paid in cash to the plaintiff-company a sum of Rs. 5,000 on the understanding that this payment was made in reduction of the balance due to the company shown in the ledger account against Girdhari Lal. After allowing credit for this item, the company claimed a sum of Rs. 2,735 9 6 with interest. There were instituted, at or about the same time two other suits, in one of which Daya Kishen claimed from the plaintiff company the return of the Rs. 5,000 paid by him on the 22nd of September 1916, upon allegations of fact which we shall consider in their proper place. There was also another suit brought by Daya Kishen in the Munsif's Court claiming the brokerage due to him from the Kharidar Kapra Company. This last suit was transferred to the Court of the Subordinate Judge and the three suits were tried more or less together and disposed of in a single judgment. We have three appeals before us which have been argued out together, against the decrees passed by the Subordinate Judge in the three suits. It will, however, in our opinion, be more convenient to deal with the three appeals separately. This judgment relates to the suit brought by the Kharidar Kapra Company as plaintiff against the defendants who are alleged to be the surviving members of the joint family of which Girdhari Lal was at one time the head. The learned Subordinate Judge has found upon all issues of fact and law against the plaintiff-company. He has gone so far as to hold that, on the evidence, it is not proved that any debt is due, or ever was due, from Girdhari Lal or his successors-in-interest to the plaintiff-company. In one sense this is, of course, the main issue in the case; but as it happens it is not necessary for us to deal with it in disposing of this appeal, and it is only involved to a certain extent in the decision which we shall have to pronounce on one of the other appeals now before us. Apart altogether from the question whether the plaintiff-company had or had not a claim against Girdhari Lal at the moment of that gentleman's death, and against his estate afterwards, the trial Court has found, firstly, that Daya Kishen was never a member of a joint undivided Hindu family with Girdhari Lal and could in no way be made liable for any claim which the plaintiff-company might have against his cousin's estate. Further, the Court below has found that, as regards the remaining defendants in the suit, any claim which the company might have had was allowed to become barred by limitation, under Article 106 of the First Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, not having been brought within three years of Girdhari Lal's death. In fact, the trial Court holds that whatever partnership existed between the plaintiff-company and Girdhari Lal was a contractual relation with that gentleman personally and came to an end with his death. For the disposal of this appeal it is really sufficient for us to consider whether the above findings of fact are correct and whether the inferences of law which follow therefrom involve the dismissal of this suit. The trial Court has discussed, in all necessary detail, the evidence which was produced in order to prove that Mangat Rai, father of Daya Kishen, had separated from his brothers, including Shiam Lal, the father of Girdhari Lal, long before either Daya Kishen or Girdhari Lal came to Cawnpore. Girdhari Lal and his father Shiam Lal were residents of the Hansi District and, admittedly, Girdhari Lal was the first member of the family who came to Cawnpore to seek his fortune. Daya Kishen, in the company of an elder brother, came there some years later and no doubt received a certain amount of assistance from Girdhari Lal in his efforts to get a start in the business world of Cawnpore. We do not think, however, that any of the transactions in this connection to which our attention has been called in argument on behalf of the appellant-company really serve to countervail the evidence on which the trial Court has relied as proving separation. Over and above this, there are one or two circumstances which certainly favour Daya Kishen's contention. Girdhari Lal seems to have prospered in the world very considerably and it is in evidence that he built for himself a house the value of which is given as Rs. 40,000 or Rs. 50,000. Daya Kishen in his evidence expressly disclaimed having any kind of share in this house and, although, of course, this circumstance is not conclusive, it does seem to add weight to his denial of jointness. Daya Kishen had gone to Delhi and had been living there for some years prior to the death of Girdhari Lal. It is quite true that Daya Kishen's principal business at Delhi was a brokerage business connected with the Delhi branch of a large firm for which Girdhari Lal was also working at Cawnpore; but the plaintiff-company has failed to prove that Daya Kishen at Delhi acted in any way as Girdhari Lal's partner, or that Daya Kishen's brokerage account was settled with Girdhari Lal at Cawnpore. There was, at any rate, separation in residence between the two cousins during this period. Daya Kishen came to Cawnpore on hearing that Girdhari Lal was seriously ill and no doubt he did help in settling Girdhari Lal's affairs after the death of the latter, but we cannot find anything in the evidence to justify a clear inference that Daya Kishen's conduct in any particular matter was other than that of a cousin and a near relative helping the surviving members of a family which was in some trouble. It may be noted that Shiam Lal survived his son Girdhari Lal, though he died before the institution of this suit. It is said that he was a very old man in feeble health and addicted to taking opium. At any rate, it seems clear from the evidence that Shiam Lal was not acting as head of the joint family consisting of himself, his surviving son and his grandsons, at the time of Girdhari Lal's death, and that he was not in a position to take up the management of the family affairs when Girdhari Lal was removed. On a review of the entire evidence on this point, and, after allowing all possible weight to the considerations which have been pressed upon us on behalf of the appellant company, we feel satisfied that the decision of the Court below was correct. We hold that Daya Kishen was never a member of a joint undivided Hindu family with Girdhari Lal. On the pleadings in this case it follows that Daya Kishen cannot be made personally liable for any part of the plaintiff-company's claim. There have been arguments addressed to us almost amounting to a suggestion that Daya Kishen took over the business previously carried on by Girdhari Lal under such circumstances and conditions as would amount to a fresh contract of partnership between himself and the plaintiff-company. In our opinion, however, not only was no such case as this set up in the plaint, but such evidence as there is on the record bearing upon this suggestion falls far short of what would be required to prove it true.

The only point remaining, so far as this appeal is concerned, is the question whether the Court below was right in holding that any claim which the plaintiff-company might have against the estate of Girdhari Lal had become barred by limitation as against the defendants other than Daya Kishen. In so far as any items are claimed as representing the price of goods supplied to Girdhari Lal, the claim in respect of such items would seem to be clearly time-barred. For the rest, the case set up in the plaint really rests upon the allegations of partnership between the plaintiff-company and the joint family of which Girdhari Lal was the working head, which partnership, it is contended would continue uninterrupted by the death of Girdhari Lal. There is really nothing that can be called evidence from which the Court could be asked to infer that Girdhari Lal entered into all his various transactions with the plaintiff-company in any representative capacity or held himself out to be the head of a joint family, which family, be it remembered, would necessarily include his aged father as well as his minor nephews. The Madras High Court in a Full Bench case, that of Gangayya v. Venkataramiah (1), in considering a very similar question to this, laid down the principle that other members of a joint family must not be treated as necessarily or ipso facto partners in any partnership into which a member of the joint family, or even the manager of the joint family may see fit to enter. They based themselves, in part at any rate, on a previous decision of their own Court in Ramanathan Chetty v. Yegappa Chetty (2) in which principles are laid down even more strongly in favour of the respondents to this appeal. As against this, we have been referred to two decisions of the Punjab Court, the latest of which is Narain Das v. Ralli Brothers (3), in which the position has been taken up that other members of a joint faimly, and particularly minor members, may become sharers in a partnership entered into by the managing member of the joint family. In so far as any principle of law is involved in the present appeal, we need only say that we are disposed to look at the facts rather from the view of the law laid down by the learned Judges of the Madras High Court; but, in any case, we should not find it possible to record any such finding of fact as would be necessary before we could apply the principles enunciated in the Punjab ruling in favour of the appellant to this appeal. The result is that we concur in the finding of the trial Court on the question of limitation and that this appeal cannot succeed. We dismiss it accordingly, with costs.

Where a Revenue Officer decides a question of title acting as a Civil Court under section 117 of the Punjab Land Revenue Act, an appeal from his decision lies to the District Judge and not to the High Court. [p. 769, col. 1.]

In a Letters Patent Appeal a Division Bench has power to reverse a judgment of a single Judge which ignores an amendment of the law, although the amendment was not brought to his notice. [p. 769, col. 1.]

Letters Patent Appeal from the decree of Sir Henry Rattigan, Kt., Chief Justice, dated the 5th November 1919.

Mr. N. C. Pandit, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Upon a question as to title having been raised before him, the Revenue Officer proceeded under section 117 of the Punjab Land Revenue Act to determine the question as though he were a Civil Court. Now, it is true that under the Land Revenue Act, as it existed prior to 1914, the Revenue Officer was deemed to be a District Judge for the purpose of determining the forum which was competent to hear an appeal from a decree passed by him in regard to a dispute of this character. But the Punjab Courts Act, passed in 1914, substituted the phrase "Subordinate Judge" for "District Judge" in section 117 (2) (c) of the Land Revenue Act, and there can, therefore, be no doubt that the Assistant Collector, in the matter of the determination of the question of title, was acting as Subordinate Judge, and that the appellant was justified in filing his appeal in the Court of the District Judge. The order of the District Judge returning the appeal for presentation to this Court and that of the learned Judge of this Court dismissing the appeal as barred by time proceed upon an assumption that the law as originally declared in section 117 (2) (c) has not been subsequently amended ; and they must be set aside.

Mr. Sheo Narain for the respondents frankly admits that the appeal, in view of the amendment mentioned above, was rightly presented to the District Judge, but the learned Advocate contends that this amendment was not brought to the notice of either the District Judge or the Judge in Chambers, who dealt with the matter, and that the Division Bench, hearing an appeal under the Letters Patent, should not, therefore, interfere with the judgment of the single Judge. Considering that the matter is patent, and that the amendment in the law was not noticed either by the Counsel or by the Court, we see no reason why we should uphold the judgment which is admittedly wrong.

We, accordingly, set aside the judgment of the learned Judge in Chambers as well as the order of the District Judge returning the appeal for presentation to this Court and direct that the memorandum of appeal be returned to the appellant for presentation to the District Judge. The Court-fee on the memorandum of appeal shall be refunded and other costs shall be borne by the parties themselves.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Bombay Irrigation Act (VII Bom. of 1879), ss. 31, 33 —Deficiency of water caused by reducing dimension of sluice—Compensation, suit for, whether maintainable.

Sections 31 and 38 of the Bombay Irrigation Act are no bar to a suit against the Secretary of State for compensation for deficiency of water due to an Executive Engineer reducing the dimensions of a sluice for the admission of water from a Government canal. [p. 771, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Sukkur.

Mr. Lalchand Hasomal, for the Appellants.

Mr. T. G. Elphinston, Government Pleader, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the appellants against the Secretary of State for India in Council. Their case is that the Executive Engineer, Behari Canals, illegally reduced the size of the sluice which admitted water from the Government canal to the plaintiff's watercourse, and that there was a consequent deficiency of water, causing a loss to them of Rs. 2,000. They accordingly sue for a declaration that the Executive Engineer had no right to reduce the dimensions of the sluice, for an injunction to the defendant to maintain the former dimensions, and for recovery of Rs. 2,000 as damages. The defendant denies that the action of the Executive Engineer was illegal, or that there has been any material diminution of the water supply to plaintiffs so as to entitle them to the relief sought by way of an injunction or damages; and the following issues were raised:—

(1). Has the Court no jurisdiction to try this suit ?

(2). Is the sluice reduced in size, if so, to what extent ?

(3). Could the Executive Engineer narrow the sluice of the private canal mentioned in the plaint ? If so, to what extent ?

GANGARAM v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA.

(4). Cannot the suit lie against the defendant for the act of the Executive Engineer for the wrong done to the plaintiff?

(5). What is the effect of Suit No. 15 of 1908 on the present suit?

(6). What damages, if any, have plaintiffs suffered?

(7). What decree should be made?

At the request of the parties, issues Nos. 1, 3, 4 and 5 were tried first, and there has been no trial on the whole questions arising in the suit. On the 1st issue the lower Court held that it had jurisdiction except as to the claim for compensation. The 1st part of the 3rd issue is answered in the affirmative, and on the 2nd part, it was held that there are no limits to the Executive Engineer's powers to narrow the sluice provided the provisions of the Bombay Irrigation Act, 1879, are not contravened. The 4th and 5th issues were answered in the negative. The District Judge accordingly dismissed the plaintiff's suit with costs.

The appellants' contention is, that the lower Court erred in holding that the Executive Engineer had power to reduce the dimensions of the sluice under the provisions of the Irrigation Act, and this raises several points which I will take in turn. The District Judge in deciding the 3rd issue proceeded mainly on the ground that, under section 3, clause (2) of the Act, the sluice or outlet, through which the water is supplied from a canal to a water-course not maintained at Government expense, is expressly excluded from the works which are part of a water-course, and that, therefore, its size would appear to be a matter solely for Government which maintain the canal to determine. I think this conclusion clearly contravenes the general principle that Statutes, which encroach on the rights of the subject, must be strictly construed, and that the presumption is that the Legislature, if it desires to confiscate property, will manifest it plainly, if not in express words at least by clear implication and beyond reasonable doubt. (Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 3rd Edition, page 101). It is scarcely conceivable that the Legislature would intend to deprive the owner of a water-course of vested right by a mere definition clause like section 3 (2) and I can see nothing which supports such a construction of it on the contrary, there is an obvious reason for excluding a sluice from the definition of water-course, viz., that it is so closely connected with the supply of water from the canal that its maintenance in a fit state of repair is a matter purposely kept in the hands of Government and not imposed on the owner of the course under section 21 (b). Accordingly, in my opinion, if the reduction of the size of the sluice does result in a decrease of the water-supply to which the plaintiffs are entitled, then the mere fact of the sluice being part of the canal works cannot be relied on as justification for interference with the plaintiffs' right. It is necessary, therefore, to see whether there is any other provision which justifies the Executive Engineer's action, if it results in an undue interference with the supply of water which the plaintiffs are entitled to have from the canal. Another section of the Act on which the District Judge relies, is section 28 and in particular clauses (c) and (d) of that section. He holds that the stoppage of a supply under those clauses covers a partial stoppage as well as a complete stoppage. This, however, in my opinion, is opposed to the ordinary meaning of the word "stop," which is defined in Webster's Dictionary as "to close (an apeture) by filling or obstructing; to obstruct, render impassable." Moreover, it is noticeable that in clause (c) of the proviso to section 31 the word "stoppage" is followed by the words "or diminution of any supply of water." If, therefore, it was intended to cover the case of a partial stoppage in section 28, it is natural to except that the Legislature would have used the words "shall not be stopped or diminished" instead of the words "shall not be stopped." The words "whenever and so long as it is necessary to do in order to," etc., in clauses (c) and (d) also obviously contemplate a temporary stoppage and not a permanent one. Even, therefore, if stop includes diminish, it would not justify a permanent reduction in the size of a sluice of the kind now complained of. Nor is there anything in the provisions of that section which, to my mind, are inapplicable to an entire stoppage of the supply of water. Clause (c) covers the ordinary case of a supply to A being temporarily stopped to let B or C get his proper supply of water, as shown by the words "by rotation". And in cases under clause (d) an entire stoppage would ordinarily be called for. I do not think, therefore, that section 28 can be relied on as an absolute justification for permanently diminishing the supply of water, in the way in which this has been done. Nor is there anything in section 21] which can affect this question, unless there are relevant rules made by the Governor in Council under section 70 which might be relied upon as part of the terms on which the plaintiffs are entitled to have a supply of water under clause (d) of that section. But no such rules have been pointed out to us, and in another case of a similar kind which was tried by me no such rules were found to have been made. Section 21 (d) gives the owners of a water course the right to have a "supply" of water by such water-course, but (apart from the possibility of rules under section 70) lays down nothing as to the extent of supply. In my opinion, that is evidently intended to be controlled under section 27, subject to the provisions of sections 28 to 30 and the general law relating to easements. In 1879, when the Bombay Irrigation Act was passed, that law was the English Common Law on the subject, and naturally no reference would be made of it. Now that the Easements Act of 1882 is the law, its provisions must, in my opinion, supplement those of the Irrigation Act. But, as provided in section 2 (a) of the Easements Act, nothing in that Act can derogate from any right of the Government to regulate the collection, retention and distribution of the water flowing collected, retained or distributed in or by any channel or other work constructed at the public expense for irrigation. Subject to this, and sections 28 to 30 of the Irrigation Act, the law on the extent of an easment which is contained in section 23 of the Easements Act, governs the extent of the supply to which an owner of a water-course is entitled. This section 28 lays down that the extent of any easement (other than one of necessity) and the mode of its enjoyment must be fixed with reference to the probable intention of the parties and the purpose for which the right was imposed or acquired. It may be noted also that the saving clause in section 2 (a) of the Easements Act affects (1) the provision in section 27 that the servient owner must not do any act tending to restrict the easement, and (2) the restriction in section 31 that he may obstruct the user only on the servient heritage.

In my opinion, therefore, the question at issue between the parties cannot be disposed of on the ground on which the District Judge's decree is based. It is unnecessary in this view to consider whether the provisions of sections 21 and 29 of the Irrigation Act operate retrospectively so as to affect water-courses constructed prior to the commencement of the Act, but I certainly see no reason to differ from the answer in the affirmative given by the District Judge. The only other question connected with the Irrigation Act that arises is, whether the lower Court erred in holding that the plaintiff's claim for damages was barred by sections 31 and 38 of the Irrigation Act. Section 31 expressly refers only to compensation which may be awarded in respect of any substantial damage caused by any of the powers conferred by the Irrigation Act, and, on the view taken by me that the narrowing of the sluice is not in exercise of any power conferred by the Act, this section clearly cannot oust the jurisdiction of the Court to decide the plaintiffs' claim for damages for an alleged illegal act. Section 35 no doubt enables a petition for compensation to be presented to the Collector in a case of a kind there contemplated; but, it does not provide that the petitioner is precluded from seeking compensation otherwise, and it would, I think, be absurd for the plaintiffs to expect to get any compensation from the Collector in a case of this kind, where the action of the Executive Engineer is alleged by the defendant to be legal. Section 38 applies to claims for compensation under the Irrigation Act, whereas the present claim is for compensation for an act alleged to be illegal and not justified by the terms of the Act. These provisions must, under the ordinary rule of construction, be constructed strictly, and in favour of the plaintiffs' right to resort to the Civil Courts.

In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiffs' right to the relief they seek depends mainly on the question whether they have an easement to receive a supply of water in excess of the quantity which they receive through the reduced sluice, but, even supposing they may have in the past been receiving more than they now receive, still if the narrowing of the sluice is done in the legal exercise of the right of Government to regulate the collection, retention and distribution of water in canals, as provided in section 2 (a) of the Indian Easements Act, then this would deprive them of a right to the relief they seek. There is also the question of the extent of the easement under section 28 of the Easements Act to which I have referred. On this point a good deal may depend upon whether the watercourse was permitted to be opened after the Irrigation Act had come into force for the intentions of the parties would presumably be affected by the provisions of that Act And if it was an old watercourse, Government may be able to prove a legal right by usage or otherwise to control the distribution of water by narrowing sluices, etc., as pleaded in paragraph 6 of defendant's written statement.

I would, therefore, reverse the decree of the lower Court, and, as the suit has been decided on a preliminary point, remand the case under Order XLI, rule 23, Civil Procedure Code, for re-admission by the lower Court and for determination of the suit with reference to the following issues, which have been framed in consultation with the Pleaders of the parties.

(1) Have plaintiffs an easement by grant or prescription to receive a supply of water in excess of the quantity which they receive through the reduced sluice ?

(2) Has the plaintiffs' supply been reduced to less than what they are entitled to under such easement ?

(3) If so, has defendant the right to reduce the plaintiffs' supply of water from the canal to the extent to which it has been reduced ?

(4) If not, what damages, if any, have the plaintiffs suffered.

Res judicata—Revenue Court, decision of, as to status of tenant—Subsequent suit in Civil Court for declaration of occupancy tenancy, whether maintainable.

Where a Revenue Court decides in a rent suit that the status of a tenant is that of a sub-tenant, that decision is binding on a Civil Court and operates as res judicata to bar a suit brought subsequently in the Civil Court by the tenant for a declaration that he is an occupancy tenant. [p. 777, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Budaun, dated the 16th of August 1917.

Mr. Mukhtar Ahmad, for the Appellants.

Mr. Durga Charan Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case out of which this appeal has arisen are as follows :—One Hulasi was recorded as an occupancy tenant of a certain holding for many years prior to 1300 Fasli (corresponding to A. D. 1893). In 1301 Fasli there was a new settlement and the names of Pitai and Reoti, the sons of Dudha, were recorded as occupancy tenants of that holding and the name of Hulasi was removed. Apparently, the latter continued in possession because in the year 1898 Pitai and Reoti issued a notice of ejectment against him which he proceeded to contest under section 39, Act XII of 1881. The Revenue Court decided in favour of Hulasi that he was the occupancy tenant and no appeal was preferred from that decision. In the year 1915 Ram Lal and Dudha, the sons of Pitai, and Budha, son of Reoti, sued the present plaintiffs-appellants and their brother Ghasi for arrears of rent. This suit was in respect of one of the plots (No. 851) which constituted Hulasi's holding. Budha, Mula and Ghasi are not the descendants of Hulasi but are the sons of his brother Nain Sukh. The claim was based on the allegation that these nephews of Hulasi were sub-tenants of the land, holding from the plaintiffs therein. The Assistant Collector, of the First Class in whose Court the suit for rent was brought decided in favour of the then plaintiffs. In that case the defendants pleaded that they were not the sub-tenants but that they were the actual occupancy tenants of the land itself. The case was decided on the 5th of May 1916. An examination of the judgment shows that after Hulasi's death these persons, the nephews, claiming to be the heirs to his occupancy holding, took possession of it, that a suit for ejectment was brought against them by the landlord in 1914, that it was held that they had not inherited the occupancy rights and they were ejected. In view of this subsequent decision of 1914, and in view of the evidence before him given by the Patwari, the Assistant Collector held that they were the sub-tenants of the plaintiffs in that suit and decreed the suit for rent. Thereupon, the present plaintiffs, two of the then defendants, brought the present suit in the Civil Court for a declaration that they were the occupancy tenants of the land as against the defendants who were the plaintiffs in the rent suit. It is to be noted that the Zemindar intentionally has not been made a party to this suit although he is vitally interested in the matter. One of the three brothers did not join in the suit and was made a pro forma defendant. The suit relates to one of the plots No. 851. The rest of Hulasi's holding is not in dispute and, in view of what we have said regarding the ejectment proceedings taken by the landlord, it could not be involved in this suit.

The Court of first instance decreed the plaintiffs' claim. The lower Appellate Court has dismissed the claim. It has held that the decision of the 5th of May 1916 is res judicata and it is not open now to the plaintiffs-appellants to re raise the point. We think the case is governed by the decision of this Court in Kishore Singh v. Bahadur Singh (1). There can be no doubt whatsoever that in the present case an attempt has been made in the present suit to get round the decision of the Rent Court that the plaintiffs are the sub-tenants. In the reported case the previous suit in the Revenue Court was one in ejectment but we do not think that that can make any difference to the principle applied and we do not think that the Civil Court is empowered to go behind the Rent Court's decision or to set it aside. It will be noted that the former decision of 1898 in favour of Hulasi had its full effect, but the subsequent decision was not contrary to the former decision of 1898. It was based on different facts and was decided in favour of the plaintiffs on the ground that the sons of Nain Sukh had not inherited the occupancy tenure of Hulasi. There is no necessity, therefore, to hold which of these two decisions is binding for they do not clash. In our opinion there is no force in this appeal and the suit has been rightly dismissed. We, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

In a case for ejectment the plaintiff, where the defendant is proved to be in possession, must in addition to proving his title make out that the dispossession took place within 12 years of the suit, that is to say, that he was in possession and was dispossessed within that period. Possession, however, is not necessarily the same thing as user and if the land is of such a nature as to render it unfit for actual enjoyment in the usual modes, for instance, a narrow strip of unenclosed land adjoining a public lane, it may be presumed that the previous possession of the plaintiff continued till the contrary is proved. This presumption is a presumption of fact. It is by no means conclusive, and whether it should be applied or not must depend upon the facts of each particular case. [p. 775, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—This appeal, which is preferred under the Letters Patent, from a decision of a single Judge of this Court dated the 30th May 1919, arises out of a suit instituted by the plaintiff Musammat Ram Surat Kuar in the following circumstances. The plaintiff was a lease-holder of a certain house in Mahalla Lalbagh in Patna City within the Zemindary of the defendants Nos. 1 to 7. Immediately to the south of her house was a plot of land some 60 feet long by 9 feet wide which has been referred to as Plot A and is so described in the plan annexed to the plaint, the plaintiff's house being referred to as Plot B. The plaintiff purchased the lease of her house on the 18th July 1912 from tenants of the defendants. The house was in a dilapidated condition and wishing to re-build and extend it she purchased the lease of Plot A from Moulvie Muhammad Wahid who was then a tenant. Muhammad Wahid's title dated from the year 1889 he having purchased from Aklu Tamoli under a registered Kobala in that year. Aklu Tamoli was a tenant of the defendants. In Aklu Tamoli's time there had been some sort of a house erected on the land but this had long since disappeared, the suggestion being that the plot was originally of larger extent and that the southern portion had been taken over by the Patna Municipality, some years ago, for the purpose of making a lane and a drain alongside it and that the house was then pulled down. However that may be, and there is no direct finding on the question, there does exist at present a public lane and a drain immediately to the south of Plot A which, as already stated, is only 9 feet wide and hardly suitable in its present condition for building purposes except to an owner of an adjoining plot. Some five or six years before the suit was instituted the defendant No. 8, Ram Khelawan, erected a hut upon a portion of Plot A. According to the plaintiff, this was done with the permission of herself or her predecessor-in title: according to the defendant Ram Khelawan settled there by permission of the defendants who are the Malika. Sometime shortly after the plaintiff's purchase, the defendant petitioned the Municipality for permission to enclose with a wall Plot A together with certain other properties of theirs adjoining. The plaintiff objected and herself applied for permission to build upon the said plot. The Municipality refused both petitions until the title of the contesting parties should be declared by a Civil Court. This happened at the end of September 1916 and on the 16th February 1917 the plaintiff instituted the present suit claiming a declaration of her right to the said land and confirmation of her possession. Alternatively, if she should be found to be out of possession, she claimed to be given possession by dispossessing Ram Khelawan or any other person who might be considered in possession. The plaintiff's claim included certain other rights in connection with her rights in Plot B, but we are not concerned with those in the present appeal.

Various defences were raised to the action by the written statement, the plaintiff's title being impugned. The defendants further contended that the land in question was and always had been in their possession and that Ram Khelawan was in possession with their permission, and that the suit being one in ejectment neither the plaintiff nor her predecessor-in-title, assuming title to be good, had had any possession over the land for the last 12 years.

Before the learned Munsif who tried the case both parties put forward evidence in support of their plea of possession both during and before the 12 years preceding the suit. The learned Munsif found that the plaintiff's title was established and it is not disputed that whilst Aklu Tamoli's house was on the land he and his successor Wahid were in possession. This, however, was more than 12 years before the commencement of the suit. Some evidence on behalf of both parties was given as to growing vegetables and letting out a toddy tree which stands upon the land, but the evidence of both parties in this respect was rejected. The learned Munsif also found that Ram Khelawan erected his hut or Jhopra on the land about five or six years before the date of the suit with the permission of the defendants which was during the time of Muhammad Wahid's tenancy. This was the only evidence which was accepted shewing any active user of the land during the 12 years antecedent to the suit. The learned Munsif thereupon held that, in his opinion, it must be held that Wahid was dispossessed by the defendants sometime after his purchase. This is in terms a finding that the plaintiff, or rather her predecessor-in-title, was dispossessed within 12 years of the date of the suit and having so found it seems to me that the date of dispossession having been thus determined he ought to have held that the plaintiff had made out her case. Article 142 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act prescribes the period of limitation in a suit for ejectment, which is 12 years from the date of dispossession or discontinuance. He went on to consider, however, whether the plaintiff had proved actual user within the last 12 years. He considered the evidence put forward on her behalf as to growing vegetables and so forth and came to the conclusion that there was no evidence of actual possession within 12 years and dismissed the suit.

On appeal to the District Judge, he agreed with the Munsif in his finding that the plaintiff's title to the land had been established as well as the possession of Aklu Tamoli. He found, however, that the land in question being a mere strip of Parti land which was useless for any purpose except building, and then only after one of the adjoining plots had been acquired, it could not be expected that any acts of possession should be in evidence and that the case was governed by decisions such as that of Mahomed Ali Khan v. Khaja Abdul Gunny (1) and Raj Kumar Roy v. Gobind Chunder Roy (2) and that it must be presumed that the possession of the plaintiff which had been established in the time of Aklu, when coupled with title, continued so long as there is no evidence to the contrary and he decreed the suit.

From that decision an appeal was preferred to a single Judge of this Court who affirmed the decree of the learned District Judge and dismissed the appeal.

From that decision the present appeal is brought. It is not disputed by the respondent that in a case for ejectment the plaintiff, where the defendant is proved to be in possession, must, in addition to proving his title, make out that the dispossession took place within 12 years of the suit, that is to say, that he was in possession and dispossessed within that period. The appellant relied upon that class of cases of which Mohima Chunder Mozoomdar v. Mohesh Chunder Neogi (3) is an instance. In that and in similar cases of a like import where it has been held that in the absence of any direct evidence of acts of possession within 12 years the plaintiff although proving his title must fail, the land in suit has been either cultivated land or of such a character that acts of possession in the ordinary way ought to be easily obtainable. In such cases it has invariably been held that, in the absence of any evidence of actual possession, the plaintiff fails to satisfy the burden cast upon him. Possession, however, is not necessarily the same thing as user and if the land is of such a nature as to render it unfit for actual enjoyment in the usual modes it may probably be presumed that the previous possession of the plaintiff continued till the contrary is proved. This presumption is a presumption of fact. It is by no means conclusive, and whether it should be applied or not must depend upon the facts of each particular case. In Raj Kumar Roy v. Gobind Chunder Roy (2) (ubi sup) the land in suit was re-claimed Bhil. For 10 years antecedent to the suit the defendant's possession was established. The plaintiffs proved their title and a previous possession some 24 years before the institution of the suit. The High Court took the view that the evidence did not enable them to find that either party was in possession during the first two years of the 12 but that it must be presumed that the earlier possession of the plaintiff coupled with title had continued until the contrary was shown. Their Lordships of the Privy Council assuming that the burden of proof lay upon the plaintiff to the extent contended for by the defendants came to the conclusion that he had sufficiently discharged it and the decision may, perhaps, be regarded as one of fact but, with regard to the conclusions arrived at by the High Court, they said, "After hearing a great deal of argument to impugn the view of the High Court their Lordships are not disposed to differ from it. It is in accordance with the decision in the case of Runjeet Ram Panday v. Goburdhun Ram Panday (4), a case which fell under the Limitation Act passed in 1859 when the plaintiff [as pointed out in Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan (5)] was subject to a burden of proof heavier than that established by the Limitation Acts of 1871 and 1877."

In Mahomed Ali Khan v. Khaja Abdul Gunny (1), the majority of the Full Bench laid down that, "where land has been shewn to have been in a condition unfitting it for actual enjoyment in the usual modes at such a time and under such circumstances that that state naturally would, and probably did, continue till within 12 years before the suit, it may properly be presumed that it did so continue, and that the plaintiff's possession continued also until the contrary is shewn. This presumption seems to us to be reasonable in itself and in accordance with the legal principles now embodied in section 114 of the Evidence Act."

The question in the present case appears to me to be one really of fact which has been decided by the learned District Judge, and the question is, whether the condition of the land in suit is such as to render it unfit for actual enjoyment in the usual modes. The learned Judge has found that it was. If so, the principle enunciated in the last mentioned case is clearly applicable and, if the presumption of the plaintiff's possession is to be applied, it follows that she satisfied the burden cast upon her. It is contended, however, that the facts found are not sufficient to establish the Judge's conclusion that the land was not fit for actual enjoyment in the usual modes. In my opinion, this contention cannot be established. The land in suit, although at one time when of larger dimensions was capable of enjoyment for building purposes, was at the material time in question in this suit a narrow strip of Parti land adjoining a public lane and its uses, if any, were of an extremely limited character. It was open to the public, unenclosed and altogether unsuitable for agriculture or growing vegetables or other produce. The attempt to establish such a use on both sides failed and in its present condition it is unfit even for building purposes. It might be put to certain limited uses such as that in fact for which Ram Khelawan appears to have occupied it. But any demand for this land for such a purpose must, in my opinion, be taken to be of a very limited nature and not such as would, in the ordinary course, commend itself to the owner of the adjoining house. I can see no difference in principle between the facts presented in the present case and cases where land is of a Jungly nature or so covered by water as to be incapable of cultivation or user in the ordinary way. I think this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

MULLICK, J.—I agree that this appeal is concluded by a finding of fact and must be dismissed. I would, however, desire to add that I am still of opinion that the law has been correctly stated in Bhikhad Bhunjan Narain Tewari v. Upendra Nath Roy (6), which follows the decision in Bhuban Mandal v. Jugal Kishore, Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 723 of 1917 to which I was a party. In every case the Court may draw a presumption as to possession from title. It is a presumption of fact which the Evidence Act expressly warrants by section 114. Section 4 of the Act enacts the Court may regard the fact as proved unless and until it is disproved or may call for proof of it. The discretion of the Court is to be exercised with due regard to the nature of the land and the evidence in the case.

The judgment in the case of Fakira Lal Sahu v. Munshi Ram Charan Lal (7), to which also I was a party, is not inconsistent with this view when examined in relation to the facts of that case. There the Muhammadan Law—Pre-emption—Talab-i-muasibat, what constitutes.

In the absence of other circumstances, a mere statement by a person that he has a right of pre-emption, does not amount to a valid first demand as required by the Muhammadan Law. [p. 778, col 1.]

Plaintiff, pre-emptor, on hearing of a sale, to pre-empt which he brought the present suit, used the following expression:—"I have a right of pre-emption, how will the vendees take it:"

Held, that the aforesaid expression did not amount to a talab-i-muasibat either in express terms or by implication, as required by strict Muhammadan Law. [p. 778, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Benares, dated the 11th September 1918.

Mr. Peary Lal Banerji, for the Appellants.

Mr. Sital Parshad Ghosh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a defendants' appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption of a house situated in the City of Benares. It appears that one Lachhman Parsad originally owned a house which stood on the site on which the present house stands. On his death he was either succeeded by his two daughters or two daughters' sons, Chandraman Prasad and Bishunath Prasad, who were then minors. Sital Prasad, father of Chandraman, appears to have acted as their guardian. On the 8th of January 1901 Sital Prasad executed a usufructuary mortgage-deed of the house left by Lachhman Prasad in favour of the defendants for a sum of Rs. 125. The mortgage-deed provided that the mortgagee would be entitled to demolish the house which then stood and re-build it and that the mortgagor would not be allowed to redeem the house without the payment of the costs of the new construction. Ever since 1901 the defendants had been in possession of this house and spent nearly Rs. 4,000 in building a new house on the old site. On Chandraman and Bishunath attaining majority they seem to have put forward some claim to this house and in order to settle this matter the defendants obtained two sale-deeds, one dated the 13th of June 1916 from Sital Prasad and Chandraman Prasad for a sum of Rs. 400 and another, dated the 7th of July 1916 from Bishunath Parshad of half the house for Rs. 125. The present suit was brought to pre-empt the first sale-deed. On behalf of the defendants the plaintiff's right to pre-empt, as well as the fact of his having made the necessary demands, were denied. It was further pleaded that the sale deed of the house had been taken with the advice of the plaintiff and that the plaintiff was actually estopped from bringing this claim. It was also pleaded that, inasmuch as the defendant had become a co sharer by virtue of the second sale-deed, dated the 7th of July 1916, he had a preferential right of claim over the plaintiff and the suit should be dismissed. The Court of first instance, holding that the plaintiff had actively assisted the defendant in taking the sale-deed in dispute and was estopped from putting forward his claim for pre emption, and, also holding that the plaintiff had failed to prove that he had made the demands in accordance with law, dismissed the suit. The plaintiff appealed from the decree of the first Court and the lower Appellate Court set aside that decree and decreed the suit. The defendants have come in second appeal to this Court and on their behalf the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge is challenged. The learned Subordinate Judge, on the question of the performance of the demands, has set aside the finding of the first Court and recorded a finding that he had no reason to disbelieve the plaintiff's witnesses and has held that the plaintiff-appellant had proved the fact of his having made the two demands. He has also held that it is not open to the defendants to base their right under the second sale-deed, and that even if it were that deed confers no title on them.

So far as the question of fact is concerned, we are bound to accept the finding that the plaintiff did make the demands as he said he did, however perverse it may be, though we are constrained to say that, in our opinion, the finding arrived at by the learned Subordinate Judge, in view of the circumstances mentioned by the first Court, was perverse. There is, however, this difficulty in the way of the plaintiff. His case was that, some ten or eleven months after the execution of the sale-deed, when he was sitting in his baithak and attending to his son who was lying ill on a bed he learnt of the sale from one Tulsi by means of questions and answers reduced to writing, and on hearing of it he used the following expression:—"I have a right of pre-emption, how will Mangru and Mahngi take it?" This was all that he did on the occasion that he first heard of the sale. His case was that, subsequently, he went to the house in question and made the second demand as required by law. In our opinion, the expression used by the plaintiff does not amount to a valid first demand as required by law. All that the words used by him mean is, that he had a right of pre emption in that house and if he exercised that right it would be impossible for the defendants to retain that house. This amounted simply to a statement of fact that he had a right of pre-emption in that house. That he had a right is now found to be correct. But a person may have the right and yet not exercise it. A mere statement that he has a right cannot amount to a demand of pre-emption, unless, perhaps, there be other circumstances which, coupled with that statement, may justify the inference that a demand was made. As was held in the case of Muhammad Abdul Rahman Khan v. Muhammad Khan (1), "To say I am the pre-emptor and my right extends to the land" is not sufficient to constitute a talab-i muasibat within the meaning of the Muhammadan Law. Also see Baillie's Muhammadan Law, Volume I, page 487 and Ameer Ali's Muhammadan Law, Volume I, page 724, 4th Edition. The point for our consideration is, whether the words which he used constituted the talab i-muasibat either in express terms or by implication. Apart from the expression used by him, there are no other circumstances from which we can gather that, at the time when he says he made that statement, he intended to make an immediate demand for pre-emption. The subsequent demand might be valid but if the first demand was defective his suit is bound to fail. In our opinion, in this case the plaintiff has failed to prove that he made the first demand as required by strict Muhammadan Law. It is true that his claim was based on a custom of pre-emption but even under this custom the rules of Muhammadan Law were applicable and, therefore, the case is governed strictly by Muhammadan Law. In this view of the case this appeal succeeds. It is not, therefore, necessary to decide the other points. We accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs throughout including in this Court-fees on the higher scale.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Bakerganj, dated the 27th of July 1918.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Mohendra Nath Roy (with him Babu Sirish Chunder Chowdhury, Junior Government Pleader), for the Appellant.—The facts of the case leading to this appeal by the defendant are as follows. The lands in suit were let out rent free in ijara to one Debnath Roy, the predecessor-in-interest of the plaintiff in September 1839 for 20 years. In November 1856 Debnath executed a Kabuliyat to the Government in respect of the said waste lands within defined boundaries for 99 years from the date of the original ijara. In April 1870 one Prosanno Kumar Ray Chaudhuri executed a Doul Kabuliyat in respect of the same lands on the same terms and conditions as in 1856. In 1905 new maps of the said lands were prepared on the basis of a survey held in 1900. It was found by the Government at that time that the plaintiff had acquired a certain quantity of land in excess of those leased out by the two previous Kabuliyats. In 1914 proceedings were commenced for the assessment of revenue of the excess lands under section 6 of Act IX of 1847. The Board of Revenue decided in December 1915 that the plaintiff must execute a fresh Kabuliyat in respect of the excess lands and must pay additional revenue for the same. The present suit has been brought by the plaintiff for a declaration that the assessment by the Board of Revenue is illegal and ultra vires inasmuch as the lands assessed really formed part of the land leased out to the plaintiff by the previous Kabuliyats. The defence was that the lands were accretions of the two large navigable rivers Sapleza and Baleswar which were the southern and western boundaries respectively of the lands originally let out and that, therefore, the assessments were justified and legal. We also pleaded limitation. My first point would be, that the suit is barred by limitation in view of section 24 of Regulation II of 1819. That section prescribes the period of limitation as one year from the date of the decision by the Board of Revenue. In this case the Board of Revenue gave its decision in December 1915 and the suit was not brought till 20th January 1917. The suit is clearly, therefore, barred by limitation. My next submission would be, that the proceedings under section 6 of Act IX of 1847 were not ultra vires and void inasmuch as they were in accordance with Regulation II of 1819, Regulation III of 1828 and Act IX of 1847. Refers to section 10, clause (3), of Regulation III of 1828. As a necessary corollary it would follow, therefore, that the onus would be on the plaintiff to show that the proceedings are ultra vires and void. The plaintiff did not make it his case in the Court below that the lands formed part of his leasehold land. Further, the record shows that the plaintiff had admitted these lands as accretions and were not part of the leasehold lands. This appeal should be treated as a second appeal. Section 10, clause (3), of Regulation III of 1828 says that civil suits against the decisions of the Board of Revenue should be treated as appeals. Therefore, the present appeal would be in the nature of a second appeal. Hence questions of fact cannot be gone into in this appeal.

Sir Rashbehary Ghosh, (with him Babus Lalit Mohun Banerjee and Apurba Churn Mukherjee), for the Respondents.—As regards the question of limitation, the decision of the Board of Revenue was given in December 1915. Our case is, that we came to know of the order on 21st January 1916 when a notice of it was served on us. The suit was brought on the 20th January 1917. The allegation of notice in our plaint has not been challenged. Clearly, therefore, the suit is within one year from receipt of the notice and cannot be said to be barred. The case is not governed by Act IX of 1847. The position of the parties created by the lease is that of the lessor and lessee. Under the Act, IX of 1847, it must be shown that the land has been added to any estate paying revenue directly to the Government. The Government had as owner of the lands leased out the lands under the terms of an ordinary lease to the plaintiff who cannot, therefore, be called the holder of an estate paying revenue directly to the Government. There is no distinction between 'rent' and 'revenue' made in the Kabuliyat. Hence proceedings under section 6 of Act IX of 1847 are ultra vires. (Then proceeds to discuss the regularity of the proceedings) as regards the question of onus it lay on the defendant to show that the lands were accretions. We never admitted them to be accretions. We took this point before the Collector and that has been our case all along. Refers to Maharaja of Burdwan v. Secretary of State (1), Prasunno Coomar Roy v. Secretary of State for India (2).

Babu Sirish Chunder Chowdhury, replied in brief.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an action brought by the plaintiffs against the Secretary of State for India in Council for a declaration that certain lands on the banks of the rivers Baleswar and Sapleza in the District of Backergunge in respect of which Government revenue has been assessed under the provisions of Act IX of 1847, are within the ambit of Mahal Debnathpore, which is held by the plaintiffs under the Government on certain terms and conditions mentioned in Exhibits 3 and H, dated the 19th November 1856, and the 9th April 1870, respectively, and for a declaration that the proceedings undertaken by the defendant for the assessment of the said revenue are illegal, and for various other reliefs mentioned in the plaint. The defendant by his written statement alleged that the suit was barred by limitation and that the lands in question which had not been let out by Government had been formed out of the beds of the two rivers mentioned above, described as large tidal public nagvigable rivers, and that the same had been duly and properly assessed with revenue under the provisions of Act IX of 1847.

The facts shortly stated, are as follows:—

Certain lands in the Sunderbans were let out by Government on the 1st September 1839 rent-free in ijara to one Debnath Roy, the Benamidar of the predecessor-in-interest of the plaintiffs, for a period of 20 years. In September 1853 Government promulgated certain rules regarding the grant of waste lands in the Sunderbans and, in accordance with the orders of the Board of Revenue, the ijardar Debnath Roy executed a Kabuliyat in respect of a grant by Government of an approximate area of 34,000 Bighas of waste land in the Sunderbans within certain defined boundaries. This Kabuliyat, which is dated the 19th November 1856 and which provided for a progressive rental, is Exhibit 3. Of the boundaries mentioned above, it is only necessary to refer to two of them, namely, on the south by the Sapleza river and on the west by the Baleswar river. It appears that between the years 1858 and 1867 there were certain proceedings before the survey authorities and in the Civil Courts which are referred to in Exhibits F and G, and at last on the 9th April 1870, a Doul Kabuliyat was executed by one Prosanno Chunder Roy Choudhury in respect of 33,441 Bighas 17 Cottas and 7 Chittaks of Jungle lands, being the lands referred to above, on the bank of the river Bamni otherwise known as Sapleza. This Doul Kabuliyat (Exhibit H) which did not in any way interfere with the terms and conditions mentioned in Exhibit 3, expressly stated that there would not be allowed any abatement of the jama in the event of diluvion and that Government would be entitled to realise arrears of the jama by public auction of the lands referred to above and of such moveable and immoveable properties as might be in the possession of the grantees. In 1900 the Government issued certain notifications under section 3 of Act IX of 1847 directing a survey to be made of the lands on the banks of the rivers and the sea-shore in the District of Backergunge, and thereafter new maps were prepared in 1904-05 of the lands on the banks of the rivers Sapleza and Baleswar. The map of 1870, commonly known as Ellison's map, referred to in Exhibits F and G, was compared with the new maps and it is alleged that as a result of the comparison it was discovered that certain lands had been added to the lands covered by Exhibits 3 and H. Thereafter, in 1914, proceedings were taken under section 6 of Act IX of 1847 for the assessment of these lands with revenue.

SECRETARY OF STATE v. JATINDRA NATH.

The proceedings under section 6 of Act IX of 1847 were eventually confirmed by the Board of Revenue on the 20th December 1915 with the result that the plaintiffs were called upon to execute Kabuliats in respect of the lands which, it was alleged, had been added to their original lands. The plaintiffs by their present suit challenge the legality of the proceedings under section 6 of Act IX of 1847. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that the proceedings adopted in this case were not in accordance with law and that it has not been shown that the lands assessed were not included in Exhibits 3 and H and has accordingly made the declarations asked for.

On appeal, it has been contended before us on behalf of the Secretary of State that (i) the suit is barred by limitation, having regard to the provisions of section 24 of Regulation II of 1819; (ii) that the proceedings adopted for the purpose of assessing the lands discovered on comparison of the map of 1904-05 with Ellison's map of 1870 were strictly in accordance with the provisions of Regulation II of 1819, Regulation III of 1828 and Act IX of 1847; (iii) that it had never been contended up to the date of this suit that the said lands were within the lands referred to in Exhibits 3 and H; (iv) that the onus was on the plaintiff to prove that the revenue authorities were wrong in the proceedings referred to above, and (v) that this suit being one under section 10, sub-section 3, of Regulation III of 1828, must be and ought to have been dealt with as an appeal against the decision of the Board of Revenue, dated the 20th December 1915.

We are not impressed with the point about the suit being barred by limitation. Assuming for the moment that Regulation II of 1819 has any application to the facts of the present case, the matter stands thus. The decision of the Board of Revenue was, as we have said, pronounced on the 20th December 1915. Under section 24 of Regulation II of 1819, the dissatisfied party is "entitled to sue any time within one year from the date of his being informed of the Board's decision." Now it does not appear when the plaintiffs were informed of the Board's decision, but in the plaint it is stated (see paragraph 6) that the order of the Board of Revenue was communicated to the plaintiffs by a notice on the 21st January 1916. It is noticeable that this definite allegation of fact is not denied in the written statement and it may, therefore, be taken to be admitted by the defendant. If that is so, then the suit was clearly within time, the plaint having been put on the file on the 20th January 1917.

Before dealing specifically with the other points urged on behalf of the appellant, it may be useful to indicate once more the nature of the present suit. The contention on behalf of the plaintiffs is that the entire proceedings for the assessment of lands with revenue in the present case are a nullity. This resolves itself into the question: Is Act IX of 1847 applicable at all in the case of a lease of lands in the Sunderbans on the terms and conditions set out in Exhibits 3 and H, or is not the relation between the grantor and the grantee regulated by the terms of the contract between the parties, subject to the provisions of Regulation XI of 1825?

The Government as 'owner' of the Sunderbans (see section 13 of Regulation III of 1828) granted a lease of certain lands for a period of 99 years from 1839 with a covenant for perpetual renewal to Debnath Roy on a progressive rental. It is clear from clauses 4 and 6 of the Kabuliat of 1856 that there is no distinction drawn between 'rent' and 'revenue' in the document, and that the relation created by it between the parties is that of a lessor and a lessee. The grantee in this instance is not allowed (see Exhibit H) to claim an abatement of rent on the ground of diluvion and he runs the risk, in the event of accrual of arrears of the jama reserved by the document, of not only having the lease-hold interest sold by public auction but his other properties moveable and immoveable sold as well. In these circumstances, it becomes material to enquire whether there is any room for the application of Act IX of 1847. Under Act IX of 1847 it must be shown that land has been added to any estate paying revenue directly to Government. It is true that Mahal Debnathpore is registered in the Backergunge Collectorate as bearing Towzi No. 4906, but we must look into the circumstances of the origin of the grant. We are of opinion, having regard to the position of Government as owner of the Sunderbans, and to the terms and conditions set forth in the governing documents, Exhibits 3 and H, that the grantee in this case cannot be said to be the holder of an "estate paying revenue directly to Government." If that is so, then section 6 of Act IX of 1847 cannot be invoked for assessing lands alleged to be additions with revenue payable to Government. It then becomes necessary to enquire whether the proceedings, purported to have been taken under Act IX of 1847, were themselves in order. The record before us shows that there were abundant materials before the learned Subordinate Judge for coming to the conclusion that, in some respects at least, the action of the Diara Deputy Collector was not above reproach. Coming now to the main question involved in this appeal, we think that the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge that it has not been shown that the lands assessed were not included within the ambit of the Mahal Debnathpore cannot be assailed. It is admitted that no actual survey of the lands in dispute was ever undertaken and it is found that no common points outside fluvial action on either side of the rivers in question were compared. It is said that this is a question of the onus of proof and that the onus lay on the plaintiffs in this case. We are of opinion that when the matter came before the Civil Court in circumstances such as are disclosed herein, the onus lay on the grantor, i.e., the Secretary of State for India in Council, to show that lands outside those mentioned in Exhibits 3 and H had come into existence and had been added to the original lands. The question of onus is, however, immaterial now. The learned Subordinate Judge had before him the whole of the record which was before the revenue authorities and, on a full consideration of the entire record, he has come to the conclusion that there was nothing in it which showed that lands outside the ambit of Mahal Debnathpore had come into existence and had been added to the Mahal. We have examined the record which was before the revenue authorities for ourselves and we agree with the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge. It is next said that it had been admitted by the plaintiffs in the course of the proceedings under Act IX of 1847 before the revenue authorities that there had been accretions outside the lands mentioned in Exhibits 3 and H. The evidence is not very clear on this point, but such as it is does not, in our opinion, prove affirmatively that there was any such admission on the part of the plaintiffs before the revenue authorities. The point was clearly taken by the plaintiffs before the Diara Deputy Collector and it does not appear that it was abandoned at any time. It is not shown that the rivers Baleswar and Sapleza at the time of the grant in this case were public navigable rivers. In the absence of any evidence to that effect, having regard to the boundaries of the land demised in this case, it would follow (see Maharaja of Burdwan v. Secretary of State (1) that the boundaries on the south and the west lay on, and extended to the middle of, the two rivers mentioned above. It is not shown whether the alleged additional lands were within the limits just indicated. On all these considerations, we are unable to dissent from the view taken by the learned Sub Judge. If there are addditional lands outside the limits just referred to, it will be open to the defendant to take proceedings under Regulation XI of 1825.

It is lastly urged that the matter ought to have been dealt with as if it were a regular appeal from the decision of the Board of Revenue. We are unable to assent to this view. The suit was one for a declaration that the proceedings under Act IX of 1847 were a nullity. That being so, it is difficult to say that it should have been treated as a mere appeal from the decision of the Board of Revenue.

In the result the present appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Babu SHIVA PRASAD, RECEIVER, CLAIMANT, AND THANMULL AND OTHERS—PETITIONING CREDITORS, HALDHAR PRASAD NAIK AND OTHERS—INSOLVENTS—RESPONDENTS.

Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907*), ss.* 18, 36 —Receiver appointed after adjudication, position and powers of—Order passed while property in custody of ad interim Receiver, whether res judicata*—Power of Receiver to make application under s.* 36.

Where an ad interim Receiver has been appointed in inslovency proceedings, the Receiver appointed after adjudication does not stand in the shoes of the interim Receiver he stands on a very much higher footing. The property of the judgment-debtor vests in him, he holds it for the benefit of the whole body of the creditors and he has special rights conferred and special duties imposed upon him by Statute. Amongst other rights conferred upon him, is the right to make an application under section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, and this statutory right which has been conferred on him cannot be taken away by an order in a proceeding to which he was not a party. [p. 784, cols. 1 & 2.]

An order as to the validity of a transaction obtained upon an application to which the debtor and creditors alone are impleaded as parties while the debtor's estate is in the custody of an ad interim Receiver does not operate as res judicata as against the Receiver appointed after the order of adjudication and does not debar him from making an application under section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Durbhanga.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This appeal arises out of an application made under section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act by the Receiver in respect of a sale of 322 logs of wood made by the insolvents to one Ram Saran Mandar.

The insolvency proceeding was started on the 12th of December 1914 on the application of certain creditors who at the same time applied for the appointment of an ad interim Receiver. The Court appointed the Nazir ad interim Receiver and he attached the logs in question as well as other property of the debtors. After the attachment, Ram Saran Mandar filed an objection in regard to these logs in which he alleged that he purchased the logs and that the petitioning creditors and the debtors were colluding to defraud him. The petitioning creditors resisted the claim on the ground that the sale was not a genuine transaction. The application was heard by Mr. Ross, the then District Judge, who found that the sale was a genuine transaction and allowed the claim. An appeal to the High Court against this order was dismissed. In April 1915 the debtors were declared insolvents and a Pleader was appointed Receiver. The Nazir made over charge of the attached property to the new Receiver, who, on the 8th of July 1918, more than three years after the declaration of insolvency, has made the present application under section 36 in respect of the same 322 logs which were the subject-matter of the sale impugned before the then District Judge, Mr. Ross. This application which has been made before Mr. Ross' successor, Mr. Dhavle, has been successful, the learned District Judge finding that the transfer of the logs to Ram Saran was made neither in good faith nor for valuable consideration.

The first point urged in this appeal before us is that the question of the bona fide nature of the transaction is res judicata. Mr. Ross, in the course of his judgment, dated the 9th of April 1915, says:—"The claimant produces a bill of sale, dated the 2nd Bhado 1321 executed by Haldhar Prasad Naik which recites that Rs. 11,921-11-0 were due to Ram Saran Mandar from before and that Rs. 12,000 was then paid and in consideration of this sum of Rs. 23,921-11-0 322 logs were conveyed to the claimant. This transaction has clearly been questioned by the creditors and it is proved beyond all doubt." It is clear then that Mr. Ross held that the sale was for valuable consideration and in good faith, it further appears that the question of the sale being for valuable consideration was not seriously contested by the petitioning creditors and it is somewhat curious that the Receiver who must have known less about the matter than the creditors should, subsequently, at the end of three years, have made this application on practically the same grounds. However, although in my opinion the subject-matter of the two applications and the contentions raised and decided are substantially the same in both these applications, the matter is not res judicata. What happened in the case, as I have already said, was that certain creditors filed the application and at the same time asked for the appointment of a Receiver of the debtor's property. An interim Receiver was appointed at once, he took possession of all the properties and after he had done so, Ram Saran filed his application. The application, however, was not filed against the Receiver nor was he made a party to the application which was against the debtors and creditors jointly. The application was successful and, subsequently, the debtors were adjudicated insolvents and a Receiver was appointed in accordance with section 18 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. The interim Receiver handed over the property to this new Receiver and it is this Receiver who has filed this application under section 36. Now, the position of an interim Receiver in an insolvency proceeding is presumbly the same as the position of a Receiver under the Civil Procedure Code and there is no doubt that where a Receiver under the Civil Procedure Code has taken possession of property in a suit, a claim for a portion of that property should be made against the Receiver with the sanction of the Court. Similarly, in this case if it had been desired to bind the interim Receiver it would have been necessary to make him a party to the application, so that even if the Receiver appointed under section 18, had only stepped into the shoes of the interim Receiver he would, in my opinion, be bound by the order which was passed on Ram Saran's application. The Receiver after adjudication, however, does not by any means stand in the shoes of the interim Receiver he stands on a very much higher footing. The property of the judgment-debtor vests in him, he holds it for the benefit of the whole body of the creditors and he has special rights conferred and special duties imposed upon him by the Statute. Amongst other rights conferred upon him, is the right to make an application under section 36 and it seems obvious that this statutory right which has been conferred on him cannot be taken awa by an order in a proceeding to which he was not a party. The contention, therefore, that the matter is res judicata must, in my opinion, fail.

It is next contended that the appellant Ram Saran is entitled to succeed on the merits. It is conceded by the learned Counsel for the appellant that the onus is on his client Ram Saran to show that valuable consideration was paid and that the transaction was in good faith, but he contends that his client has succeeded in establishing this. I shall first deal with the matter of valuable consideration.

The consideration which is alleged by Ram Saran is a sum of Rs. 23,921-11-0 said to have been made up of Rs. 11,921-11-0 an outstanding debt due by the insolvents to Ram Saran, and a further sum of Rs. 12,000 paid in cash of which Rs. 6,000 belonged to Ram Saran himself and Rs. 6,000 was borrowed from one Lachmi Narain Mahton. The learned District Judge, Mr. Dhavle, has accepted the story of the outstanding debt of Rs. 11,921-11-0 due from the debtors to Ram Saran but he has entirely disbelieved the payment of Rs. 12,000 in cash and he further found that even if this statement were to be believed, the value of the timber was at least Rs. 4,000 more than was paid. In proof of payment of Rs. 12,000 in cash, the objector has examined witnesses and has produced certain account books. The witnesses who have been examined to prove the payment of Rs. 12,000 in cash are the objector himself, Ram Saran, and his witnesses Nos. 3, 5, 6 and 7. The witness No. 3 is one Dwarka Chowbey who states that he saw the sum of Rs. 12,000 paid. He is apparently a small Zemindar and a cultivator and the only criticism which can be urged in regard to his evidence is that he looks after cases of Baehoo Mahton, witness No. 6, who apparently has money transaction with Ram Saran. His evidence, however, has been given in a perfectly straightforward manner and it was believed by Mr. Dhavle's predecessor, Mr. Ross. Mr. Dhavle gives no reason for disbelieving his evidence and merely because he looks after cases of a man who has business transactions with Ram Saran I can see no reason to discredit his evidence. The objector's witness No. 5 is Sridhar Singh. He, too, says that he saw the Rs. 12,000 being paid in cash. Here, again, we have a witness whose evidence has been accepted by Mr. Ross and against whom the only criticism can be that he holds 5 bighas of land rent free under Ram Saran on account of collection work which he does for him. Mr. Dhavle gives no reason why the evidence of this witness should not be accepted and, although the fact that he does work for Ram Saran might be a reason for accepting his evidence with caution, his evidence has been given so clearly and so straightforwardly that there seems to be no reason why it should be disbelieved. Objector's witness No. 6 is Basboo Mahton, a large dealer in timber. He says he saw Rs. 12,000 paid, and the only possible ground for not accepting his evidence would be that he had business dealings with Ram Saran. Here we have the evidence of a witness believed by Mr. Ross, but rejected by Mr. Dhavle without giving any reasons. I can see no reason to disbelieve the evidence of this witness who is apparently a respectable man of some substance. The witness No. 7 is Lachmi Narain Marwari, a shopkeeper and Mahajan. He, too, says that he saw the money (Rs. 12,000) paid, and the only circumstance against the acceptance of his evidence is that, in cross-examination, he says that in some case Ram Saran gave evidence for him. This witness was also believed by Mr. Ross and disbelieved by Mr. Dhavle without discussion of his evidence.

So far as the witnesses, then, are concerned, if they are believed, the payment of Rs. 12,000 in cash has been fully established. As I have already said, the evidence was accepted by Mr. Ross but has been discarded by Mr. Dhavle without discussion. He considers the story of the sale improbable and has really decided the case on certain probabilities which I shall now refer to.

There is evidence on the record that, about the time the purchase of the logs was made, there were a number of a bankruptcies in the market and the learned District Judge says:—"In these circumstances, and, knowing that the insolvents were in financial difficulties it is not likely that Ram Saran would have purchased the logs." The matter of bankruptcies in the Bazar was common knowledge and we may take it that Ram Saran knew of it, but there is absolutely no evidence on the record to show that he knew or even suspected that the insolvents were in financial difficulties and in fact one of the witnesses—Receiver's own witness No. 2, a Mahajan, admits that the lady whose affairs he manages advanced Rs. 4,000 to the insolvents on a Hundi after the date of the purchase by Ram Saran. If this is so, there is absolutely no reason why Ram Saran should not, in all good faith, have paid Rs. 12,000 and purchased the logs particularly as the debtors owed him over Rs. 11,000. Before he paid the money he sent his men to Nepal to ascertain whether the logs were really there and, finding that they were, he paid the money. Subsequently, he went and had his name cut on the logs. There is, so far as I can see, nothing suspicious in the circumstances connected with the transaction which could possibly justify the evidence of the witnesses being discarded. I may note that there is no evidence to rebut the evidence of the witnesses who said that they saw the payment of Rs. 12,000.

I now come to the documentary evidence. This consists of the deed of sale and entries in Ram Saran's account-book and also an entry in the account-book of Lachmi Narain Mahton from whom Rs. 6,000 out of Rs. 12,000 was borrowed. The execution of the deed of sale has been proved by the witnesses who proved the cash payment and there is absolutely no doubt that it was really executed. The learned District Judge, however, is of opinion that it has been antedated in order to take advantage of the entry in Lachmi Narain Mahton's account-book which shows a payment of Rs. 6,000 to Ram Saran on the date on which the document is said to have been executed. This is pure speculation, and not only is there no evidence to support the view but the account-books show clearly that the view taken by the learned District Judge is wrong. We have examined Lachmi Narain's account-book very carefully. The book appears to have been kept in the ordinary course of business, the entries show no signs of having been tampered with and the entry with which we are concerned is as follows:—

| Receipts Description. | Amount. | Disbursements. Description. | Amount. |
|---|---|---|---|
| * | * | * | * |
| * | * | * | * |
| | | | Rs. |
| Lachmi Nara-yan Mahton of Darbhanga through self—Rs. six thousand. | Rs. 6,000. | The 2nd Bhado, 1321, purchase of Sakhua timbers through Aghanu Nayak, Haldhar Prasad of Mahalla Sharfuddin Hussain. | |

| | Rs. | | 23,921-11-0 |

Insolvency No. 26-14.

(Sd.) Illegible.

The entry is corroborated by the entry in Ram Saran's account-book which shows a debit of Rs. 6,000 to Ram Saran on the same day. Unless, therefore, the account-book has been tampered with, it very strongly corroborates the evidence of the witnesses that the payment of Rs. 12,000 in cash was made. It has been suggested that, although the entry may not appear to have been tampered with, the whole of the account-book, or a portion of it, has been fabricated for the purpose of this case. Of this, however, there is no sign. It is true that, at the top of the page bearing the entry above noted, the year was put down originally as 1922. The last figure 2 has been cut out and 1 has been substituted, but this has clearly been done because 2 was a mistake which was very rightly corrected. The account-book and the entries then appear to be perfectly genuine, and, together with the oral evidence, they, to my mind, completely prove the objector's case that Rs. 23,921-11-0 was actually paid for the logs and, as I have already said, there is no rebutting evidence.

The next question to be considered is whether Rs. 23,921-11-0 was a fair price for the logs. The rate at which Ram Saran purchased was Re. 1-10-0 a cubic foot, and there is some evidence that the proper price was Re 1-12 0 a cubic foot. Even if we accept that this is so, it can hardly be said that the rate of Re. 1-10-0 is not valuable consideration. Rates fluctuate from day to day and it is impossible to say that a difference of 2 annas a cubic foot would affect the matter of valuable consideration.

I now come to the last question, namely, that of good faith. The Receiver produced witnesses to prove that Ram Saran knew that the debtors were financially embarrassed This evidence consists of statements alleged by the witnesses to have been made by Ram Saran either to them or any other dealer. These, however have never been put to Ram Saran himself and the evidence is worthless. There is, then, no evidence that Ram Saran knew of the debtors being in financial difficulties and Ram Saran, on the other hand, says that he did not know. I have already found that he paid valuable consideration for the logs and there is nothing in the circumstances which would lead to any suspicion that the transaction was not a bona fide one. The transaction, in my opinion, was entered into in perfectly good faith and, as I have already found, it was for valuable consideration. I would accordingly set aside the order of the District Judge and decree this appeal with costs.

In conclusion, I should like to remark that the Receiver appears to have acted wrongly in re-agitating a matter which, although technically it is not res judicata, had been already fully considered and adjudicated on by both the District Judge and the High Court. Such action can hardly be for the benefit of either the creditors or the debtors, and it would, in my opinion, be well for the District Judge to consider the advisability of removing this Receiver and appointing another in his place.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 19—Accounts, suit for—Admission in written statement in another suit that accounts have to be settled, whether acknowledgment.

An admission in a written statement that accounts have to be settled in respect of certain transactions, is an acknowledgment of liability to pay whatever sum is found due in respect of those transactions on accounts being taken, and saves limitation for a suit to recover the balance due in respect of those transactions. [p. 788, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Lyallpur, dated the 6th April 1915.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Bahadur Chand and Ram Chand, Manchanda, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The defendants in this case agreed to supply cotton to the plaintiff and the plaintiff made certain payments by way of advance. He states that defendants did not supply cotton according to the agreement, and he sues for the balance due to him on the account and also for damages. His suit was partly decreed by the first Court. The lower Appellate Court, however, considered that the suit was governed by Article 51 of the Limitation Act, and that as it was not instituted till after the expiry of three years it was time-barred. Against this decision a second appeal has been preferred to this Court.

The last date on which the goods were to have been delivered was the 27th January 1910, and the suit was instituted on the 8th of April 1913. Plaintiff relied on an acknowledgment of the defendants to bring his suit within limitation. This acknowledgment was contained in a jawab-i-dawa, dated the 3rd of June 1910, in reply to another similar suit by the plaintiff. In paragraph 2 of his plaint in that case the plaintiff made reference to other cotton transactions with the defendants for which he stated that he would, if necessary, file a separate suit. In reply thereto, the defendants stated as follows:—"Paragraph No. 2 of the plaint is to this extent correct that we with other partners entered into a contract on the 23rd September 1909 to supply 4,000 maunds of cotton, and in this connection a satta was executed and on account of this contract the defendants have been supplying cotton to the plaintiff and have been taking money from time to time. The accounts have not yet been settled with the plaintiff." It should be mentioned that the present suit is based on a satta executed on the 19th September 1909 for the supply of 4,000 maunds of cotton. There, is thus, an error regarding the date of the execution and this cannot be exactly verified on account of the loss of the satta. It is clear, however, that defendants were referring to the satta on which the present suit is based as it is not alleged that any other satta for 4,000 maunds of cotton was executed in September 1909. We have, therefore, to decide whether the admissions contained in the written statement constitute an acknowledgment falling under section 19 of the Limitation Act.

The lower Appellate Court referred to certain authorities but considered it doubtful whether the mere acknowledgment that a contract had been entered into could raise any inference that the part which was to be performed by the person making that acknowledgment had not been performed. On the authority of the case Andiappa Chetty v. Devarajulu Naidoo (1) it considered that the written statement of the defendants could not be considered as an acknowledgment as the defendants did not appear to have made any admission from which the inference could be drawn that any sum of money was due from them to the plaintiff. Bakhshi Tek Chand for the appellant has contended before us that the judgment of the lower Appellate Court is based upon a misunderstanding of the law, and that the remarks quoted from Andiappa Chetty v. Devarajulu Naidoo (1) have no application to the present suit.

Counsel first referred to the leading authority on this subject, contained in the GHULAM GHOUSE v. JANNIA.

Privy Council judgment reported as Maniram Seth v. Seth Ruxchand (2). In that case the admission of the defendant that, for the last five years, he had open and current accounts with the deceased, but that the alleged indebtedness did not affect his right to apply for Probate, was considered to amount to an acknowledgment that there were unsettled accounts between him and the plaintiff, and that the legal consequences would be that either of them had a right against the other to an account. Counsel also argues correctly that there are numerous other authorities to the same effect, and that, where the existence of an account is admitted, the inevitable deduction must be that the person making such an admission acknowledges his liability to pay his debt, if any debt is found against him. He refers specially to Sukhamoni v. Ishan Chunder Roy (3), Kadri Pakirappa v. Manki Husan Saheb (4), Abdul Ali v. Goldstein (5) and Ebrahim Haji Yakub v. Chunilal (6), in which similar acknowledgments, some even of a more evasive character, were held to be acknowledgments of liability to pay. He finally argues that the facts on which the decision published in Andiappa Chetty v. Devarajulu Naidoo (1) is based are entirely different from those of the present case, and he points out that even in that judgment the learned Judges stated that in a suit for a balance due upon taking accounts, an admission that accounts must be taken and settled would be a pertinent acknowledgment of liability to pay.

Counsel for the respondents cited as authorities in his favour Kalu v. Mehru Mal (7) and Hari Charan v. Brook (8). In both of these cases a statement that liability had existed but had ceased to exist was held not to amount to an acknowledgment of existing liability. On the other hand, it is abundantly clear in the present case from the admission of the defendants in their reply to the plaint that they acknowledged an unsettled account with the plaintiff and an existing liability.

We have no difficulty in agreeing with the contentions of the learned Counsel for the appellant that the admission relied on by him amounts to an acknowledgment of liability to pay, and that the bar of limitation is saved thereby.

We, therefore, accept the appeal and remand the case to the lower Appellate Court for decision of the remaining grounds of appeal. Costs of this Court will be costs in the cause, Court-fee on appeal to be refunded.

Appeal accepted.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 120, 131—Yeomiah allowance, right to receive, whether perpetual—Suit to recover such allowance—Limitation.

The right to receive the yeomiah allowance payable to a mosque is a perpetual, and not a periodically recurring right, and a suit by the Mutwalli of the mosque, in which the plaintiff claims to be perpetually entitled to receive such allowances must be brought within the period prescribed by Article 120 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act. Article 131 of that Schedule has no application to such a suit. [p. 789, col. 1.]

BISSA MAL v. KESAR SINGH.

Mr. R. Kuppusawmy Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. S. Ramabadra Aiyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff who brought the suit for a declaration that he is the Mutawalli of a mosque and is entitled to draw the Yeomiah allowance received by the defendant, a rival claimant, in 1914. It is conceded that, so far as the declaration that he is the Mutawalli is concerned, the suit is barred, but it is alleged that that part of the action which relates to the Yeomiah allowance and which the learned Judge has held to be barred is not in fact barred because it is said that Article 131 of the Limitation Act which relates to suits relating to periodical recurring rights covers this case. It appears to us that that Article is not applicable at all. What the plaintiff claims, apart altogether from the claim for a declaration that he is the Mutawalli, is that he is perpetually entitled to receive all the Yeomiah allowances that ever accrued. It seems to us that that is not a periodical recurring right but a perpetual right. The mere fact that sums of money are paid periodically does not make the right one that periodically recurs. The right is always there, but it is only exercised at such times as the sums fall due. To put an illustration, it seems to us it would be just as reasonable to say that an official entitled to a salary of so many rupees a month can call that a periodical recurring right. We do not agree with that contention at all. We think the distinction is plain. In the one case the right is always vested in one person to receive periodical payments; in the other, the right which at one time is vested in one person, at another time passes away to some body else, which, of course, is a periodically recurring right in the true sense of the term. The distinction is not new. It is found in Eshan Chunder Roy v. Monmohini Dassi (1) and is very clearly pointed out there. The decision in Manavikrama Zamorin Raja Avergal of Calicut v. Achutha Menon (2) which was cited, only establishes this, that if there is inherent in the plaintiff a recurring right, then the same limitation will apply to a consequential claim for the payment of actual money as would apply to the claim if it had been brought for the establishment of the recurring right.

We think that this case can be disposed of on the short ground that this is not a recurring right but a perpetual right, and the learned Judge was quite right in dismissing it as barred by limitation, because, if Article 131 does not apply, the only article that can apply is Article 120.

The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CIVIL MISCELLANEOUS No. 464 OF 1919.
(CIVIL APPEAL No. 2379 OF 1914)
February 20, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Chevis, Acting Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice LeRossignol.

BISSA MAL—PLAINTIFF—PETITIONER
versus
KESAR SINGH AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 3, Sch. I, Art. 168—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 151—Appeal dismissed for default—Application for restoration—Limitation—Appellant ignorant of order—Extension of limitation—Inherent power of Court.

Where an appellant seeks to set aside an ex parte order dismissing his appeal in default, limitation runs from the date of the order and not from the date of his knowledge of the order. The inherent powers of the Court cannot be invoked to enable the Court to break through the provisions of section 3 of the Limitation Act. [p. 790, col. 1.]

Application for restoration of the appeal dismissed in default by the Chief Court on 27th January 1919.

Lala Mehr Chand, for the Petitioner.

Lala Kishan Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal was dismissed for default on 27th January 1919. Application for restoration was put in on 17th November 1919 and was granted "subject to any objections that respondent may have to urge." On behalf of the respondent it is urged that the application for restoration is time barred under Article 168 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act, and that time cannot be extended, as section 5 of the Act is not applicable.

JIVRAJ LAKHAMSI v. TAHKANDAS MOHANDAS.

For appellant it is urged that the case was down for hearing in the weekly cause list for the week beginning 20th January 1919, and that Counsel waited till the evening of the 23rd January, and then, as the case was not reached, concluded that a future date would be fixed and communicated to the parties, and that the fact of the dismissal on 27th January was not discovered for several months.

It is also urged that the Court has inherent power, even, without application, to set aside wrong orders of dismissal, and that there was really no default. Section 151, Civil Procedure Code, is relied on, and Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Habib Shah (1) is quoted. But that ruling only deals with the special case of a man who is dead and so cannot be treated as a defaulter.

Comparing Articles 163 and 168 with Articles 164 and 169, we find that where a plaintiff or appellant seeks to set aside an ex parte order, limitation runs only from date of the order, whereas if a defendant or respondent seeks such relief he can, in cases where he has not had due notice, count limitation from date of his knowledge of the order. The appellant in this case is striving to obtain the benefit which the law allows only to a defendant or respondent. This cannot be allowed.

And we do not consider that section 151, or the inherent powers of the Court, can be invoked to enable us to break the clear provisions of the Limitation Act, see section 3.

We note that the practice is to publish a list of cases decided; if Counsel were to keep their eyes on this list such hard cases as the present would not occur.

We set aside the conditional ex parte order reviving the appeal, and dismiss the application for re-admission of the appeal, but we pass no order as to costs.

Application dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

KEMP, A. J. C.—* * * * * The appellants' last contention is that as respondents say the contract has become impossible of performance they cannot claim to keep it alive so far as the integral and inseparable portion of it which refers to arbitration is concerned. The respondents say that the contract was subject to the condition that the state of affairs existing at its date would continue. In other words, that there would be the ordinary facilities for bringing bales from Calcutta to Karachi. They say, owing to the action of Government in January 1918, due to the war, these facilities no longer existed. Indeed, that goods traffic was absolutely stopped and the state of affairs existing at the date of the contract, therefore, came to an end, and they were discharged from performance of the contract. This is adopting the doctrine laid down in those cases of which Krell v. Henry (1) is an illustration.

Section 56 of the Indian Contract Act refers to impossibilities of performance, whilst the English cases give relief where the performance of the contract, although not absolutely impossible, has nevertheless become so onerous that it would be manifestly inequitable to require it. However, it is unnecessary for this Appeal Court to discuss the limits of that doctrine, or whether it is applicable to the contract in this case. What we are concerned with is, the fact that respondents have pleaded in their written statement in the suit that the contract became void. It appears to me that, since the respondents now repudiate their liability to perform the contract on the ground that it is discharged, they cannot keep alive the arbitration clause of it. It seems to me the case comes within the principle laid down in Jureidini v. National British and Irish Millers Insurance Co. (2), see also Woodall v. Pearl Assurance Co. (3). As the respondents repudiate the contract, they cannot be allowed to insist on the subordinate terms of it still being enforced.

I, therefore, think that the suit should proceed and the stay order should be set aside.

Appeal allowed with costs.

RAYMOND, A. J. C.—* * * The question then arises.—Have defendants elected to avoid the contract altogether with everything contained in it so as to preclude them from insisting on the arbitration clause in the contract? In other words, is it permissible for them to rely upon a subsidiary term in the contract, if they elect to treat the contract as void? If the contract is void, there can, of course, be no reference to arbitration.

Counsel on either side have relied on the same English cases, which undoubtedly are illuminating but the ratio decidendi should be scrutinized carefully. They are Jureidini v. National British and Irish Millers Insurance Co. (2), Stebbing v. Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co. (4), Woodall v. Pearl Assurance Co. (3). In the last case both the previous cases have been referred to and discussed. The action was to recover a sum of money on a policy of insurance against accident. The company denied liability on the policy on the ground that the assured had either misstated his occupation in the proposal or, if not, had changed his occupation for one involving increased risk of which notice, as required, was not given to the company, and contended that the policy was, therefore, void and they required the dispute to be referred to arbitration in accordance with a clause in the policy providing for a reference to arbitration. It was held that the company, by relying on the terms of the policy which rendered it void in certain events, did not thereby repudiate the policy as a binding contract between the parties, and were entitled to rely upon the arbitration clause as a defence to the action. In the case of Stebbing v. Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co. (4) it was held that what the Insurance Company did was not to repudiate the contract altogether, but to deny liability by virtue of some provision in the contract itself and, at the same time, to insist upon having the question whether there was that liability, decided by arbitration. In the case of Jureidini v. National British and Irish Millers Insurance Co. (2) there was a total repudiation of the contract, and the arbitration clause did not extend to differences as to liability under the contract, but only to a difference as to the amount payable under the policy. The contract in the present case distinctly stipulates for the reference to arbitration of "any dispute" with regard to it, therefore, both as to liability, as well as to any amount claimable under it. The impossibility of performance which the defendants pleaded supervened after the contract was made. It is an impossibility which, according to the respondents themselves, is based, not on any written term in the contract itself, but is to be implied herefrom that the gunny bags, the subject-matter of the contract, were to be manufactured in Calcutta, and thence shipped from this place to Karachi. It was, therefore, founded on something outside and independent of, the terms of the written contract. It suits the respondents to say that it was an implied term of the contract, but there is absolutely nothing in the contract to support the implication. In fact, its terms negative it. As I have shown above, the words "Calcutta shipment" have been deliberately scored out of the contract which provides solely for "godown delivery."

(3) (1919) 1 K. B. 593; 88 L. J. K. B. 706; (1919) W. C. & Ins. Rep. 181; 120 L. T. 556; 24 Com. Cas. 237; 83 J. P. 125; 63 S. J. 352.

(4) (1917) 2 K. B. 433; 86 L. J. K. B. 1155; (1917) W. C. & Ins. Rep. 241; 117 L. T. 247; 33 T. L. R. 395.

Respondents now wish to engraft a new term upon it by alleging that the gunny bags were to be manufactured in Calcutta and conveyed from this place to Karachi, can this allegation be considered as a ground of defence arising out of the contract in itself? In Stebbing v. Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co. (4) and Woodall v. Pearl Assurance Co. (3) the avoidance of the policy was on grounds arising out of the terms of the policy itself. In the present case the avoidance of the contract does not arise out of the terms of the contract itself. Respondents virtually give the go-by to the parties' written contract: they say the implied agreement between them to convey the goods from Calcutta became impossible of performance owing to Government requisition of the rolling stock and freight. This plea is obviously one extraneous to the written contract between the parties which contains the reference clause to arbitration. The difference between Jureidini's case (2) and the other two English cases is that, whereas in the former case, the contrast was altogether repudiated; in the latter, a clause in the policy itself was relied upon in avoidance of it. In the present case defendants do not and cannot rely on any term in the contract, which justifies them to have the contract declared void. The repudiation of their liability under the contract is not based on any terms in the contract. It is true, that the impossibility of performance is pleaded as a defence to the action, but this impossibility is based on grounds outside the written contract. If the defendants' contention that there was an agreement between the parties that the gunny bags were to be manufactured and shipped from Calcutta is true, and circumstances rendered the delivery impossible, then this is tantamount to a repudiation of the written contract and goes to the root of it. And, hence, the decision in Jureidini's case (2) becomes quite applicable that the repudiation of a claim on a ground going to the root of the contract precludes the party repudiating from pleading the arbitration clause as a bar to an action to enforce the claim. The respondents, therefore, having sought to avoid the whole contract, cannot be permitted to reply upon a subsidiary term in the contract, and demand a reference to arbitration; according to them, the whole contract is void, and they, therefore, cannot invoke the aid of the arbitration clause.

Mr. Elphinston argued that, even if defendants failed to have the arbitration clause in the contract put into force by reason of the repudiation of the contract, yet, as both the appellants and respondents are members of the Gunny Bags Merchants Association, they are bound by its rules, and the rules provide that, whenever there is a dispute between the members, they must be referred to abitration (rule 20).

But to discuss this point on appeal would be to go outside the pleadings, it was not a point argued in the lower Court, not was it made one of the grounds for a stay of the suit. It is, therefore, now too late to invite us to consider the question whether, independently of the contract, plaintiffs are not bound to go to arbitration by virtue of the rules of the Association. The point was also taken up by Mr. Elphinston only in his arguments in reply.

In connection with this point, I may further add, that if the contract is void by reason of impossibility of performance, then a void contract cannot be referred to arbitration. If the main contract is void, then the collateral contract to refer to arbitration is equally so. The Court would, at least, have to take prima facie evidence to ascertain if there is any substance in the defendants' allegations. And it would only direct a reference to arbitration in the event of its being satisfied that there was a valid subsisting contract. I mention this point as being one that may be taken into consideration with the other reasons that I shall subsequently advert to whether the case is a fit one to be referred to arbitration.

JAINAN v. NUR MUHAMMAD.

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 2474 OF 1915.

Present:—Mr. Justice Chevis, Acting Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Le Rossignol.

Musammat JAINAN—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

NUR MUHAMMAD AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Custom—Succession—Daughter versus Collaterals—Acquired property, what is.

Daughters are generally preferred to collaterals in regard to the acquired property of their father, and by acquired property is meant property not necessarily acquired by the father himself but property acquired by him or any of his ascendants short of the common ancestor. [p. 793, cols. 1 & 2.]

The agnatic theory reposes on the principle that collaterals descended from the common ancestor derive their title from that common ancestor, but when the common ancestor had no interest in the property in dispute his descendants derive from him no more right than he had, i. e., they acquire no right. [p. 793, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Ludhiana, dated the 13th July 1915, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Ludhiana, dated the 13th April 1915.

Messrs. Nanak Chand and Muhammad Rafi, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Fazl-i-Hussain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit by a daughter for possession of immoveable property left by her father. The defendants are remote collaterals and the District Judge has dismissed the suit on the ground that, though the common ancestor of the parties did not hold the property, it was not acquired by the plaintiff's father but by his father or grandfather and, consequently, plaintiff who would have been entitled to property acquired by her father himself, is not shown to be entitled to property he inherited from his ascendants.

In Rattigan's Digest, section 23 (2), we find that daughters are generally preferred to collaterals in regard to the acquired property of their father, and on examining the authorities cited, under Remark 2 to that section, we find that no distinction is made between property acquired by the father and property acquired by his ascendants.

By acquired property is meant property not necessarily acquired by the father himself but property acquired by him or any of his ascendants short of the common ancestor. Thus in Lokha v. Hari (1), Musammat Ichhri v. Jowahra (2), Sham Ram v. Musammat Hemi Bai (3), Khuda Yar v. Sultan (4), Nidhu v. Ram Singh (5), Partap Singh v. Musammat Panjabu (6), the property was styled acquired property of the father though the acquisition had been in fact effected by an ancestor of the father.

The agnatic theory reposes on the principle that collaterals, descended from the common ancestor, derive their title from that common ancestor, but when the common ancestor had no interest in the property in dispute his descendants derive from him no more right than he had, i.e., they acquire no right.

In this case, consequently, the collaterals derive no right to this property from the common ancestor and, in accordance with custom, are not to be preferred to a daughter of the last male owner.

The next question is, whether the plaintiff is to get her share only, or also those of her sister Musammat Muqabar and her niece Musammat Mariam.

The last mentioned was not made a party to the suit and was not referred to at all by the defendants except in their grounds of appeal to the first Appellate Court, and it is doubtful whether she is an heir at all in the presence of Musammat Jainan and Musammat Muqabar, her aunts. In any case, that is a matter for her to settle with Musammat Jainan.

As for Musammat Muqabar, Musammat Jainan alleged a surrender to her by Musammat Muqabar and Musammat Muqabar, though arrayed as a defendant, did not defend the suit.

In these circumstances, we hold that Musammat Jainan is entitled to the whole

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 182 (5)—Application to execute decree against surety, whether step-in-aid of execution against principal.

An application asking the proper Court to execute a decree by arresting a surety who has made himself liable for the satisfaction of the decree, is an application to take a step-in-aid of execution as against the principal-debtor and operates to save limitation under clause (5) of Article 182 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act. [p 796, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Agra, dated the 10th July 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. Narain Prasad Asthana, for the Appellants.

Mr. Zahur Ahmed, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal by the decree-holder in an execution matter, and it raises a question of limitation which, so far as we are aware, is not definitely covered by any published ruling. The decree was passed against three persons jointly and severally; but we are at present concerned only with the question whether that decree is still capable of execution against the first judgment-debtor, Muhammad Ibrahim. We do not know precisely on what grounds the execution Court has come to the conclusion that it is not capable of execution against the other two judgment-debtors, but that matter is not before us. The decree was dated the 1st of February 1913. There was an appeal against it, and the appellate decree bears date the 11th of June 1913. On second appeal the decree was confirmed by this Court under date May the 30th, 1914. While the first appeal was pending, a proceeding in execution had been taken with which we are not now concerned. In the interval between the decision of the lower Appellate Court and that of this Court, namely, on the 23rd of January 1914, the decree-holders applied for the realisation of the entire decree by the arrest of Muhammad Ibrahim. It would seem that he was, in fact, arrested and brought before the Court, although this point is not absolutely material. At any rate, he continued to represent to the Court that he desired the execution proceedings to be stayed pending the result of the second appeal to this Court. This application was allowed on condition that security was furnished. Two persons, Muhammad Husain and Badaruddin, executed a security-bond on the 23rd of January 1914. According to its terms they made themselves jointly and severally liable for two distinct things. They bound themselves in a sum of money equivalent to the amount of the decree as it then stood, to produce Muhammad Ibrahim in Court, if required to do so. They also bound themselves to satisfy the entire decree as it might stand after the decision of the second appeal by this Court, in the event of Muhammad Ibrahim failing to do so. Admittedly, no further proceedings in execution were taken against Muhammad Ibrahim personally until the 6th of March 1918, when the application was made with which we are now concerned. Admittedly, also, this application is barred under Article 182 of the first Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act (No. IX of 1908), unless the decree-holders are entitled to the benefit of clause 5 of the said Article. According to this clause, a fresh period of limitation would begin to run from the date on which any application was made in accordance with law to the proper Court to take some step in aid of the execution of the decree. In the months of February and March 1915 the decree-holders did present certain applications to the Court, whereby they sought to realise the full amount of the decree, under the terms of the security-bond, from Muhammad Husain, the first of the two sureties. We are really concerned with one of these applications only, but its effect cannot be precisely understood unless it be considered in connection with what had gone just before. We find that, on February 16th, 1915, the decree holders presented a formal and regular application for execution of the decree. They mentioned the fact that Muhammad Ibrahim, one of the joint judgment-debtors, had given security for the satisfaction of the entire decree and they asked the Court, with reference to the provisions of section 145 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to realise the entire amount of the decree from the first of the two sureties, namely, Muhammad Husain, by the arrest of his person. The execution Court, rightly or wrongly, held that Muhammad Husain was entitled, first, to an opportunity of producing the judgment-debtor, Muhammad Ibrahim, before the Court, and passed an order to that effect. On the 19th March 1915 the decree-holders presented a further application, not drawn up on any prescribed form, but obviously referring back to the application of 16th February 1915. Herein they mentioned the fact that Muhammad Ibrahim had, in the meantime, got into trouble with the Criminal Courts and been sentenced to a long period of imprisonment. Although the application does not say so in express terms, the decree-holders obviously intended to represent that, in consequence of this fact, it was impossible for the surety, Muhammad Husain, to produce Muhammad Ibrahim before the Court; perhaps, also, by implication, they desired to suggest that no purpose would now be served by their attempting to realise the decree by the arrest of Muhammad Ibrahim's person. They, therefore, prayed the Court, referring back to the application of 16th February 1915, on which no final order had yet been passed, to direct the arrest of Muhammad Husain. That prayer is in itself an impossible one, except the application to be considered as being in continuation of the previous application of 16th February 1915. The prayer in that application had been for the realisation of the entire decree by the arrest of Muhammad Husain's person and, obviously, it was only by way of execution of the decree that the decree holders could ask for Muhammad Husain's arrest at all. We are not concerned with the subsequant fate of this application, except that it proved infructuous and was finally dismissed on the 15th of September 1915. We are now dealing with an application made within three years of the 19th of March 1915, and the question for determination is, whether the application of that date, for the realisation of the entire decree by the arrest of one of the two persons who had stood surety for Muhammad Ibrahim's satisfaction of the entire decree, is or is not to be regarded as an application to the execution Court to take a step-in-aid of execution as against Muhammad Ibrahim. The first Court was of opinion that the case was clearly covered by the provisions of clause 5, to which we have referred, and it allowed the application. The lower Appellate Court remarked, in effect, that the question is a difficult one and that no authority had been laid before it except a decision of the Bombay High Court in the case of Narayan Ganpatbhat Agsal v. Timmaya (1). To begin with, that was a case decided under section 253 of the former Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882) and the proceedings sought to be taken were against a surety who had rendered himself liable before the passing of the decree for the due performance of the same. There had been a number of applications to execute the decree against the judgment-debtor but, more than three years after the passing of the decree, an application was made, for the first time, to execute the same against the surety. The Court held that the decree could not be said to have been passed jointly against the decree holder and his surety, and that, consequently, the applications made against the principal judgment-debtor did not save limitation against the surety. It is clear enough that the precise point decided in this case was not the one now before us. The lower Appellate Court, however, has remarked that, in the absence of any better authority, it felt itself bound to follow the principle which seemed to underlie this decision and, on this view of the case, it has dismissed the application for execution, dated the 6th of March 1918, as barred by limitation.

In considering this matter we have to look at the provisions of section 145 of the Code of Civil Procedure, before we come to consider those of Article 182 of the Indian Limitation Act. The Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908) gave, for the first time, a summary remedy by way of execution against a surety who had bound himself for the due satisfaction of a decree after the decree was passed. The case of such a surety does not seem to be covered by any part of Explanation 1 to Article 182 of the First Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act. It would be obviously absurd to say that the decree in execution now before us distinguished portions of the subject matter as payable respectively by Muhammad Ibrahim and by his surety Muhammad Husain. It is equally incorrect to say that the decree had been passed jointly against Mohammad Ibrahim and Muhammad Husain. The decree itself affects Muhammad Ibrahim, but Muhammad Husain has become liable to be proceeded against in execution by reason of the special provisions of section 145 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In our opinion, therefore, we are dealing with a case not contemplated by Explanation 1 to Article 182 of the First Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act. We are driven back, therefore, to clause 5, and we can only put to ourselves the plain question :—Does an application, asking the proper Court to execute the entire decree by the arrest of the person of a surety who has made himself liable for the satisfaction of the decree, amount to asking the execution Court to take a step-in-aid of the execution of the decree as against the principal whose liability the surety had taken upon himself? In the absence of authority to the contrary, the conclusion we have come to is that this question should be answered in the affirmative, and that the decree holders are in this case entitled to the benefit of clause 5 of the Article. The result is that we allow the appeal, set aside the order of the lower Appellate Court and send the case back to the Court of first instance with directions to proceed with the execution in accordance with law and with the decree-holders' application of 6th March 1918. The decree-holders will be entitled to their costs of this proceeding in all three Courts including, in this Court, fees on the higher scale.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Temporary Subordinate Judge, Guntur, in Appeal Suit No. 60 of 1916, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Additional District Munsif, Tenali, in Original Suit No. 18 of 1915.

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—There are two questions raised in this second appeal filed by the plaintiff, the respondents being the 1st defendant and his sons (the defendants Nos. 3 and 4). The suit was brought on a promissory note executed by the 1st defendant. The first of the two questions is, whether the plaintiff has a right to appropriate several payments made by 1st defendant (without specific directions) in full satisfaction of the interest due to the plaintiff on the pro-note till the respective dates of payment and the balance, as far as would go towards the principal amount, or whether plaintiff ought to treat whatever was paid as paid wholly towards the principal and allow counter-interest on the whole of the amount of each payment without deducting therefrom the interest due till the date thereof. I think the lower Courts were wrong in deciding in favour of the second alternative. The cases in Luchmeswar Singh Bahadur v. Syud Lutf Ali Khan (1), Bamundoss Mookerjee v. Omeish Chunder Raes (2), Kripasindhu Sahu v. Raja of Kallikota (3), and Second Appeal No. 143 of 1916 (the two latter being decisions of this Court), clearly lay down the rule in support of the first alternative, I would, therefore, decide this question in favour of the appellant. The decisions of the lower Courts will be modified by calculating the amount due in accordance with the above observations.

The second question is, whether, on the facts found by the lower Courts, they were justified in finding that the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 had discharged the burden of proving that the money borrowed under Exhibit B was spent for illegal or immoral purposes. The lower Appellate Court says: "In this case, I must say that defendants Nos. 3 and 4 have not succeeded in proving which specific part of the consideration for Exhibit B was spent for immoral purposes." I think that this means that no portion of the consideration has been directly connected by the evidence with any expenditure for immoral purposes. Notwithstanding this observation, the ultimate conclusion of the lower Appellate Court is that, because the 1st defendant's "life" was "vaild and immoral," because he was not engaged in any trade or business and because his lands yielded sufficient income, the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 have discharged the burden of proving that the money borrowed under Exhibit B was spent on immoral purposes. I think that this is opposed to the decision of the Privy Council in Sri Narain v. Lala Raghubans Rai (4), in an Allahabad case, the High Court of Allahabad having long held the same view [see Hanuman Singh v. Nanak Chand(5), Kishan Lal v. Garuruddhwaja Prasad Singh (6) and Babu Singh v. Behari Lal (7), see also Sadashiv Dinkar Joshi v. Dinkar Narayan Joshi (8), Chintamanrav Mehendale v. Kashinath (9) and Hazarimall Babu v. Abani Nath (10)]. The lower Appellate Court relies on a Punjab Chief Court decision reported in Ram Nath v. Bulaqi Ram (11) which, no doubt, supports view of the law; but I am unable to follow it in preference to the decisions of the Privy Council and of this High Court and the High Courts above referred to.

The lower Courts' decree have, therefore, to be further modified by making the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 liable along with the 1st defendant to the extent of the ancestral family properties, the 1st defendant, of course, being also personally liable.

Having regard to all the circumstances, I would order that the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 do bear their own costs throughout, and that the plaintiff do bear his own costs here and in the lower Appellate Court. The award of costs to the plaintiff in the Munsif's Court against the 1st defendant will stand.

SPENCER, J.—I think the decision in Bhagat Mal Sahu v. Abdul Karim (12) correctly sums up the settled law on the subject of the immoral debts, when it lays down that, "in some way by reasonable legal proof it must be shown that there is a connection between the debt and the immoral purpose."

In this case that condition does not seem to be satisfied by mere proof that 1st defendant was leading an immoral life, coupled with the negative evidence that the income of his estate was sufficient for the family needs and that there was no trade or business necessitating borrowing of loans.

The finding of both the lower Courts that defendants Nos. 3 and 4 had discharged the onus that lay upon them is, thus, not a finding which can be justified upon the facts which have been found from the evidence to exist.

Although I am reluctant to interfere with what is, on its face, a finding of fact, especially where the lower Courts have had in their minds the principles governing the question to be decided, I think that they have gone too far in holding that the onus was discharged when the materials before them do not establish any direct connection, between the suit debt and the 1st defendant's immorality, and there is nothing more tangible than a mere surmise to connect the debt with the immorality. Defendants Nos. 3 and 4 should have proved that, at least, some part of the consideration for Exhibit B was spent for immoral purposes. The case in Ram Nath v. Bulaqi Ram (11), followed by the Subordinate Judge, itself enunciates the principle that there must be clear connection between the immoral life and the debts contracted; though, in applying that principle, the learned Judges have considerably widened it by assuming that every debt contracted at a time when the debtor was living a riotous life must necessarily have been devoted to immoral purposes.

I, therefore, agree with my learned brother in allowing the second appeal on this point and upon the question of interest also as to which I have nothing to add to what he has said.

Arbitration Act (IX of 1899), s. 19—Arbitration clause, applicability of—Cross-contracts, suit on—Reference to arbitration, whether can be claimed.

The arbitration clauses of a contract are only applicable where delivery of goods purports to be the object of the contract on the face of it. They do not apply where the intention of the parties, by making cross-contracts, is to determine the amount payable by one to the other. In a suit, therefore, upon a cross-contract the defendant is not entitled to a stay order pending a reference to arbitration.

Appeal from the order of Mr. Kincaid, Additional Judicial Commissioner, Sind.

JUDGMENT.

KEMP, A. J. C.—This is one of some twenty appeals which have been filed in the Court against the order of the learned Judicial Commissioner staying the suit in each case under section 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act, IX of 1899.

One of these Appeals (No. 10 of 1919*) was selected for argument as a test appeal and this Court has given its decision on it and set aside the stay order on the ground that the defendant in that case having pleaded that the contract sued upon became impossible of performance, he could not, in the same breath, ask for the enforcement of the arbitration clause in the contracts. In the present appeal the defendants also plead impossibility of performance in their written statement filed in the suit. Therefore, the reason given in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 10 of 1919, for setting aside the stay order in that case, apply with equal force in the present appeal and it is unnecessary to repeat them. It is sufficient for us to say we incorporate them in our judgment in the present appeal. The impossibility pleaded is the same as was pleaded in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 10 of 1919, viz., that owing to the shortage of gunnies in Karachi, due to the action of Government in January 1918 in stopping all goods traffic on the North-Western Railway, and in requisitioning all steamers at Calcutta where these gunnies are manufactured, the sellers were unable to carry out their contracts of sale "Khare Khata" godown delivery with their buyers. In other words, that the parties assumed, when they made the contract, that a particular state of affairs would continue, and that state of affairs has come to an end and contract is, therefore, discharged. Whether there is anything in this contention, when the contract was not for shipment goods, it is unnecessary for us to decide. We are only concerned with the fact that this impossibility is pleaded and this plea repudiates the contract and, with the contract, the clause in it for arbitration. This plea goes to all the contracts of sale and purchase in the suit which is one on cross-contracts for 150 bales of gunnies.

For the reasons given in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 10 of 1919, this appeal also must succeed.

But there is another reason why this particular appeal should succeed. The suit No. (1085 of 1918) is on cross-contracts for the sale and purchase of 150 bales February-April 1918 delivery in equal lots. The first two contracts of purchase by the plaintiff on 30th August 1917 and 26th September 1917 for 30 bales each were followed by a contract of sale by plaintiff to defendant on 8th November 1917 of 60 bales. On 29th November 1917 plaintiff sold again 30 bales and on 8th December 1917 bought 90 bales. This left 60 bales over bought by plaintiff and this was equalised by a contract of sale by plaintiff on 20th January 1918 for 60 bales.

Now, it is a question of fact in every case whether, when parties follow a contract of sale with a contract of purchase for the same kind of goods and for the same delivery and on the same terms except as to price, they intend the second contract to be independent of the first, or to fix the liability on the first. If they intend the second contract to determine the amount due by one party to the other under the first contract, the liability under the first contract is settled. In substitution of a liability to tender goods the seller of goods in a rising market, by making a cross contract, not only ascertained his liability before the due date but also undertakes an obligation to pay a sum of money. If, therefore, the 2nd contract is intended to be a cross-contract, the object of it is to fix and ascertain the liability. Now, how can it be said that the terms, on the form of the Karachi New Gunny Merchants Association, which are intended to contemplate a delivery of goods, can possibly apply to an agreement by which for the liability to supply goods is substituted the obligation to pay a sum of money. If the intention of the parties is, that the second contract shall be a cross-contract for the purpose of determining what one party shall pay to the other on the due date that is an extinction of the rights and liabilities under the first contract. With great respect, I cannot agree with the decision of Rankin, J., in Uttam Chand Saligram v. Mahmood Jewa Mamooji (1) to the effect that the arbitration clause is still alive in spite of the settlement or cross-contract. Such a conclusion appears to me in conflict with the view taken as to these cross-contracts by Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., in Bhagwandas Narotamdas v. Kanji Deoji (2) where he speaks of cross contract as cancelling the earlier contracts. I have pointed out the arbitration clauses are only applicable where delivery of goods purports to be the object of the contract on the face of it.

They do not apply where the intention of the parties, by making the cross-contract, is to determine the amount payable by one to the other. I can imagine the dismay of a merchant who, having ascertained his profit or loss by a cross contract and possibly entered into other transactions on the strength of that knowledge, is suddenly informed by the other contracting party on the due date that the liability on the ascertained amount is still disputed and must go to arbitration.

Whether the second contract is a cross-contract to fix the liability or not is a matter of evidence. The practice of Indian merchants is to keep "Soda Khatas" in their books of particular merchants with whom they enter into forward contracts. The "Soda Khatas" of any particular merchant may contain many transactions some of which may be cross-contracts and others not. If any of the contracts are independent contracts not covered by the cross-contracts, they are performable by a tender on the due date of the excess of bags bought or sold. I do not say that, where the contracts are not intended to be cross-contracts the arbitration clauses are cancelled. Those clauses would operate in the case of any contract or of any number of contracts entered into on account and in respect of which the liability had not been already settled. There are marks which indicate whether a contract is a cross contract or not. Evidence to the effect that the same broker effected both the contract and the alleged cross-contract, that both were for the same number of bales of the same delivery, the entries of contract and cross-contracts with cross references to their numbers in the books of the merchants and the brokers, the accounts submitted and the correspondence between the parties, are all factors for consideration in deciding whether the later contract is a cross-contract to the earlier or not.

Equally clear is it that, where two merchants have agreed to keep a "Soda Khata" of their transactions, neither of them can be allowed to pick out any one contract of purchase and set it off against a particular contract of sale and sue for the difference. It would be otherwise where there is no account agreed upon between them and either party seeks to sue on a contract and it is cross-contract.

Finally, I may add, that every merchant knows from his "Soda Khata i" the state of his forward transactions with any other merchant. He does not enter haphazard into forward contracts, but pays refund to the state of the different "Soda Khatas" of the various merchants in his "Vahi." He may level transactions up with a particular merchant by entering into a further 'Soda' with him, or he may decide to cut his losses, or fix his profits, before the due date if he is nervous of the state of the market or the financial conditions of the party contracting with him.

I mention this, because it has been contended before us that merchants enter into forward contracts of purchase and sale with one another without any intention of fixing their liabilities until the due date when all that results from these purchases and sales is that delivery need only be offered of the excess of bales sold. This gives the complete go by to the notion of a cross-contract which is to fix for the due date the amount that is payable by one person to the other.

The fact that a cross-contract is entered on the same printed form as the earlier contract is of no importance whatever; merchants here, without exception, jot down the terms of the cross-contract on the printed form applicable to forward delivery with no other intention than that the second or cross contract is to be a settlement of liabilities under the first or earlier contract. They are, unfortunately, notoriously careless in this respect and never contemplate the fact that their acts will furnish lawyers with an argument that the intention was to keep alive the arbitration clauses in both contracts.

Indeed, in some commodities, e.g., Sindh Cotton, an Indian merchant will settle his contract outstanding on the due date by a cross-contract on the usual printed form for all forward contracts and bearing the due date; or he will jot down on a printed form applicable to shipment goods a contract for the purchase of goods in the bazar without even striking out the printed terms applicable to goods to be shipped.

It appears that the contention that no arbitration clause survived in the case of cross-contracts was not argued before the learned Judicial Commissioner, as in the test stay application before him the plaintiff in the suit was not suing on cross contracts. As the other applications were made to depend on the result of the test stay application this point was not raised. Nevertheless, the plaintiff in this case has sued on cross-contracts, and, if the contracts were cross-contracts, we are of opinion there is no arbitration clause now in existence; whether the contracts were cross-contracts or not is for the Court below to decide. There can be no arbitration if the Court decides that question in the affirmative. We, therefore, think on this ground also the stay order should be set aside.

Appeal allowed. Stay order set aside with costs.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 58, 68—Mortgage-deed—Mode of proof—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 59, effect of, on Evidence Act—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VIII, r. 5—Discretion—Appellate Court, duty of—Pleadings—Plaint, allegation in, not denied, effect of—"Attested" document, meaning of.

In order to prove that a document, which purports to be attested by two witnesses, creates a charge on immoveable property, which it purports to create, it is sufficient, under section 68 of the Evidence Act, if one attesting witness, if there be one alive and within the jurisdiction of the Court, is called for the purpose of proving execution. But, this evidence may be rebutted by proof on the other side that the other witness who attested the document did not really see its execution. [p. 804, col. 2.]

Section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act which deals with the validity of a document of the nature mentioned therein cannot be interpreted as providing the mode of proof of execution of such a document in derogation of the requirements of the Evidence Act. [p. 805, col. 1.]

Where, in the exercise of its discretion under the proviso to section 58 of the Evidence Act, and rule 5, Order VIII of the Civil Procedure Code, an Appellate Court requires clearer proof of attestation of a document, it is the duty of the Court to call for such proof, and not to decide that the document has not been proved, merely because the plaintiff did not examine all the attesting witnesses. [p. 806, cols. 1 & 2.]

An allegation of fact in a plaint which is not denied specifically or by necessary implication by the defendant, must be deemed to have been admitted by him [p. 802, col. 2; p. 803, col. 1.]

An "attested" document means a document whose execution by the executant has been actually seen by the apparent testator. [p. 803, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Ramnad at Madura, in Appeal Suit No. 40 of 1918, (Appeal Suit No. 315 of 1918 on the file of the District Court, Ramnad), preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Sattur, in Original Suit No. 254 of 1919,

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. N. R. K. Thathachariar (with him Mr. P. R. Srinivasan), for the Appellants:—The lower Court erred in holding that the mortgage document was not properly proved and, therefore, did not create a charge on the property. It has misunderstood the scope of section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act and section 68 of the Evidence Act. The latter deals with both the mode and quantum of proof. It declares that proof by one attestor, if he is alive, is sufficient. Section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act prescribes the conditions which will make a mortgage a valid document. It is nowhere laid down that all the attesting witnesses should prove execution or that the attestors called should state that the other attestors witnessed execution. It would be hopeless to prove several old mortgages if such strict proof is exacted. See Shib Dayal v. Sheo Ghulam (1). In any event, the lower Appellate Court exercised a wrong discretion in treating the mortgage as invalid even against the ex parte defendants.

Mr. K. V. Sesha Aiyangar, for Respondent No. 3:—It is true that section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act does not deal with the quantum of proof but, nevertheless, when it requires two attestors to a mortgagee, both of them must be called to prove its execution. Or there must be some proof that the attestor not called saw the execution of the document by the mortgagor. Section 68 of the Evidence Act is controlled by, and should be read subject to, the provisions of section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act. See Muniappa Chettiar v. Vellachamy Mannadi (2), Shamu Patter v. Abdul Kadir Rowthan (3), Ganga Pershad Singh v. Ishri Pershad Singh (4) and Arumugham Chetty v. Muthu Koundan (5). There is a marked distinction between proof of a document and validity of a document which has been overlooked in Shib Dayal v. Sheo Ghulam (1), See Param Hans v. Randhir Singh (6), where the absence of proof that the second attestor signed was held to invalidate the document.

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The plaintiffs Nos. 1, 4 and 5 are the appellants mentioned in the memorandum of second appeal preferred to this Court. As it appeared that the 3rd plaintiff's name was left out by an oversight of the appellant's learned Vakil, we allowed the memorandum of second appeal to be amended by adding the 3rd plaintiff's name also as an appellant.

The suit was brought upon a hypothecation bond executed by the 1st defendant in August 1912. Four items of property were hypothecated out of which item No. 2 was afterwards sold by the 1st defendant to the 2nd defendant. The 2nd defendant then hypothecated it to the 3rd defendant. Defendants Nos. 2 and 3 remained ex parte both in the Court of 1st instance and in the lower Appellate Court. The 1st defendant in his written statement described the plaint bond as 'the suit mortgage-debt bond'. The plaintiffs in their plaint claimed a charge on the properties and sued for sale on the basis of that charge. If the 1st defendant had intended to plead that the document did not create a charge owing to its alleged invalidity as a mortgage, he ought to have raised that plea expressly in his written statement. Under Order VIII, rule 5, Civil Procedure Code, 'every allegation of fact in the plaint, if not denied specifically or by necessary implication or stated to be not admitted in the pleadings of the defendant, shall be taken to be admitted except as against a person who is under a disability.' The allegation of fact in the plaint that the mortgage-bond gave the plaintiffs a right to bring the properties to sale as creating a charge on the property, not having been denied specifically or by necessary implication must be deemed to have been admitted by the 1st defendant. The lower Appellate Court, therefore, used its discretion wrongly in requiring proof, or rather in taking the validity of the document as a mortgage as not proved on the evidence on record even as against the 1st defendant. Of course, under the proviso to Order VIII, rule 5 "the Court may, in its discretion, require any facts so admitted to be proved otherwise than by such admission. But that discretion should usually be exercised by the Court of first instance and would be exercised properly in cases where the Court of first instance suspects on prima facie grounds that the admission was made collusively or in order to evade a rule of public policy. However, I shall, for the purposes of the decision of this case, even assume that the 1st defendant did not admit the validity of the document as a mortgage.

As regards defendants Nos. 2 and 3, they were ex parte (as I said) in both the Courts below and had not appealed against the decree of the Court of first instance directing item No. 2 also (that property in which alone they were interested) to be sold for the mortgage-amount and I think that the lower Appellate Court again used its discretion (under Order XLI, rule 33) in a wrong manner in interfering with the District Munsif's decree, so far as it affected the ex parte defendants Nos. 2 and 3, on a mere technical ground. However, I shall again assume that its discretion in this matter also was not exercised improperly. Even then, it seems that the lower Appellate Court should have given the plaintiffs an opportunity to fill up the alleged gaps in the evidence which were not at all considered material by the first Court and should, in the language of the proviso to Order VIII, rule 5, have 'required evidence' of the facts which it considered not proved before finding them against the present appellants. But it is unnecessary to deal with this point also further.

The only remaining short question is, whether the mortgage-deed has been proved to create a valid charge (having regard to section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act) on the evidence actually adduced in this case and not disbelieved by the lower Appellate Court. Section 59 requires that a mortgage, securing a principal amount which is Rs. 100 or upwards, should be created by a registered instrument signed by the mortgagor and attested by at least two witnesses. It has been now settled that 'an attested' document means a document whose execution by the executant has been actually seen by the apparent attestor. See Shamu Patter v. Abdul Kadir Rowthan (3).

The next point for consideration is, 'How is a document which purports to be attested by two witnesses to be proved in order that it may be accepted by the Court to be a valid mortgage document, such a document being required by law to be attested by two witnesses?' For this purpose we have to look into the Evidence Act, where sections 68 and 69 contain provisions as to the mode of proof of 'a document which is required by law to be attested,' a mortgage document for Rs. 100 or upwards being such a document. Section 68 says: "If a document is required by law to be attested, it shall not be used as evidence until one attesting witness at least has been called for the purpose of proving its execution, if there be an attesting witness alive and subject to the process of the Court and capable of giving evidence." I think the implication from the language of the section is that, if one attesting witness has been called, (if there be an attesting witness alive etc.,) then the document can be accepted by the Court (of course if it believes his evidence) as evidencing a mortgage-transaction as the necessary evidence insisted upon by section 68, Evidence Act, of a document required by law to be attested has been given. In other words, the document can, on the evidence, be treated by the Court as having created the charge on immoveable property which it purports to create. Section 68 requires only that one attesting witness (if alive) should be called for the purpose of proving execution subject, of course, to the condition that that witness is subject to the process of the Court and capable of giving evidence. The lower Appellate Court, however, held that either two attesting witnesses should be called when two are alive and that, even assuming that one only need be called, he should, at least, be made to prove that another (or the other) attesting witness besides himself also saw the execution. Hence it held that the plaint document was not properly proved as a mortgage document as one only of the attesting witnesses was called and he merely proved its execution by the 1st defendant and the attestation by himself (that witness) and he was not asked about any other attestor having seen the execution (I might add here that the lower Appellate Court in its very technical handling of the case even refused to allow an application for review filed by the plaintiffs.)

Mr. Sesha Aiyangar for the respondent, 3rd defendant (the 1st defendant who contested the suit in the two lower Courts remaining ex parte here and the 3rd defendant who was ex parte in the Courts below now taking advantage of the lower Appellate Court's decision to appear before us in order to support it) contends that, though that section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act does not deal with the quantum or mode of proof, we must assume that it not only requires that a mortgage document (for Rs. 100 or more) should be attested by two witnesses but that the mortgagee suing on it should call two witnesses, if alive, to prove the document or should make the one witness (called) to prove its attestation by another also. No doubt, there are English and American Statutes which contain such strict provisions about the mode of proof also (by calling, at least, two witnesses) of documents required to be attested by two or more witnesses. I do not see, however, why we should make section 59 stricter than it is and add words to the section (after the words 'two witnesses') such as two of whom at least shall, if alive, be called to prove the instrument or one of whom at least shall be called to prove that the instrument was not only attested by himself but attested by another attestor.' The fact that the Evidence Act is 10 years older than the Transfer of Property Act has no relevency in the consideration of this question. I might add that section 69 of the Evidence Act says that, if no such attesting witness can be found, proof that the attestation of one attesting witness at least is in the handwriting of that witness and that the signature of the person executing the document is in the handwriting of that person is proof which might be accepted as sufficient by the Court. If section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act is interpreted, as we are invited to interpret it, as adding another requisite, (even in the circumstances contemplated by section 69 of the Evidence Act, that is, even where no attesting witness is alive or could be found) namely, direct proof that two attesting witnesses saw the execution, it would be practically impossible in most such cases to adduce evidence of third persons about attestation by two witnesses and many old mortgage transactions could never be proved at all as such documents, say about 28 years old where it is not at all unlikely that the two attestators and the mortgagee have died (life not being too long in this country) cannot be proved at all to be valid documents unless some third persons who did not attest but merely happened to be present at the execution and attestation (a very unlikely contingency) happened to be alive, remembered what happened long ago of a transaction at which they were casually present and could, therefore, be called to prove the attestation by two attestators. If the argument is pushed to its logical limit, then even section 90 of the Evidence Act, which says that documents purporting to be thirty years old can be presumed to have been validly executed and attested, must be deemed to have been overruled by the provisions of section 59 of the later Transfer of Property Act. No doubt, where the provisions of section 68 of the Evidence Act have been complied with by calling one attesting witness to prove the execution by the mortgagor, and the attestation by himself (the witness) and the document may, therefore, be accepted by the Court as prima facie sufficiently proved to be a valid mortgage. That prima facie proof can be rebutted by proof on the other side that the other witness or witnesses who has or have also apparently attested the document did not really see its execution and that the document, therefore, did not comply with the requirements of section 59 of Act IV of 1882.

The case in Vadla Nagiah v. Valuru Divakara Mudaliar(7), Munniappa Chettiar v. Vellachamy Mannadi (2), Shamu Patter v. Abdul Kadir Rowthan (3), Ganga Pershad Singh v. Ishri Pershad Singh (4) and Arumugham Chetty v. Muthu Koundan (5) are all cases in which it had been definitely proved, as found by the lower Courts, that the apparent attestors of the documents in question were not attestors in the legal sense and had not seen the execution, and hence it was held in those cases that the documents were invalid as mortgages. Those cases did not consider whether the document had been prima facie proved to be a valid mortgage, that is, whether the requisition as to proof contained in the Evidence Act as regards such a document had been complied with and, in fact, no occasion arose in those cases for the consideration of that point on the facts found in those cases.

The question now in dispute was directly considered in Shib Dayal v. Sheo Ghulam, (1) which decision was pronounced after the Privy Council decision in Shamu Patter v. Abdul Kadir Rowthan (3). That case in Shib Dayal v. Sheo Ghulam (1) followed two earlier decisions of that Court reported in the same Volume* at pages 109 [Ram Dei v. Munna Lal (8)] and 112 [Uttam Singh v. Hukam Singh(9)]. In Ram Dei v. Munna Lal (8) the question in dispute has been carefully considered. I am unable to accept the contention of Mr. Sesha Aiyangar that the learned Judges who decided those three cases overlooked the distinction between the proof of the document and the validity of a document. On the other hand, I think they did have that distinction clearly in their minds and held that, whereas section 59 of Act IV of 1882 did require that there should be two attesting witnesses at least for the validity of the document of the nature mentioned in the section, the requirements of the Evidence Act as to proof of such a document could be sufficiently met by compliance with the directions in sections 68 and 69 of the Evidence Act. I think also that section 114 of the Evidence Act [relied on in some other connection by the learned Judges who decided Jogendra Nath v. Nitai Ohurn (10)] supplies the clue to the intention of the Legislature in enacting sections 68 and 69 of the Evidence Act which consider proof up to a certain point as legally sufficient. As I said already, such prima facie evidence of validity (believed by the Court to be true) could be rebutted by other evidence (of course, when believed by the Court).

In the present case, the evidence of P. W. No. 4, believed by the Court, sufficiently satisfied the requirements of section 68 of the Evidence Act (the document being, on its face, attested by at least two attestors and thus satisfying the requirements of section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act). Following, therefore, Shib Dayal v. Sheo Ghulam, (1) I would hold that the document has been proved to be a valid mortgage.

In the result, the decree of the lower Appellate Court will be modified and the usual mortgage-decree shall be passed in favour of the plaintiffs for the sum mentioned in the lower Appellate Court's decree, with interest as provided for therein, items Nos. 1, 3 and 4 being directed to be sold first and item No. 2 last. The plaintiffs shall have their costs of the second appeal from defendants Nos. 1 and 3 and their costs incurred in the Courts below will be paid by the 1st defendant. The costs shall also be a charge upon the mortgaged property. Time for redemption is six months from this date.

SPENCER, J.—In this case the validity of the suit document, a mortgage deed, was not the subject of any issue in the Court of the first instance, the only matter on which the plaintiffs and the 1st defendant joined issue being the question of discharge upon which defence the District Munsif dismissed the suit.

On appeal, the Subordinate Judge, after reversing the 1st Court's finding on the question of discharge, gave the plaintiffs a personal decree against the 1st defendant alone and refused to give them a decree for sale of the mortgaged property on the ground that the attestation to the deed had not been properly proved. From the Subordinate Judge's order on the review petition his reasons for not granting a decree on the mortgage appear more fully than in his judgment. He says therein that, though the 1st defendant admitted execution, he did not ask for an issue to be framed as to the validity of the mortgage-deed but as against the other defendants who remained ex parte it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to prove the document in the manner prescribed by section 68 of the Evidence Act and he had not done so.

In my opinion, the requirements of section 68 of the Evidence Act were sufficiently complied with when P. W. No. 4, an attesting witness, was examined. If there had then been any idea of suggesting that this witness did not know what was meant by 'attesting' he should have been asked some questions in cross-examination to further explain his statement in the chief examination, "I attested it". The document, Exhibit A, shows that two other witnesses signed it. But it is not known definitely whether they are alive and available for examination.

The features of this case resemble that decided in Shib Dayal v. Sheo Ghulam (1). It was there stated : "With regard to the proof of the mortgage, the plaintiff produced one of the attesting witnesses who proved that he saw the mortgagor sign the mortgage and that he signed his name as an attesting witness. On the face of it, the mortgage appears to have been attested by a number of other witnesses, but they were not called. Nor did the witness who was called say that there was any other attesting witness present. He was not asked the question by either side. The question is whether, under these circumstances, there being no other evidence, the mortgage can be said to be proved." Their Lordships of the Allahabad High Court held that there had been a sufficient compliance with the law as stated in section 68 of the Evidence Act when one attesting witness was examined, as required by that section, and the evidence for the plaintiff was not at all rebutted. Ram Dei v. Munna Lal (8) was a similar case. As to the amount of proof required, section 68 of the Evidence Act does not require that more than one attesting witness should be called to say that he attested it before the document can be used as evidence. I do not believe that it could have been the intention of the framers of the Transfer of Property Act, which became law in 1882, to lay down anything in section 59 contrary to the provisions of the Evidence Act of 1872, on the subject of proof. If an Appellate Court, in the exercise of its discretion under the provisos to section 58 of the Evidence Act and to Order VIII, rule 5 of the Civil Procedure Code, requires clearer proof of attestation, it is the duty of the Court itself to call for such proof, and not to decide that the document has not been proved as a mortgage merely because the plaintiff did not examine all the attesting witnesses. See Arumugham Chetty v. Muthu Koundan (5) and Muniappa Chettiar v. Vellachamy Mannadi (2).

Mr. Sesha Aiyangar for the respondent relied on two other decisions which can clearly be distinguished. In Param Hans v. Randhir Singh (6) the second witness did not sign or make a mark and so the document was held to be not validly executed as there was nothing in the evidence to show that he authorised the scribe to write his name. In Vadla Nagiah v. Valuru Divakara Mudaliar (7) there was no admission or proof of the attestation nor did any presumption arise from the common course of business that the mortgage-bond had been validly attested. Both these cases are, therefore, distinguishable from the present.

I concur in the order proposed to be passed by my learned brother.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.
FULL BENCH.
APPEAL FROM APPELLATE DECREE No. 1313 OF 1917.
May 20, 1920.
Present :—Sir Asutosh Mookerjee, KT., Acting Chief Justice, Justice Sir Ernest Fletcher, KT., Justice Sir N. R. Chatterjea, KT., Mr. Justice Teunon and Justice Sir Asutosh Chaudhuri, KT.
HRIDYANATH ROY AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS
RAM CHANDRA BARUA SARMA AND OTHERS DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXIII, r. 1—Order for withdrawal made in circumstances outside scope of rule, effect of—Fresh suit, maintainability of—Court trying subsequent suit, whether can question propriety of order of withdrawal.

HRIDYANATH ROY v. RAM CHANDRA BARUA SARMA.

An order for withdrawal of a suit with leave to institute a fresh suit, made under Order XXIII, rule 1, but in circumstances not within the scope of the rule, cannot be treated as an order made without jurisdiction, such order is consequently not null and void. [p. 813, col. 2.]

A fresh suit instituted upon leave so granted is not incompetent [p. 813, col. 2.]

The Court trying the subsequent suit is not competent to enter into the question, whether the Court which granted the plaintiff permission to withdraw the first suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit had properly made such order. [p. 813, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Dacca, dated the 27th March 1917, reversing that of the Officiating Munsif, 2nd Court, Maniekgunj, dated the 4th January 1916.

This appeal being called on for hearing in a Division Court before Justice Sir Asutosh Chaudhuri, Kt., and Mr. Justice Walmsley, was referred to a Full Bench.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Prokas Chandra Pakrashi (with him Babus Ramendra Mohan Mazumdar and Nil Kanta Ghosh), for the Appellants:—The plaintiffs are the appellants. The suit is for the recovery of possession of land upon declaration of title. The Court of first instance found in favour of the plaintiff upon the questions of title and possession and decreed the suit. The Subordinate Judge on appeal affirmed the findings of the trial Court as to title and possession, but dismissed the suit on the ground that a previous suit, instituted in respect of the same subject-matter, had been improperly withdrawn under Order XXIII, rule 1 (2), Civil Procedure Code. The learned Subordinate Judge has relied upon the decision in Kali Prasanna Sil v. Panchanan Nandi Chowdhury (1) in support of the view that the order of withdrawal passed in the previous suit was without jurisdiction. As to the meaning of the word "jurisdiction" I would refer your Lordships to Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. IX, p. 13, Art. 10. Reads Order XXIII, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code.

Their Lordships in Kali Prosanna Sil v. Panchanan Nandi Chowdhury (1) made a mistake in holding that the word "sufficient grounds" for permitting withdrawal with liberty to bring a fresh suit on the same cause of action referred to in clause (b) of rule 1, Order XXIII of the Civil Procedure Code must be something of the same nature as the "formal defect" mentioned in clause (a); when the Court is in seisin of the case, it can pass any order that may be necessary under the circumstances of the case.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—What is your point?]

My point is that, even on the assumption that the order for withdrawal in the previous suit was improperly made, it is conclusive between the parties, because, however erroneous it might be deemed to have been, it cannot rightly be regarded as made without jurisdiction.

[CHATTERJEA, J.—The question is, can the order for withdrawal be attacked in a subsequent suit as made without jurisdiction?]

Yes, my Lord. The provisions of Order XXIII, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, empower the Court to pass an order of withdrawal. The language of the rule clearly shows that it is entirely in the discretion of the Court to pass any such order. In making such order the Court may commit an error of law or of procedure and the aggrieved party has his remedy in appeal or revision, but the order cannot be challenged in the manner in which it is attempted to be done in the present case. The order cannot be said to be one without jurisdiction. Almost it can be characterised as an order passed illegally or with material irregularity. The order is, therefore, not a nullity or void ipso facto. So long as the order is not set aside in due course of law, both the parties are bound by it.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Why is the present suit barred? Is it by res judicata?]

That is the contention of the other side.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—The question then is whether the order for withdrawal was made without jurisdiction?]

That is so. If it is held that the order passed in the previous suit under Order XXIII, rule 1 is in the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction then the maintainability of the present suit cannot be questioned so long as that order stands unimpeached and is not vacated in due course of law.

Babu Ramesh Chandra Sen, for the Respondent:—Under Order XXIII, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code withdrawal is only allowable when there is a formal defect. If there is no formal defect, the order of withdrawal is without jurisdiction. When a Court is given jurisdiction to pass a certain order subject to some conditions precedent, the absence of those conditions makes the order one without jurisdiction.

(1) 33 Ind. Cas. 670; 23 C. L. J. 489; 20 C. W. N. 1000; 44 C. 367.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—What is jurisdiction ?]

It is the authority of the Court to do a certain thing. The matter has been considered by your Lordships in Ashutosh Sikdar v. Behari Lal (2).

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Do you mean to say that the Court acts without jurisdiction when it makes an erroneous order ?]

I do not contend that. What I do contend is that the Court had authority to pass the order of withdrawal if there was a formal defect. As there was no formal defect the condition precedent was not fulfilled and the order of withdrawal is without jurisdiction. The meaning of "jurisdiction" is fully explained in Ashutosh Sikdar v. Behari Lal (2).

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—What would be the effect of the order of withdrawal ? ]

As it is made without jurisdiction it is a nullity. The subsequent suit would, therefore, be barred. My objection is more under section 10 than under section 11, Civil Procedure Code, because if the order of withdrawal is a nullity, the appeal remains pending. Another branch of my argument is that the withdrawal may be treated as made without permission because the Court had no power to give permission.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—But, as a matter of fact, the appellant did not want to withdraw without leave.]

There is no application on the record. There was only an oral application.

[FLETCHER, J.—The question is whether the Court was satisfied as to the existence of a 'formal defect.' If the Court was so satisfied, how can you say that the order of withdrawal was passed without jurisdiction ?]

The question is not whether the Court was satisfied or not but whether there was in law a formal defect.

I shall begin with the case in Robert Watson & Co. v. Collector of Zillah Rajshahye (3). If an order allowing withdrawal was made although no formal defect existed, the order can be ignored.

[CHATTERJEA, J.—What was the Civil Procedure Code at the time ?]

It was before the Act of 1859. The case is also reported in 12 Weekly Reporter (P. C.) 43 [Robert Watson & Co. v. Collector of Zillah Rajshahye (3 ] Reads Robert Watson & Co. v. Collector of Zillah Raishahye (3). The order of withdrawal was before the Civil Procedure Code of 1859 but the subsequent suit was after that Code. Refers to Muddun Ram Doss v. Israil Ali Chowdhry (4). Kharda Company Limited v. Durga Cohran Chandra (5).

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Was the order made without jurisdiction ?]

In spite of the legislation that had subsequently been adopted, the power of the Court remained the same. See Act X of 1877.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—The whole question, therefore, is what is jurisdiction ?]

The simple answer is, it is the power of the Court to deal with a matter.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Does the Court act without jurisdiction when it fails to act in accordance with the procedure laid down by the Legislature ?]

Not always, but when it acts in breach of a mandatory direction, it acts without jurisdiction. Refers to Subrahmania Ayyar v. King-Emperor (6). This case lays down that when a mandatory direction is disregarded, it is without jurisdiction, e.g., in a proceeding under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, if there is no Police report as to a breach of the peace, the order of the Magistrate is without jurisdiction. Refers to Khiarajmal v. Diam (7). It is very difficult to draw the distinction between this case and the case in Mallarjun v. Narhari (8). Reads Mr. Justice Walsh's "Revision and Extraordinary Jurisdiction," at pages 43, 45, 46.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Your contention then is that the Court has jurisdiction to make only correct orders.]

I do not go so far. Refers to Khosh Mahomed Sircar v. Nazir Mahomed (9) and Krishna Kamini v. Abdul Jabbar (10). As in these cases the Magistrate' power was dependent on a certain state of facts, so, in the present case, the Civil Court's power to make an order of withdrawal was dependent on certain conditions. The plaintiff cannot be permitted to withdraw his case with liberty to bring a fresh suit simply to improve upon his evidence.

CHAUDHURI, J.—Could not the Court allow additional evidence to be taken ?]

That would depend upon whether there was any inherent defect. Refers to Kharda Company Limited v. Durga Charan Chandra (5), Mabulla Sardar v. Hemangini Debi (11), Ramdeo v. Goneshnarain (12), Kessowji Issar v. Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company (13), Ashutosh Sikdar v. Behari Lal (2), Shek Golam Sarwar v. Joy Lal (14) (notes portion).

FLETCHER, J.—There may be good grounds to revise the order, but it cannot be questioned in the way in which it is attempted to be done.]

Refers to Satyabadi Gountia v. Bediadhar Bar Panda (15).

[CHAUDHURI, J.—If a Court decides a question of limitation wrongly, can you say that it acts without jurisdiction ?]

Not in all cases. Here the Court by simply saying that it was satisfied that some formal defect existed could not assume jurisdiction. It would be usurping jurisdiction. Reads Bigelow on Estoppel, 6th Edition, pages 228, 229.

[FLETCHER, J.—The words in the Statute (Order XXIII, rule 1) are "when the Court is satisfied" and not that certain facts should exist.]

If the satisfaction of the Court was the only requirement, then the order would not be open to revision.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Barring the decision in Satyabadi Gountia v. Bediadhar Bar Panda (15); is there any other decision in point ?]

The other case is Shek Golam Sarwar v. Joy Lal (14). There is another case in Nathuni Ram v. Sheo Koer (16). Refers also to Ali Miah v. Kaberia Khatun (17), R. v. Justices of Essex (18), Hira Lal Mitra v. Uday Chandra Dey (19), Ramdeo v. Goneshnarain (12), Mahipat Shamla v. Nathu Vithoba (20), Eknath Ranoji Falke v. Ranoji Bawaji Falke (21). A different view has been taken in Afzul Begam v. Akbari Khanam (22) and Balide Kamayya v. Pragada Narayya (23) overruling Chowagudi Chinna Potayya v. Varadaraja Appa Row (24). As to the meaning of the word jurisdiction refers to Sukh Lal v. Tara Chand (25). I do not say that the Court had no jurisdiction, but I contend that the Court had no authority to exercise that jurisdiction. The power to grant leave to withdraw a suit is a special power. It is to be exercised only under certain conditions : when those conditions do not exist, the power cannot be exercised. My contention, therefore, is that as the Subordinate Judge, in the previous litigation, invoked the aid of Order XXIII, rule 1 (2), Civil Procedure Code, under circumstances not contemplated thereby, the order, in so far as it reserved liberty to the plaintiffs to institute a fresh suit, must be deemed to have been made without jurisdiction and consequently null and void. Therefore, under sub-rule (3) the plaintiffs are precluded from instituting the present suit.

Babu Prokas Chandra Pakrashi was not called upon to reply.

HRIDYANATH ROY v. RAM CHANDRA BARUA SARMA.

The Court of first instance found in favour of the plaintiffs upon the questions of title and possession and decreed the suit. Upon appeal, the Subordinate Judge affirmed the findings of the trial Court as to title and possession, but dismissed the suit on the ground that a previous suit, instituted in respect of the same subject matter, had been improperly withdrawn under Order XXIII, rule 1 (2). In support of this view, the Subordinate Judge relied upon the decision in Kali Prasanna Sil v. Panchanan Nandi Chowdhury (1) which is an authority for the proposition that where the Appellate Court allows a plaintiff to withdraw from a suit on the ground that he had not been able to adduce all the evidence which should have been adduced, the order is without jurisdiction and a fresh suit brought in pursuance of that order is barred by res judicata. In the previous litigation, it appears, the plaintiffs succeeded in the Primary Court. Upon appeal by the defendants, the following order was recorded by the Subordinate Judge on the 18th September 1913:—

"Heard both parties and appellant' objection. The plaintiff-respondent applies to withdraw from suit with liberty to bring fresh suit. There appears reason. The plaintiff filed a Chitta dated 1246 B. S, his case is that the disputed land is covered by that Chitta as belonging to him. That Chitta was not compared or re-laid in the locality and the identity was not established, the oral evidence is not sufficient. I, therefore, allow the suit to be withdrawn and permit the plaintiff to bring fresh suit, if not otherwise barred, on condition of his paying appellants' costs in both the Courts before institution of fresh suit. Appeal thus disposed of,"

The present suit was, thereafter, instituted on the 2nd April 1914, and was, as already stated, decreed by the trial Court where no objection was taken by the defendants that it was barred by reason of the alleged incompetence of the order in the previous suit. The objection was taken in the lower Appellate Court for the first time, as the decision in Kali Prasanna Sil v. Panchanan Nandi Chowdhury (1) had been meanwhile pronounced and published. The Subordinate Judge entertained and gave effect to the objection, which he described as a technical ground not taken in the lower Court. On second appeal to this Court, the Division Bench has dissented from the view taken in Kali Prasanna Sil v. Panchanan Nandi Chowdhury (1) and has referred the following questions for decision by a Full Bench:—

(1) If an order for withdrawal of a suit with leave to institute a fresh suit be made under Order XXIII, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code (or section 373 of Act X, 1877) but on a ground not of the same nature as "formal defect" mentioned in clause (a), can it be treated as an order made without jurisdiction and, therefore, null and void?

(2) Is a fresh suit instituted upon such leave incompetent?

(3) Is the Court trying the subsequent suit competent to enter into the question whether the Court, which granted the plaintiff permission to withdraw the first suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit, had jurisdiction to make such an order?

(4) Is such an order open to revision under section 115, Civil Procedure Code?

Order XXIII, rule 1, mentioned in the first of these questions, is in the following terms:—

"(1). At any time after the institution of a suit, the plaintiff may, as against all or any of the defendants, withdraw his suit or abandon part of his claim.

(2) Where the Court is satisfied

(a) that a suit must fail by reason of some formal defect or

(b) that there are other sufficient grounds for allowing the plaintiff to institute a fresh suit for the subject-matter of a suit or part of a claim, it may, on such terms as it thinks fit, grant the plaintiff permission to withdraw from such suit or abandon such part of a claim with liberty to institute a fresh suit in respect of the subject-matter of such suit or such part of a claim.

(3) Where the plaintiff withdraws from a suit, or abandons part of a claim, without the permission referred to in sub-rule (2) he shall be liable for such costs as the Court may award and shall be precluded from instituting any fresh suit in respect of such subject-matter or such part of the claim.

(4) Nothing in this rule shall be deemed to authorise the Court to permit one of several plaintiffs to withdraw without the consent of the others."

The case has been argued before us on the assumption that the order for withdrawal in the previous litigation was improperly made. The contention of the appellants is that, even on the assumption that the order was improperly made, it is conclusive between the parties, because, however erroneous it might be deemed to have been, it cannot rightly be regarded as made without jurisdiction. The contention of the respondents, on the other hand, is that as the Subordinate Judge in the previous litigation, invoked the aid of Order XXIII, rule 1 (2) under circumstances not contemplated thereby, the order, in so far as it reserved liberty to the plaintiffs to institute a fresh suit, must be deemed to have been made without jurisdiction and consequently null and void, with the inevitable result that under sub-rule (3) the plaintiffs are precluded from instituting the present suit. The question thus emerges for consideration whether an order for withdrawal of a suit, with liberty reserved to the plaintiffs to institute a fresh suit in respect of the same subject-matter, is an order made without jurisdiction, if it is passed under circumstances not contemplated by Order XXIII, rule 1 (2). The answer to this question depends upon an analysis of the notion of jurisdiction of a Court.

In the Order of Reference to a Full Bench in the case of Sukh Lal v. Tara Chand (25) it was stated that jurisdiction may be defined to be the power of a Court to hear and determine a cause, to adjudicate or exercise any judicial power in relation to it; in other words, by jurisdiction is meant the authority which a Court has to decide matters that are litigated before it or to take cognizance of matters presented in a formal way for its decision. An examination of the cases in the books discloses numerous attempts to define the term "jurisdiction," which has been stated to be "the power to hear and determine issues of law and fact," "the authority by which judicial officers take cognizance of and decide causes," "the authority to hear and decide a legal controversy"; "the power to hear and determine the subject-matter in controversy between parties to a suit and to adjudicate or exercise any judicial power over them;" "the power to hear, determine and pronounce judgment on the issues before the Court," "the power or authority which is conferred upon a Court by the Legislature to hear and determine causes between parties and to carry the judgments into effect", "the power to enquire into the facts, to apply the law, to pronounce the judgment and to carry it into execution". [Reference may in this connection be made to the discussion of the nature of jurisdiction in the judgments of this Court in Ashutosh Sikdar v. Behari Lal (2) and Gurdeo Singh v. Chandrika Singh (26)]. This jurisdiction of the Court may be qualified or restricted by a variety of circumstances. Thus, the jurisdiction may have to be considered with reference to place, value, and nature of the subject-matter. The power of a tribunal may be exercised within defined territorial limits. Its cognizance may be restricted to subject-matters of prescribed value. It may be competent to deal with controversies of a specified character, for instance, testamentary or matrimonial causes, acquisition of lands for public purposes, Record of Rights as between landlords and tenants. This classification into territorial jurisdiction, pecuniary jurisdiction and jurisdiction of the subject-matter is obviously of a fundamental character. Given such jurisdiction, we must be careful to distinguish exercise of jurisdiction from existence of jurisdiction, for fundamentally different are the consequences of failure to comply with statutory requirements in the assumption and in the exercise of jurisdiction. The authority to decide a cause at all, and not the decision rendered therein, is what makes up jurisdiction, and when there is jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, the decision of all other questions arising in the case is but an exercise of that jurisdiction. The extent to which the conditions essential for creating and raising the jurisdiction of a Court or the restraints attaching to the mode of exercise of that jurisdiction should be included in the conception of jurisdiction itself is sometimes a question of great nicety, as is illustrated by the decisions reviewed in the order of reference in Sukh Lal v. Tara Chand (25) and Khosh Mahomed Sircar v. Nazir Maho- med (9). See also the observation of Lord Parker in Raghunath Das v. Sundar Das (27). But the distinction between existence of jurisdiction and exercise of jurisdiction has not always been borne in mind and this has sometimes led to confusion. [See Mabulla Sardar v. Hemangini Debi (11), Moser v. Marsden (23), where the term jurisdiction is used to denote the authority of the Court to make an order of a particular description]. We must not thus overlook the cardinal position that, in order that jurisdiction may be exercised, there must be a case legally before the Court and a hearing as well as a determination. A judgment pronounced by a Court without jurisdiction is void, subject to the well-known reservation that when the jurisdiction of a Court is challenged, the Court is competent to determine the question of jurisdiction, though the result of the enquiry may be that it has no jurisdiction to deal with the matter brought before it, Rashmoni Dasi v. Ganada Sundari Dasi (29).

Since jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, it does not depend either upon the regularity of the exercise of that power or upon the correctness of the decision pronounced, for the power to decide necessarily carries with it the power to decide wrongly as well as rightly. As an authority for this proposition reference may be made to the celebrated dictum of Lord Hobhouse in Malkarjun v. Narhari (8) "a Court has jurisdiction to decide wrong as well as right; if it decides wrong, the wronged party can only take the course prescribed by law for setting matters right; and if that course is not taken the decision, however wrong, cannot be disturbed". Lord Hobhouse then added that, though it was true that the Court made a sad mistake in following the procedure adopted, still in so doing the Court was exercising its jurisdiction and to treat such an error as destroying the jurisdiction of the Court was calculated to introduce great confusion into the administration of the law. The view that jurisdiction is entirely independent of the manner of its exercise and involves the power to decide either way upon the facts presented to the Court, is manifestly well founded on principle, and has been recognized and applied elsewhere. Watkins, Ex parte (30), Herron v. Dater (31), There is a clear distinction between the jurisdiction of the Court to try and determine a matter, and the erroneous action of such Court in the exercise of that jurisdiction. The former involves the power to act at all while the latter involves the authority to act in the particular way in which the Court does act. The boundary between an error of judgment and the usurpation of power is this: the former is reversible by an Appellate Court within a certain fixed time and is, therefore, only voidable, the latter is an absolute nullity. When parties are before the Court and present to it a controversy which the Court has authority to decide, a decision not necessarily correct but appropriate to that question is an exercise of judicial power or jurisdiction. So far as the jurisdiction itself is concerned, it is wholly immaterial whether the decision upon the particular question be correct or incorrect. Were it held that a Court had jurisdiction to render only correct decisions, then each time it made an erroneous ruling or decision, the Court would be without jurisdiction and the ruling itself void. Such is not the law, and it matters not what may be the particular question presented for adjudication whether it relates to jurisdiction of the Court itself or affects substantive rights of the parties litigating, it cannot be held that the ruling or decision itself is without jurisdiction or is beyond the jurisdiction of the Court. The decision may be erroneous, but it cannot be held to be void for want of jurisdiction. A Court may have the right and power to determine the status of a thing, and yet may exercise its authority erroneously, after jurisdiction attaches in any case, all that follows in exercise of jurisdiction, and continuance of jurisdiction is not dependent upon the correctness of the determination.

It follows from these principles that when a Court of competent jurisdiction has made an order under Order XXIII, rule 1 (2), in circumstances not contemplated by the rule, the order cannot be deemed to have been made without jurisdiction. The Court has jurisdiction to try the suit, and, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, is competent to make an order for withdrawal with liberty reserved to the plaintiff to institute a fresh suit in respect of the same subject-matter, if it is satisfied that circumstances exist which justify such an order. The Court is so satisfied rightly or wrongly as the Subordinate Judge in the previous suit put it quaintly, "there appears reason". The Court accordingly makes the order. It is plain that, however erroneous the order may be, it is not an order made by a Court without jurisdiction, it is, on the other hand, an order made by a Court of competent jurisdiction acting with material irregularity in the exercise of its jurisdiction. The order cannot, consequently, be deemed null and void. The party aggrieved may directly impugn the order, and may, in an appropriate proceeding, invoke the aid of a superior tribunal to set aside the order, as appears to have been done in the cases brought to our notice, except the case of Kali Prasanna Sil v. Panchanan Nandi Chowdhury (1); but, till it has been so vacated, it is operative between the parties and cannot be ignored or challenged collaterally in a different proceeding. There is thus no escape from the position that the decision in Kali Prasanna Sil v. Panchanan Nandi Chowdhury (1) cannot be defended on principle. That decision, indeed, has been doubted on more than one occasion, as pointed out in the Order of Reference. Besides the cases mentioned therein, reference may particularly be made to the judgment of Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., in Tuljaram Row v. Gopala Aiyar (32), where the true rule was stated to be that, if a Court has jurisdiction to try a suit and has authority to pass orders of a particular kind, the fact that it has passed an order which it should not have made in the circumstances of that litigation, does not indicate total want or loss of jurisdiction so as to render the order a nullity.

The first three questions referred to the Full Bench must, consequently, be answered in the negative; the fourth question does not arise and has not been argued before us. The result is the following series of propositions:—

(1) An order for withdrawal of a suit with leave to institute a fresh suit, made under Order XXIII, rule 1, but in circumstances not within the scope of the rule, cannot be treated as an order made without jurisdiction, such order is consequently not null and void.

(2) A fresh suit instituted upon leave so granted is not incompetent.

(3) The Court trying the subsequent suit is not competent to enter into the question, whether the Court which granted the plaintiff permission to withdraw the first suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit had properly made such order.

These propositions leave no room for doubt that the decision of the Subordinate Judge in this case must be set aside and the decree of the Court of first instance restored with costs in all the Courts including the costs of the hearing before the Full Bench and the Division Bench.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 370 OF 1919.

MUSUVATHI MUNI NAGEND. RAYYAN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS— RESPONDENTS.

Mortgage—Prior and subsequent encumbrances—Subsequent mortgagee paying off prior encumbrance, effect of—Presumption.

CHIDAMBRA NADAN v. MUSUVATHI MUNI MAGENDRAYYAN.

In the absence of any indication to the contrary, the presumption is, that when a subsequent encumbrancer pays off a prior encumbrance with the consideration-money of his own encumbrance, he does so with the intention of keeping the prior encumbrance alive for his own benefit. [p. 816, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Madura, in Appeal Suit No. 16 of 1918, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Second Additional District Munsif, Madura, in Original Suit No. 110 of 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. S. Subramanya Aiyar, for the Appellants.—The first mortgagee was discharged in pursuance of an express direction in the later mortgage-deed that the later mortgagee should do so out of the consideration for his own mortgage. There is also a recital that he should get back the document with the endorsement of discharge. The payment by the subsequent mortgagee must be regarded as that of an agent of the mortgagor and the first mortgage must be deemed to have been extinguished. The money must be treated as belonging to the owner of the equity of redemption. See the observations of the Privy Council in Mohesh Lal v. Mohant Bawan Das (1). See also observations of Srinivasa Aiyangar, J. in Mathammal v. Rasu Pillai (2).

Mr. S. T. Srinivasa Gopalachariar, for the Respondents.—The general principle is laid down by the Privy Council in Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukh Das (3). When the second mortgagee pays the prior encumbrance he must be deemed to keep the first mortgage alive and it is for his benefit to do so. The arrangement must obviously have been intended for the benefit of the second mortgagee as otherwise the mortgagor could well receive the consideration and make the payment himself. Mohesh Lal v. Mohant Bawan Das (1) was decided on its own peculiar facts and it does not affect the general rule of law which has been recognized and followed in a series of decisions. See Aborthoraman Kutti v. Ittikaparambilathan (4).

JUDGMENT.—The facts which give rise to this appeal are somewhat complicated and consist in a series of mortgages created in succession over the same property. The mortgages with which we are concerned are four in number. The first, dated the 17th June 1905, is a mortgage for Rs. 1,000 in favour of one Balasubramania Nadar and another; the second, dated 4th June 1908, is a mortgage for Rs. 500 in favour of the plaintiff's predecessors-in-title and it is this mortgage that they seek to enforce in this suit. The third was a mortgage, dated 8th June 1903, in favour of the Madura Nidhi Company for Rs. 1,000 and by that mortgage the mortgagees were directed to discharge the debt due under the first mortgage to Balasubramania Nadar. The last mortgage, dated 1st July 1908, was for Rs. 400 in favour of the 6th defendant. That mortgage directed payment by the 6th defendant of Rs. 250 to Balasubramania Nadar, the first mortgagee, the third mortgagee, the Nidhi Company, having already discharged his debt to the extent of Rs. 1,000 the total due under his mortgage on the date of payment being Rs. 1,250 with accumulation of interest. The 6th defendant paid off the third mortgage in favour of the Nidhi Company and he now claims, by virtue of these facts, that he is entitled to stand in the shoes of the first mortgagee and claim priority in light of that mortgage to the present plaintiffs, the second mortgagees.

The question is one that has been much discussed and it would be idle to say that the expressions of opinion to be found in the cases are all consistent and easily reconcilable. The first case of importance is the decision of the Privy Council in Mohesh Lal v. Mohant Bawan Das (1). Their Lordships there applied the rule laid down by Jessel, M. R., in Adams v. Angell (5) and held that the question whether a person who provides money to pay off a former charge as consideration for a second charge to himself keeps alive that former charge for his own benefit or extinguishes it is a question of intention. To a large extent it may be said that that is a question of fact and there may be express declarations of intention which conclude the matter. But, usually, there is no such expression of intention and certain presumptions have to be made with regard to what the intention of the parties is likely to have been.

The argument for the appellant is that, where the consideration for a second charge takes the form of payment of a first mortgage by a second mortgagee the payment is made by him merely as an agent of the owner of the equity of redemption and the money must be regarded as the money of the owner of the equity of redemption and the payment as his payment. It is common ground that the rule to be followed is that laid down by the Privy Council in Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukhdas (3) and that is, that a man having a right to act in either of the two ways, i. e., either to extinguish or keep alive a charge, shall be assumed to have acted according to his interest. In that case their Lordships treated the payment by the subsequent mortgagee to be his own payment so that his interest was what was to be looked at, and there can be no doubt that the interest of a subsequent encumbrancer must always be to keep alive a prior charge which he has paid off for his own benefit. The trouble has arisen from this, that their Lordships in Mohesh Lal v. Mohant Bawan Das (1) appear to have treated it as a general rule that when a mortgagee is directed to apply the loan in discharge of a prior mortgage the presumption is that the payment is to be regarded as primarily the payment of the mortgagor and that his interest can only be to extinguish the first charge. On a careful consideration of that case, we have come to the conclusion that it lays down no such general rule but merely decides on the facts of that case, one of which was that there was a running account between the mortgagor and the second mortgagee who acted as his banker, that it was proved that the intention was to extinguish the prior charge and not to keep it alive. There was no doubt in that case the fact that the banker took over possession of the mortgage when he paid it off but their Lordships held that he took possession of it merely as a receipt, for it was endorsed with the recital of his discharge, and that it was merely the case of an agent taking a receipt on behalf of his principal when he made a payment for him, which, of course, it would be his duty to do. They declined to take the view in that case that the taking possession of the prior charge was any evidence of an intention to keep it alive for the benefit of the subsequent encumbrancer. We think that this was no more than a finding of fact upon the peculiar circumstances of that case. We venture to think that it is an error to treat Mohesh Lal v. Mohant Bawan Das (1), as laying down a hard and fast presumption that where a subsequent encumbrancer, in accordance with the directions from the mortgagor, pays off a prior encumbrance the payment must be treated as made solely as the agent of the mortgagor and that the intention accordingly must be presumed to be to extinguish the prior security. That, in our view, would be in conflict with the decision of the Privy Council in Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukhdas (3), and with a long series of cases in this and the other Courts of India of which we may take as an example the latest decision of this Court (Seshagiri Aiyar and Moore, JJ.) in Aborthoraman Kutti v. Ittikaparambilathan (4), we think that the observations of Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., in Mathammal v. Razu Pillai (2) are obiter, and with respect to that learned Judge we think they are coloured by a view of the effect of the decision in Mohesh Lal v. Mohant Bawan Das (1) which we regard as erroneous.

In the present case the subsequent mortgage contained not merely a direction that the later encumbrancer should discharge the earlier mortgage but should take it back with the endorsement of payment thereon. Were it necessary so to decide, we are prepared to hold that such a direction points to an intention of keeping the charge alive. For there is no hint that the instrument is to be received by the mortgagee merely as the agent of the mortgagor, as a receipt and handed back to him. But, apart from that, we think that a long series of decisions in the Indian Courts, which we believe to be in entire conformity with the decision of the Privy Council in Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukhdas, (3) have established the rule that, in the absence of special circumstances to show the contrary, such as we believe existed in Mohesh Lal v. Mohant Bawan Das (1) the presumption is when a subsequent encumbrancer pays off a prior encumbrance with the consideration-money of his own encumbrance he does so with the intention of keeping the prior encumbrance alive. It is obvious that in the vast majority of cases such an arrangement would be made for the protection of the subsequent mortgagee. The mortgagor probably wants the money for himself rather than to discharge his existing debts and the origin of such a stipulation is most likely to be a distrust felt by the subsequent mortgagee as to the use to which the moneys would be put if he handed them direct to the mortgagor, who, instead of discharging the prior incumbrance, might squander the money for his own purposes. We think that a mortgagee who inserts in the mortgage-bond the stipulation that he and not the mortgagor shall pay off the prior encumbrance can, in the absence of any indication to the contrary, be rightly presumed to have wished to make that payment by his own hand with a view to keep the prior encumbrance alive for his own benefit. We are, therefore, of opinion that the lower Courts were right and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

An order passed upon an application under section 174 of the Bengal Tenancy Act cancelling a sale held in execution of a rent-decree is not open to second appeal.

The High Court will not interfere in revision, under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, with an order cancelling a sale merely because through a miscalculation of an officer of the Court the judgment-debtor deposited a sum short by a few rupees of the amount due with his application to set the sale aside and immediately on discovering the mistake deposited the remaining amount.

Babu Sarat Chandra Mookerjee, for the Appellant.

Babu Bimala Charan Deb, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.—We think that the objection raised on behalf of the respondent that, in this case, there is no second appeal to this Court, must prevail.

We have been asked to treat the appeal as an application under section 115, Civil Procedure Code. We do not think that this is a case in which this Court should exercise its powers of revision, assuming that the orders of the lower Court are erroneous.

The application to set aside the sale was made on deposit of the amount within 30 days from the date of the sale. The amount deposited fell short by a few rupees of the amount of compensation due to the purchaser. This has been found by both Courts to have been due to a mistake on the part of the Sheristadar who gave information to the petitioner, apparently according to the practice prevailing in that Court, and also due to his mistake in checking the Chalan. As soon as the mistake was found out, the deficit amount was deposited by the applicant. The property is said to be worth Rs. 4,000 and was purchased for Rs. 213.

The appeal must be dismissed. No order as to costs.

JUDGMENT.

GREAVES, J.—This is a reference by the Additional Sessions Judge of Hooghly, at Howrah, under the provisions of section 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, against an acquittal of the accused Sashi Bhusan Maity by an unaminous verdict of the Jury on a charge under section 304 of the Indian Penal Code.

The case for the prosecution is that, as the result of a quarrel between Sashi Bhusan Maity, the accused, and his wife, Jnanoda, Jnanoda left her husband's house to go to her father's house; that the accused overtook Jnanoda on her way there; that high words passed between them, and that the accused seized a half burnt bamboo and with this inflicted severe injuries upon the head of Jnanoda, as the result of which she died immediately. It is suggested on behalf of the accused that Jnanoda met her death not as the result of any blows inflicted by her husband as the prosecution allege, but that she was the victim of a robbery and that, in the course of being robbed, she met with the violence which caused her death. It is necessary to examine the evidence which has been given by the prosecution to see if the evidence is sufficient for us to accept the reference that has been made to us.

Now, the material evidence consists of the evidence of a witness named Narain Dasi; she states that she knows Sashi and his wife and that in Aughrayan last, about 11 or 12 A. M., she was picking up cowdung on some open land and that she saw Sashi's wife come there and stand there; that then Sashi came and said something to her which she could not hear; that Shasi then began to beat her with a piece of charred bamboo, and that then she fell down. The witness said that she told Sashi not to beat her but that he continued to do so saying, "I will kill her and I will die with her."

The next witness is Kiron, a child, whose age is not stated. The learned Judge states that the witness appears too young to take an oath or give affirmation. She understands that she has to say what she saw and nothing else. She was neither affirmed nor was the oath administered. She states as follows:—

"I saw Sashi beat his wife with a bamboo like this, Exhibit 1. Then from fear I ran away I went there to pick up cowdung. I told my mother what had happened. Then many people ran towards the place. I know Saila, accused's daughter. She was also picking up cowdung at the time. Her mother told her to go and fetch a piece of cloth and to come back to her. Sashi then came and asked his wife whether she was going to come back or to remain away. She said she would not come back till he was dead. Thereupon Sashi struck her and she fell down.

Then there is the evidence of Jnanoda Dasi. She says that in last Agrahan, about midday, she was fishing. She heard cries and, leaving her net, she went to see what the matter was and she saw Sashi standing there and Jnanoda lying on the ground. Then Sashi went away and she was dead. In cross-examination she states that she did not see who struck Jnanoda. The evidence of the other witnesses, I do not think, needs any comment. But it will appear from the medical evidence that the blows struck were numerous and very severe. This is the evidence on which Sashi has to be convicted, if conviction there is to be. He made two confessions, in fact one extra-judicial, and a subsequent confession. This subsequent confession he withdrew; and, moreover, it is urged on his behalf that there was a Police Officer in the verandah inside at the time the confession was made. Then it is said that, so far as the eye-witnesses are concerned, the evidence of the child cannot be taken into account inasmuch as she was neither affirmed nor was an oath administered, and, it is said, having regard to the provisions of the Oaths Act to which we have been referred, that she is not a witness whose testimony can be taken into account. We have been referred to various cases on the subject. In Queen v. Seura Bhogta (1), a Full Bench case, it appears that the learned Chief Justice and the other learned Judges who formed the Full Bench, with the exception of Mr. Justice Jackson, considered that, having regard to the provisions of section 13 of the Oaths Act, the omission to administer an oath or affirmation, even if intentional, would be cured by the provisions of that section. We have been referred to the criticisms of that case made by Sir Francis Maclean in Nando Lal Bose v. Nistarini Dasi (2) and to the remarks made with regard to it in Nafar Sheikh v. Emperor (3).

It would appear that the decision of the Full Bench in the Bengal Law Reports which is, of course, binding on us would cover the case and make the evidence of this child admissible, but we think that, even apart from the evidence of this child, there is sufficient evidence on the record by which it is abundantly established that Sashi has been guilty of an offence under section 304 of the Indian Penal Code. Accordingly, in deciding this reference we can ignore the evidence of the child.

Then criticism is made against the evidence of the other witness, Narain Dasi, on the ground that there are discrepancies in her statements as to the place where she was at the time of the occurrence and we are referred to the fact that in one place in her deposition she stated that she was on the east of the Khal and in another place she stated that she saw the occurrence from Bidhu's house which is on the west of the cremation ground, and we are asked to infer from that, that she could not have seen the occurrence.

We do not think these criticisms really have any weight and we think the evidence of Narain Dasi and the evidence of Jnanoda abundantly establish the guilt of Sashi and it is not necessary for us, as I have already stated, to rely either on the evidence of the child or the extra judicial confession in this case.

We accept the reference and sentence the accused to rigorous imprisonment for a term of (7) seven years.

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 852 OF 1919.

February 11, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Martineau.

PANNA LAL—PETITIONER

versus

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 182—Giving false information—Statement made in answer to question—False allegation of bribe made against Sub-Inspector of Police to Deputy Superintendent—Offence.

Any false information given to a public servant with the intention mentioned in section 182, Indian Penal Code, is punishable under that section whether the information is volunteered by the informant or given in answer to questions put to him. [p. 820, col. 1.]

On being questioned by a Deputy Superintendent of Police petitioner made an allegation against a Sub-Inspector of the latter having accepted a bribe. This allegation was found to be false to the knowledge of the petitioner:

Held, that the petitioner was guilty of an offence under section 182 of the Penal Code. [p. 820, col. 2.]

Criminal revision from the order of the Sessions Judge, Ambala, dated the 25th March 1919, confirming that of the District Magistrate, Ambala, dated the 9th January 1919.

Bakshi Tek Chand, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner Panna Lal, a Municipal Commissioner of Sadhaura, in the Ambala District, has been convicted of an offence under section 182, Indian Penal Code.

On the 20th November 1917 he wrote a letter to the Deputy Inspector-General of Police, in which he said that the Sub-Inspector of Sadhaura and other persons were looting the people and that he was ready to prove this to the Deputy Inspector-General and the Superintendent. The Deputy Inspector-General forwarded the letter to the Superintendent of Police for recording Panna Lal's statement and for necessary action, and the Superintendent passed it on to the Deputy Superintendent, Khan Sahib Khan Ahmad Khan, for taking statements. The Deputy Superintendent, on the 13th December, recorded the statement of Panna Lal who made allegations as to bribes having been taken by the Sub-Inspector, and mentioned, among others, a bribe of Rs. 500, taken from one Mittar Sain. It is in respect of this last statement that the petitioner has been convicted, the Courts below finding that the information as to the Sub-Inspector having taken a bribe from Mittar Sain was false, that the petitioner believed it to be false, and that, by giving that information, he intended to induce the Deputy Superintendent of Police to use his lawful power to the injury of the Sub-Inspector.

The case has been carefully considered by the learned Sessions Judge, and I see no reason to differ from his findings on the facts, namely, that the petitioner's statement as to the Sub-Inspector having received a bribe from Mittar Sain was false, and that the petitioner believed it to be false. It is contended that the Sessions Judge was wrong in ignoring evidence as to other bribes alleged to have been taken by the Sub-Inspector, but I entirely agree with the learned Judge that such evidence is irrelevant in this case, which is confined to the matter of the bribes said to have been given by Mittar Sain.

The question arising for consideration is, whether the petitioner is entitled to be acquitted either (1) because the statement which he made to the Deputy Superintendent in regard to the bribe was not volunteered, but was made in answer to questions, or (2) because the Deputy Superintendent had no power to take action against the Sub-Inspector on the statement made to him, but had authority only to record statements.

With regard to the first point, the learned Counsel for petitioner relies on Mangu v. Emperor (1), in which it was held that the term "information" in section 182 of the Indian Penal Code means information that is volunteered, and is not intended to apply to a statement made in answer to questions put by a public servant.

Now, in the first place, it is to be observed that the statements which had been made in that case were made to a Police Officer in an investigation under the Criminal Procedure Code, and the learned Sessions Judge has rightly held that the ruling is, on that account, inapplicable, as a witness examined by a Police Officer under section 161 of the Criminal Procedure Code is bound to answer the questions put to him, whereas in the present case Panna Lal was not bound to make a statement when questioned by the Deputy Superintendent, who was making only a departmental inquiry and not an inquiry under the provisions of the Code.

In the second place, with all respect for the opinion of the learned Judge who decided the case cited above from the Punjab Law Reporter, I am unable to agree with his construction of the term "information" in section 182 of the Indian Penal Code. He points out that a person is not liable to be prosecuted for perjury for having made a false statement to the Police, and he argues that, as section 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that the statement, if taken down in writing, cannot be used as evidence, it would be an evasion of the law if the statement could be made the basis of a charge under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code.

The fact that a person cannot be held guilty of perjury for making a false statement when questioned by a Police Officer under section 161 of the Criminal Procedure Code appears to me to be no reason for holding that he cannot be convicted of an offence under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code in respect of that statement, if it is shown that he made the statement with the intention or knowledge mentioned in the section. As regards section 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the proviso to the section makes it clear that the prohibition against using the statement recorded by the investigating officer as evidence applies only to the use of the statement as evidence in the case in the investigation of which the statement was made. There is nothing to prevent the statement from being used as the basis of a charge under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code against the person who made it.

Chinna Ramana v. Emperor (2) has been cited, in which it was held that a statement made under section 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code in answer to questions put by a Police Officer cannot be made the basis of a prosecution under section 211, Indian Penal Code. But from this it would not follow that the person making the statement could not be convicted of an offence under section 182, for, as is pointed out in Rayan Kutti v. Emperor (3), there is a clear distinction between making a false charge, which is the offence dealt with in section 211, and giving false information.

In Queen-Empress v. Ramji Sajabarao (4) it was held that any false information given to a public servant with the intention mentioned in section 182, Indian Penal Code, is punishable under that section whether the information is volunteered by the informant or given in answer to questions put to him. This is, in my opinion, a correct view of the law, there being nothing in the section itself to show that the word "information" was meant to be restricted to information that is volunteered.

I come now to the second point, which relates to the question of intention and knowledge. Mr. Tek Chand relies on Queen v. Periannan (5), in which it was held that section 182 of the Indian Penal Code does not apply where the public servant misinformed is only competent to pass on the information, and the powers to be exercised by him cannot tend to any direct or immediate prejudice of the person against whom the information is levelled. That case is, however, distinguishable from the present one. The authority of the Deputy Superintendent of Police was not limited to passing on to the Superintendent the information which the petitioner gave him. He had power to record statements and, on being told by the petitioner that Mittar Sain had given a bribe to the Sub-Inspector, he was competent to take the statements of Mittar Sain and the Sub-Inspector and of the persons mentioned by the petitioner as having knowledge about the matter. It would, in fact, have been natural for him to make such an inquiry, and, whatever the petitioner may have intended, it cannot be doubted that he knew it to be likely that his allegations about the bribes would lead the Deputy Superintendent to make an inquiry into the matter.

Even if it can be said that, in making such an inquiry, the Deputy Superintendent would not have been using his power to the injury of the Sub-Inspector (since "injury," as defined in section 44 of the Indian Penal Code, results only when harm is caused illegally) the inquiry was certainly calculated to cause annoyance to the Sub-Inspector, and this is sufficient to justify the conviction. The petitioner, by giving to the Deputy Superintendent information which was false and which he believed to be such, knowing it to be likely that he would thereby cause the Deputy Superintendent to use his lawful power to the annoyance of the Sub Inspector of Sadhaura, committed an offence under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code.

I accordingly dismiss the application.

NAGPUR JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 97 OF 1920.

July 21, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Batten, Officiating J. C.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT—

APPELLANT

JHAMSINGH—ACCUSED.

Accused person, who is—Witness discovered to be connected with offence, while giving evidence, whether competent witness—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860),

LOCAL GOVERNMENT v. JHAM SINGH.

420—Cheating during course of void transaction—Offence.

Where neither in a complaint nor in the Police Chalan is mention made of a person as one of those who committed the offence, the examination of such a person as a witness for the prosecution would not vitiate the trial, merely because the Court discovers, for the first time when he gives his evidence, that he might have been prosecuted. [p. 823, col. 1.]

The mere fact that a transaction does not amount to a legal contract because its object is unlawful and opposed to public policy, is no warrant for holding that no criminal offence can be committed in the course of the transaction. [p. 823, col. 1.]

A woman of the Rajput caste was represented by the accused to be a Kunbin, and the complainant, who wanted a wife, was induced to pay a sum of money to the accused for her and marry her:

Held, that the accused were guilty of the offence of cheating under section 420 of the Penal Code. [p. 823, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Sessions Judge, Nimar, in Criminal Appeal No. 63 of 1919, dated the 17th December 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. G. P. Dick, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—These are two connected appeals made under section 417, Criminal Procedure Code, on behalf of the Local Government. Four persons were tried together and, on the 7th October last, were convicted and sentenced as follows by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Harsud.

Bapu, Kunbi, age 35, rigorous imprisonment for two years, and a fine of Rs. 100 or, in default, rigorous imprisonment for three months, under section 420, Indian Penal Code.

Jhamsingh, Rajput, age 45, rigorous imprisonment for two years under section 420, Indian Penal Code.

Kishan, Kunbi, age 45, rigorous imprisonment for two years under section 420/109, Indian Penal Code.

Purnia, Pardhi, rigorous imprisonment for two years under sections 420/109, Indian Penal Code.

The facts found by the trying Magistrate are that, P. W. No. 2, Rukhdoo, a Kunbi cultivator of Khandwa, wanted to get a wife for his son Himmat. He met the above four accused in a house at Khandwa, they had with them a girl Jhunni, P. W. No. 3, aged about 20, who is the daughter of Jhamsingh, and has been proved to be and admittedly is of Rajput caste and is the widow of a Rajput. Bapu and Jhamsingh and the other accused represented that Jhunni was a widow of Kunbi caste. Bapu represented himself to be the maternal uncle of Jhunni, though he is no relation, and a Kunbi. Believing Jhunni was a Kunbi Rukhdoo paid Rs. 511; in his own words, he purchased the girl for that price. The money was paid to Bapu. Jhunni describes the transaction somewhat differently, saying that it is customary for "us Rajputs" to demand a dowry from the bridegroom's father in the case of "pat" marriages. It is proved that all four accused came from the Buldana District of Buldana, though they seem to have given out that they came from Khandesh.

The girl was married by "pat" to Himmat, but afterwards Rukhdoo learnt that he had been cheated, as Jhunni was in fact not of Kunbi caste but of Rajput caste.

Jhamsingh admitted all the facts, but pleaded that he had throughout acted under the influence and advice of Bapu. Bapu contented himself with denying the truth of all the prosecution evidence, but called no evidence in support of his plea of alibi.

Bapu and Jhamsingh, with whose cases we are concerned, appealed to the Sessions Judge, Nimar, who acquitted them both in one judgment. The relevant portions of his judgment, dated 17th December 1919, run as follows:—

"It is proved by the evidence adduced that a girl was sold with her own consent to the complainant as a Kunbi girl, and that, as a matter of fact, she was a Rajput girl. It has also been proved that the complainant paid the sum of Rs. 511 for the girl and it is a certain inference that he would not have paid this sum unless he had been induced to believe that the girl was a Kunbin. It remains thus to decide whether, legally, any offence was committed and, if so, what part, if any, the present appellants took in it.

"The chief point argued in the appeal was that as the contract to sell the girl was, in any case, immoral and illegal it could not be made the basis of a suit for specific performance and, consequently, no criminal prosecution could be brought. A reference was made to the ruling reported in Emperor v. Jani Hira (1). The present case, however, is different from the case mentioned in that ruling because, in that case, it has been held that there was no intention of cheating at the time of the agreement but only a subsequent breach of contract, whereas in the present case it must, I think, be held that at the time of the bargain there was a distinct misrepresentation with respect to the caste of the girl sold and a fraudulent intention. At the same time, I am of opinion that a criminal prosecution cannot be sustained. The contract was, at any rate, if not an immoral one an invalid one as being illegal. The law does not allow of the sale of a woman even if it be for a legitimate purpose, such as marriage. It is clear that if there had been any breach of the contract neither party would have had any remedy in the Civil Court. I do not then think that either party can bring a criminal prosecution for any fraud or misrepresentation with regard to the contract. A party who enters into such a contract must do so at his own risk and the law will not help him. Nor, I think, can it rightly be held that the Crown is the complainant or prosecutor in such a case. The principal offence committed was the illegal contract and if in that illegal contract a further offence of cheating was committed the State cannot be called in to help either party. Otherwise the State, as it were, becomes a party to the illegal contract. The assistance of the State cannot be invoked against its own laws."

The Local Government has appealed against the acquittal of Bapu and Jhamsingh on the ground that, on the concurrent findings of fact arrived at by the lower Courts, the respondents were clearly guilty of an offence of cheating under section 420, Indian Penal Code.

The two accused were produced before this Court on the 10th May last. As P. W. No. 3 Musammat Jhunni admittedly abetted the fraud by keeping silence when she was falsely described as a Kunbin, she was an accomplice, and might have been prosecuted. In Govinda v. Emperor (2) it was held by Mittra, A. J. C., that under section 204 of the Criminal Procedure Code the Magistrate taking cognisance of the offence is bound to proceed against all the accused if there was a prima facie case, and, though he has an option to proceed jointly or separately, it is not within his discretion not to proceed at all. It was also held that a pardon may be offered to one or more of the accused only in the manner prescribed by law, and if such pardon has not been given, and an accused who has not been proceeded against is thereby made a competent witness in the trial of the others, the trial is bad and the conviction must be set aside. I understood the judgment to mean that, if any person who might have been prosecuted for participation in the offence and who had not been pardoned according to law or whose prosecution had not been withdrawn under section 494, Criminal Procedure Code, appears as a witness for the prosecution the trial is bad. Another Judge of this Court attributed the same meaning to the ruling, and a case before him was referred to a Full Bench for a decision as to whether the view of law taken in the ruling was correct. The hearing of these two appeals was, therefore, postponed until after the proposed decision of the Full Bench. The matter was discussed with Mittra, A. J. C., whose recent sudden death is so much to be deplored. He made it clear that his ruling had been misunderstood, and that it should be read strictly in reference to the facts of the case before him. In that case, the Police in their petition, on which the criminal proceedings were started, distinctly alleged that one Sakharam and the five accused were members of one gang and that they jointly fabricated a mortgage-deed. Sakharam, however, was never arrested nor brought to trial in the Criminal Court, and was examined as a witness though no steps were ever taken to give him a conditional pardon under section 337, Criminal Procedure Code. It was explained that the reason why the Magistrate was bound to issue process against Sakharam was that the petition of complaint accused him of having taken a main part in the crime, and as there was a prima facie case the Magistrate was bound, under section 204, Criminal Procedure Code, to proceed against him as an accused person. It was also explained that this line of argument does not extend to cases in which the Court discovers for the first time when a witness gives evidence that he might have been prosecuted, and he is not specifically mentioned in the complaint or Police Chalan as one of the persons who committed the offence. A scrutiny of the ruling shows that I misunderstood the judgment of Mittra, A. J. C. The matter has been mentioned at length here as there is reason to believe that other Courts in the Province may take a a wrong view of the scope of Govinda v. Emperor (2). The reference to the Full Bench was withdrawn.

In the present case it was not mentioned in the Police charge sheet that Jhunni was herself an accomplice in the offence, and according to the true meaning of Govinda v. Emperor (2) the trial has not been vitiated by her having been examined as witness. According to the ruling, she is a competent witness. Bapu and Jhamsingh, it should be said, have been allowed bail during the pendency of the appeals against them.

It is to be observed that the learned Sessions Judge has cited no authority in support of the view he has taken.

In holding that the agreement, made on the assumption that Musammat Jhunni was a Kunbin, was illegal, the learned Sessions Judge evidently referred to the provisions of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act. The object of such an agreement would be unlawful, being opposed to public policy (Vide Kalavagunta Venkata Kristnayya v. Kalavagunta Lakshmi Narayana (3)) and the agreement would be void. There is, however, no warrant for the view that no criminal offence can be committed in the course of a transaction which does not amount to a legal contract because its object is unlawful as being opposed to public policy. I am not now concerned with transactions in the course of a criminal offence: to accept or to give money for the purpose of an adult girl being given in lawful marriage is not, as the Sessions Judge seems to think, a criminal offence. We have to look to the wording of the sections of the Indian Penal Code relating to the offence of cheating. The action of the accused in this case certainly comes within the definition of cheating in section 415, Indian Penal Code, and in cheating they dishonestly induced Rukhdoo to deliver money within the meaning of section 420. In Queen v. Kamul Dass (4), Queen v. Puddomonie Boistobee (5), Queen v. Dabee Sing (6), Queen v. Dhunput Ojhab (7) and Empress v. Sheoram (8) the facts were on all fours with those of the present case. It is possible to suppose that the learned Judges who decided those cases overlooked the principles of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act.

The learned Pleader who appears for Bapu relies on the case cited by the learned Sessions Judge, but in that case the ingredients of cheating were absent. I am of opinion that the learned Sessions Judge took a wrong view of the law.

As for the facts I have no doubt whatever from the record that the view taken by the trying Magistrate is correct. The case for the prosecution is proved to the hilt. It is suggested by the learned Pleader that 'Rajput' is only a territorial name, not the name of a caste, but it has been proved and admitted that Jhunni was not a Kunbin, and that Rukhdoo would not have parted with his money unless she had falsely been alleged to be a

For these reasons, I set aside the orders of the Sessions Judge acquitting Bapu and Jhamsingh and find them both guilty under section 420 of the offence with which they have been charged. They have both already undergone rigorous imprisonment for two months and six days. Bapu has also been bound over to be of good behaviour.

I sentence Bapu and Jhamsingh each to suffer rigorous imprisonment for six months in addition to the period of two months and six days already undergone, under section 420, Indian Penal Code. I also order Bapu to pay a fine of Rs. 100, and, if this sum has not been paid or is not paid, to suffer rigorous imprisonment for a further term of three months. This is the same fine as was imposed by the Magistrate and not an additional fine.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 403, 405, 408—Clerk, misappropriation by—Offence.

Accused was in the service of an Estate as clerk and as such he was entrusted with dominion over money only to receive and pay it into the treasury on receiving it: he received a sum of money and misappropriated it to his own use and was convicted of an offence under section 403 of the Penal Code:

Held, that the offence fell within the definition of criminal breach of trust in section 405 of the Penal Code, and that the conviction should have been under section 408 of that Code.

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Court of the Sub-Divisional, 1st Class Magistrate, Vizianagaram, in C. C. No. 89 of 1918.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. T. V. Venkatarama Aiyar, for the Petitioner:—The lower Court should have convicted the accused under section 408, Indian Penal Code and not under section 403, Indian Penal Code. All the elements necessary to constitute an offence under the former section are present in this case. The accused was a clerk of the Estate. Under the terms of his service he was bound to pay the moneys that he collected into the Treasury. It is not only a case of a mere failure to account to the Estate for moneys received on its behalf. He abused his position. He was only to receive the moneys and pass it on to the Treasury. The case clearly falls within the definition of criminal breach of trust in section 405, Indian Penal Code. See also Basiruddin Ahmed v. Emperor (1).

Mr. C. Sambasiva Rao, for the Accused referred to the case reported in Queen-Empress v. Ramakrishna (2).

ORDER.—I am inclined to think that the offence committed by the accused properly fell under section 408, Indian Penal Code. He was a clerk in the service of the Estate and the money in question came into his hands because he was authorised by the Estate Authorities to receive such moneys, on their behalf and he was to pay the money to the Estate Treasury on receiving it.

The money when received by him was not his money for which he had merely to account to the Estate, but it was actually the Estate money over which he was entrusted with dominion only to receive and to pay into the treasury by his contract of service. That being so, his offence, when he dishonestly misappropriated it himself, is one clearly falling within the definition of criminal breach of trust in section 405, Indian Penal Code. See the ruling in Basiruddin Ahmed v. Emperor (1) which I follow. In the case in Queen Empress v. Ramakrishna (2) the learned Judges did not really consider whether section 403 or section 408, Indian Penal Code, applied. The question they discussed was whether any dishonest misappropriation was made out at all in the circumstances of that case and they held that it was. In fact, some of a observations of the learned Judges would seem to appropriately apply only to the case of criminal breach of trust. I do not think, therefore, that the case is any authority in deciding whether the offence is one under section 403 or one of criminal breach of trust. The accused should, I think, have been convicted under section 408, Indian Penal Code.

I am, however, of opinion that it is not necessary in this case to alter the conviction from section 403, Indian Penal Code, to section 408, Indian Penal Code, and enhance his sentence by awarding him imprisonment as well. As considerable time has elapsed since the date of the conviction, I think it is not necessary to do this in this case. The revision petition is, therefore dismissed.

It is not necessary that the witness should have protested against the question. [p. 826, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Sessions Judge of Agra, dated the 24th January 1920.

Mr. Ram Nam Prasad, for the Applicants.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The five applicants, Chatur Singh, Tula Ram, Johri, Pothi and Sri Chand have been convicted each of an offence under section 500 of the Indian Penal Code and have been sentenced to a fine of Rs. 51 each or, in default, to undergo one month's rigorous imprisonment. These five persons were called as witnesses in a certain case. As the learned Sessions Judge has pointed out, the question in that case was whether one Lallu Singh had been to a certain house. The question was relevant to the case and, in order to prove that he had not been to that house, these five persons were called to prove that he could not have gone there because he had been outcasted by reason of what is known as a dharicha marriage, with his uncle's wife. In that case Lallu Singh was a witness for the prosecution and the present five applicants were witnesses for the defence and, apparently, they were called to disprove the statement of Lallu Singh in order that the accused might be acquitted. In the result, the accused was acquitted. Thereupon, Lallu Singh made a complaint against these five persons charging them under section 500 of the Indian Penal Code in that they had falsely stated that he had been outcasted for the reasons mentioned above. The Magistrate who tried the case found that the statement of outcasting was untrue because he found it satisfactorily established by evidence that a dharicha marriage of this description is common in the caste and did not constitute a reason for outcasting. He, therefore, held that the statements made by these persons in the former case were untrue and, therefore, defamatory and he convicted and fined the accused as above stated.

The learned Sessions Judge on appeal upheld the convictions. Two points were taken before him which have also been taken before this Court. The first was, that the statements made by these persons were privileged statements and that they were compelled to answer the questions put to them when they were called as witnesses; that the questions were relevant to the trial which was then before the Court and that, therefore, under section 132 of the Indian Evidence Act, they were protected and could not be prosecuted for any offence other than that of perjury. The second point taken was, that the trial of these five persons in one joint trial was illegal as each man was solely responsible for his own statement and not for the statements of his other co-accused.

The learned Sessions Judge held that the accused persons could not claim the protection of section 132 of the Indian Evidence Act because they had not protested when the question was put to them but answered it voluntarily. His judgment runs as follows:—"The question as to whether Lallu Singh had been to a certain house was relevant in that case and an attempt was made to show that he could not have gone to the house as he was an outcaste. Under section 132 of the Evidence Act the witnesses could have been compelled to answer the questions that were put to them but it appears that they took no objection when the questions were put and so, according to the interpretation placed upon the law by the various High Courts, they were not entitled to the protection afforded by the proviso to that section." The rulings to which the learned Sessions Judge probably referred, though he does not say so, are to be found in Queen v. Gopal Doss (1) and Queen-Empress v. Moss (2).

(1) 3 M. 271; 2 Weir 782; 1 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 744.

(2) 16 A. 88; A. W. N. (1894) 23; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 58.

Perhaps, also, the Judge may have had in his mind the decision of this Court in Kallu v. Sital (3). My attention has also been called to the decision of a single Judge of this Court which is to be found in Ganga Sahai v. Emperor (4).

As regards the Madras case, it will be noticed that it was a Full Bench case. Only three Judges were in favour of the interpretation of the law given by the learned Chief Justice, whereas two Judges differed from that interpretation. The decision in Kallu v. Sital (3) was also a decision of a single Judge of this Court. The point deals with the meaning of the word "compelled." The question was discussed in the case of Kallu v. Sital (3), mentioned above, by Mr. Justice Piggott of this Court and a quotation from his judgment was made by Mr. Justice Walsh in his judgment in Ganga Sahai v. Emperor (4). I, personally, have no doubt whatsoever that the accused persons in the present case were compelled, within the meaning of the law, to answer the questions put to them when they entered the witness-box. A voluntary statement by a witness may stand on a totally different footing to an answer given by him as a witness on oath to a question put to him either by the Court or Counsel on either side, specially when the question is on a point which is relevant to the case. It would be too much to ask of an ordinary layman that he should know all the terms of section 132 of the Indian Evidence Act and that he should be prepared to protest against every question put to him in order to protect himself under that section. I think, if a common sense meaning be given to the word "compelled" in section 132, it is clear that in the present case these five persons were compelled to answer. They were under the direct compulsion of the law and, of the Court and, in my opinion, they were protected by that section.

As regards the second point, the learned Sessions Judge remarks that "it follows that these defamatory statements being similar to one another must have been made in concert and as the result of conspiracy. That being so, the joint trial appears to me to be proper." Excepting the similarity of the statements and the fact that the Court of first instance has, on a somewhat flimsy ground, held them to be untrue there is nothing else to indicate conspiracy. If it had been necessary, I should have been compelled to send the case back for re-trial of the accused separately. However, no order on this point is necessary as, in my opinion, they are protected by the law as laid down under section 132 of the Indian Evidence Act and they cannot be convicted of defamation. I, therefore, allow, this application, set aside the convictions and sentences and direct that the fines, if paid, be refunded.

In arriving at a decision in a case under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the question is not whether the evidence for the defence outweighs the evidence for the prosecution but whether the evidence for the prosecution is sufficient to establish the case against the accused and the Court ought to come to a definite finding on that point. [p. 527, col. 2.]

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Suresh Chandra Talukdar (with him Babu Jitendranath Sanyal), for Petitioners.—The Rule was directed against an order under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code. There were 110 witnesses examined altogether. 54 being for the prosecution and 56 for the defence. Nearly the whole of the evidence bears out the good character of the accused. In spite of that the learned Sub-Divisional Officer bound them down for good behaviour. The District Magistrate on appeal held that the prosecution was not balanced and far less outweighed by the defence evidence. I submit the Magistrate has misdirected himself as to the point to be determined in cases under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code. It is not whether the prosecution evidence is balanced or not by defence evidence but whether the charge has been brought home to the accused. I submit there ought to be a fresh trial.

JUDGMENT.—The case must go back for re-hearing of the appeal.

The case was one under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code. Fifty-four witnesses were examined for the prosecution and 56 for the defence. The learned Magistrate no doubt says that "the Sub-Divisional Officer was right in his conclusion that all the four accused had the reputation of being burglars and thieves." In an earlier passage the learned Magistrate referred to the finding of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and observed: "He believed in the evidence of about 20 witnesses for prosecution and found that it was not balanced and far less outweighed by the defence evidence."

The question, however, was not whether the evidence for the defence outweighed the evidence for the prosecution but whether the evidence for the prosecution was sufficient to establish the case against the petitioner and we think that the learned Magistrate ought to have come to a more definite finding.

The case is, therefore, sent back to the learned District Magistrate for re-hearing of the appeal in so far as the petitioner Sadat Ali is concerned on the merits according to law.

The petitioner Sadat Ali will be admitted to bail, pending the re hearing of the appeal, to the satisfaction of the District Magistrate.

Where the period stipulated in a contract under the Workman's Breach of Contract Act has expired, but a portion of an advance made thereunder to the workman remains due, a Court has no power to enforce the contract for a period beyond that stipulated for in order to work out the balance due. Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the Third Presidency Magistrate, George Town, Madras, in Calendar Case No. 18767 of 1919.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. K. Doraiswami Aiyangar, for the Petitioner.—The order of the lower Court is illegal. The respondent has come to Court after the 10 months stipulated in the contract for work to be done by the petitioner. The Courts cannot enforce performance of work after the period provided for in the agreement. The matter is concluded by authority. AYLING, J.—This is a case under the Workman's Breach of Contract Act (XIII of 1859). ceased to work in April 1919. Respondent on 3rd October 1919 (more than 10 months after the contract) complained to the Magistrate, who, on 2nd December 1919, directed petitioner to resume work from next day and work out the balance of Rs. 5-8 0.

Petitioner's Vakil argued that the order is illegal inasmuch as the work ordered to be performed is not according to the terms of the contract which provided only for work within a period of 10 months from its date. If the matter were 'res integra' I should be disinclined to interfere with the order, but I find no less than four decisions of this Court which lend support to the petitioner's case and nothing on the other side. Two of them Criminal Revision Cases Nos. 777 and 779 of 1883 reported as [Chikka Putta, In re (1), Matha Goundan, In re (2)] might be distinguished on the ground that the contracts in those cases fixed a terminal date for the conclusion of the period of work but this cannot be said of Criminal Revision Case No. 183 of 1884, reported on page 706, [Kadapanatham Munigadu, In re (3)] which is exactly on all fours with the present case, except that there was a much greater delay in having recourse to the Court. This, however, did not affect the decision. The fourth case reported in the authorized series, Queen-Empress v. Konda (4) is only direct authority for the proposition that re-payment of the advance can be enforced after expiry of the contract period; but the remarks of the learned Judges certainly imply that they regarded the alternative remedy as unenforceable.

These rulings have been accepted and followed for so long that I do not feel justified in dissenting from them especially as respondent in the present case, who has not appeared to contest the petition, has another remedy.

I would set aside the order of the Magistrate and direct petitioner to re-pay the balance of advance within one moth from this date.

Where a tenant in the bona fide assertion of a customary right, without intending to cause wrongful loss to the zemindar or knowing it to be likely to do so, cuts down an ancient tree admittedly standing on his holding, he cannot be convicted of the offence of mischief punishable under section 426 of the Penal Code. Criminal revision against the order of the District Magistrate, Farrukhabad, dated the 5th of January 1920.

Mr. Ajudhia Nath, for the Applicants.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application by Pitam Singh, Behari and Lalta Prasad, three tenants, who have been convicted of having committed an offence of mischief, punishable under section 426, Indian Penal Code, by cutting down an ancient tree admittedly standing upon their holding. The trial Court was of opinion that the three accused were guilty of mischief because, in the absence of evidence of a special custom, the property in the tree vested in the Zemindar, who was the complainant in the case. There was some evidence of a special custom and witnesses, who have apparently been believed by the trial Court, deposed that the tenants were in the habit of lopping branches from the tree when they needed wood for agricultural purposes. I have allowed the evidence on the question of custom to be completed by the production in this Court of a certified copy of an extract from the village Record of Rights. I am not quite clear whether evidence was or was not given in the trial Court as to the provisions of this wajib ul-arz. In appeal the learned District Magistrate seems to have thought that the case was probably one of theft rather than of mischief, but that he was not called upon to interfere with the conviction or the sentences of fine imposed. If the accused had been convicted of theft questions would have arisen as to the possession over this tree which it might have been difficult to answer in the sense desired by the prosecution. I can only deal with the conviction as it stands, with reference to the definition in section 425, Indian Penal Code. I have first to consider whether wrongful loss was caused to the Zemindar by the felling of this tree. If this were a civil suit by the Zamindar for damages, I very much doubt whether he could have recovered damages on account of the felling of this tree, in view of the evidence as to the customary rights enjoyed by the tenants in respect of the same. At any rate, I do not think the accused intended to cause wrongful loss to the Zemindar, or knew that they were likely to do so. They believed themselves to be acting within their rights. The Magistrate attaches considerable importance to the fact that they persisted in felling the tree although warned not to do so by some servants of the Zamindar. I do not think this has any real bearing on the question whether the accused persons were acting in good faith, in the assertion of a bona fide claim. I do not think this conviction is warranted by the evidence on the record or by the findings of the trial Court. I set aside the conviction as against all three applicants and the sentences passed. The fines, if paid, will be refunded.

Where a Judge's charge to a Jury is calculated to confuse them, the verdict of the Jury cannot be allowed to stand and the accused must be re-tried.

Mr. Orr, Deputy Legal Remembrancer, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—In this case we have read the learned Sessions Judge's charge to the Jury. The learned Counsel for the Crown, when we put the question to him, was constrained to admit that the charge was rather confusing. Speaking for myself, I should go further than the learned Counsel for the Crown. In my judgment, so far from this summing up making the case clear to the Jury giving them assistance, it was calculated to confuse them and, having read it, I have come to the conclusion that it would not be safe for us to allow this verdict to stand. The result is that we must set aside the verdict and the sentences upon the two appellants and direct that the case, as regards these two accused, Edon Karikar and Ofazuddi Karikar, should be re-tried.

It appears that the Jury returned a verdict unanimously. They found that Edon Karikar and Ofazuddi Karikar were each guilty under sections 325 and 148 of the Indian Penal Code: they found that none of the other accused was guilty of any offence as the Jury gave each of the other accused the benefit of the doubt as to whether he was present or not. It is a perfectly clear verdict. The learned Judge then, as I understand from the record which is now before us, proceeded to ask them certain questions, one of which was,—"I should like your opinions, if you will give them, as to how the three kabuliyats came into existence." Upon the information which is before us at the present moment, I do not understand why these questions were asked. It does not seem to us that they could have been asked by the learned Judge in pursuance of section 303 of the Criminal Pro-sedure Code, because that section applies only to the cases where questions are neces sary to ascertain what the verdict of the Jury is. In this case, as I have already remarked, the verdict of the Jury was clear, and I do not understand that there was any necessity to ask questions for the purpose of ascertaining what that verdict was. I refrain from saying anything more, because there may be some explanation why the learned Judge asked those questions, which is not apparent at the present moment and, I must content myself with saying that I do not understand why those questions were asked.

The result is that the conviction and sentences must be set aside, and the case, as regards the two appellants, must be remanded for a new trial.

WALMSLEY, J.—I agree.

Section 91 of the Evidence Act bars the admission of secondary evidence to prove a statement made by a witness, where the statement was not read over in the presence of the witness as required by Order XVIII, rule 5 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Criminal revision from the order of the Sessions Judge, Sialkot, dated the 20th November 1919, reversing that of the Magistrate, 1st Class, discharging the accused.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, for the Petitioner.

Lala Duni Chand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner in this case is accused of having made a false statement on oath in the Court of the Munsif. The Munsif has stated in evidence in the present trial that this statement was not read out to the witness. The first Court referred to Kahn Singh v. Empress (1), Kamatchinathan Chetty v. Emperor (2), and Kartar Singh v. Emperor (3), and, following the last ruling, held that where the statement had not been read out there could be no conviction under section 193, Indian Penal Code. So the Magistrate discharged the accused.

The learned Sessions Judge held that there was no conflict between the two Punjab rulings, and referred to a later Punjab ruling Emperor v. Jagat Ram (4), and quashed the order of discharge and remanded the case for the admission of secondary evidence to prove the making of the statement.

The question for my decision is, whether such secondary evidence is admissible in a case where the evidence has not been read over in the presence of the witness as required by Order XVIII, rule 5 of the Civil Procedure Code.

In Empress v. Mayadeb Gossami (5) it is held that in such a case secondary evidence is barred by section 91 of the Evidence Act. Mohendra Nath Misser v. Emperor (6) is also favour of the petitioner. So is Nalluri Chenchiah, In re (7). There is an older ruling Kamatchinathan Chetty v. Emperor (2), which also holds that secondary evidence is inadmissible.

For respondent reliance is placed on the following rulings: Ramesh Chandra Das v. Emperor (8), Emperor v. Jagat Ram (4) and Kahn Singh v. Empress (1). The first case is not in point, for there the statement was read over by the witness, and this was held to be sufficient ; there was, therefore, no need to prove the statement by secondary evidence. In Emperor v. Jagat Ram (4), too, no question as to the admissibility of secondary evidence was raised. The only ruling which, in my opinion, favours the respondent is Kahn Singh v. Empress (1).

The weight of authority is clearly in favour of the petitioner, and I hold that secondary evidence is not admissible.

I accept this application for revision, and, setting aside the order of the learned Sessions Judge, I restore the order of the Magistrate discharging the petitioner.

A person who escapes from a jail in which he is confined under a warrant under section 123 of the Criminal Procedure Code, by reason of his having failed to find security to be of good behaviour should be convicted under section 225 B of the Penal Code and not under section 224.

Criminal revision from the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Agra at Muttra.

Mr. S. C. Mookerjee, for the Applicant.

The Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—Mooli has been convicted on a charge under section 224 of the Indian Penal Code, of having escaped from a jail in which he was confined under a warrant under section 123 of the Criminal Procedure Code, by reason of his having failed to find security to be of good behaviour. The old ruling of this Court in Queen-Empress v.

Kandhaia (1) seems to hold good to this extent that the applicant Mooli was not being detained for any offence, and, consequently, the conviction against him should not have been recorded under section 224 of the Indian Penal Code. The decision above referred to, along with one or two similar decisions of the Calcutta High Court, were regarded as pointing to an error of omission on the part of the Legislature and, led, amongst other changes in the law, to the enactment of section 225 (B) of the Indian Penal Code. The conviction in this case should undoubtedly have been recorded under that section and the sentence cannot exceed the maximum provided by section 225 (B). I do not propose to reduce it below the maximum period specified in that section, because this was an escape from a jail and the escape of a person imprisoned for want of furnishing security to be of good behaviour is a serious matter. I direct that the conviction in this case be recorded under section 225 (B) of the Indian Penal Code and the sentence reduced to one of rigorous imprisonment for six (6) months.

Rule on the District Magistrate, Faridpur, to show cause why the order of Sadr Munsif, Faridpur, dated 18th November 1919, should not be set aside.

Babu Monmothanath Mookerjee, for the Petitioners.

Babus Dasarathi Sanyal, Sateendra Nath Mookerjee and Kamini Kumar Sarkar, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—In this case a Rule was granted to the petitioners calling upon the District Magistrate and on the opposite party to show cause why the present order should not be set aside and the matter re considered by the Munsif, allowing the petitioners to cross-examine the peon and to produce the documents which they had already produced.

The matter arose in connection with an application by certain decree-holders for sanction to prosecute the judgment-debtors and certain other persons who are alleged to have forcibly released certain properties that had been seized by a peon of the learned Munsif's Court on the strength of a writ of attachment issued in a money execution case, and also to have assaulted the peon and criminally intimidated him and the decree-holder's men. The matter first came before the learned Munsif, according to the record which is now before us, on the 31st of May 1919 when he directed that a notice should be issued upon the opposite parties directing them to show cause, within a week of receiving the same, why they should not be criminally prosecuted. The matter was allowed to drag on until the 18th of November 1919, roughly speaking about six months. At one time the learned Munsif apparently had made up his mind that he would hear the witnesses on both sides, and he adjourned the case from time to time in order that those witnesses might attend, but eventually, on the 18th of November 1919, he granted sanction, and he came to the conclusion that it was not necessary to hold an elaborate enquiry in connection with the application, and apparently the only witness who was examined before him was the peon. The learned Munsif came to the conclusion that a prima facie case had been made out upon the evidence of the peon against the three petitioners and he therefore granted sanction to prosecute them. It, therefore, seems to me that he might have done within a week of the notice being served what he took six months to do. He might have examined the peon within a reasonably short time after the notice had been served and if he had come to the conclusion then that the peon had made out a prima facie case he might have granted sanction. He took six months to come to the same conclusion. On appeal, the learned District Judge refused to revoke the sanction.

I desire to say that the facts connected with this application disclose a lamentable state of affairs. That a simple application for sanction to prosecute the three petitioners, which, as I have already pointed out, was disposed of upon the evidence of one witness only, should take six months before a final conclusion is arrived at is nothing short of lamentable, and I sincerely hope that such a thing will not come to my notice again.

It is unnecessary for me to deal with the question of jurisdiction which was raised by Mr. Sanyal on behalf of the opposite party, because, in my judgment, on the merits this Rule ought to be discharged. In my judgment it was within the jurisdiction of the learned Munsif, if he was satisfied on the evidence of the peon that he had made out a prima facie case for the prosecution of the petitioners, to sanction the prosecution. The only thing to be complained of is that he ought have done within a short time what he took nearly six months to do.

For these reasons the Rule is discharged.

WALMSLEY, J.—I agree.

The right of a widow under Muhammadan Law to take and keep possession of her husband's estate in lieu of dower is property and is both heritable and transferable. The transferee of such a right has, therefore, the same right which the widow had and his possession is that of a mortgagee and is not adverse to that of the other heirs of the deceased. [p 864, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Azamgarh, dated the 26th May 1917.

Mr. Iqbal Ahmad, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Nehal Chand and Mukhtar Ahmad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts which have given rise to this appeal are, briefly, as follows. One Sheikh Bakhshu, who owned a 13-bigha, 8 biswa and 10 dhur share, died after the Mutiny, leaving his two sons, Kadir and Amir as his heirs. Amir left a widow, Musammat Azima, defendant No. 5, and a minor son Abdullah, plaintiff, as his heirs. Musammat Azima took possession of the whole of the estate of Amir, deceased, that is, of 1-8th in her own right as an heiress and of 7-8th in lieu of her dower. Later on, Musammat Azima married her deceased husband's brother Kadir. So that, as far as actual possession of the estate of Sheikh Bakhshu was concerned, it was with Azima and Kadir. On the 7th of February 1872 these two persons transferred half of the property which originally belonged to Sheikh Bakshu to Sheikh Rosai. One of the points for decision in this appeal would be, as to what was sold under this deed and what effect the deed would have on the rights of the respective parties to this appeal.

The plaintiff's case is that, what was actually sold was the half share of Amir over which Azima was in possession as mortgagee, and that Rosai and after him his representatives, defendants Nos. 1 to 4, have continued in possession as mortgagees; that the plaintiff asked them to return the mortgaged share on payment of a reasonable amount, but the defendants aforesaid refused and hence this suit. Defendant No. 5, Musammat Azima, the widow of Amir, has been impleaded on the inexplicable ground that she did not join in the suit. The contesting defendants Nos. 1 to 4 pleaded that what was actually sold was the property which was owned and possessed by Kadir and Amir, implying that the mortgagee-rights were not transferred as alleged by the plaintiffs. They further pleaded that Rosai and, after him, they had been in adverse possession as proprietors. They also pleaded in bar Article 134 of the Second Schedule of the Limitation Act, IX of 1908. We are not concerned with the other pleas raised in defence. The Munsif of Azamgarh came to the conclusion that the deed, taken as a whole, clearly shows that it purported to transfer a portion of that share which was held by the vendors as absolute owners. He further held that, Musammat Azima sold 14 biswas, 17 dhurs which she owned as a proprietor and the remainder out of the 6 bighas, 14 biswas, and 5 dhurs sold under the deed of 1872 was the property of Kadir. He, further, found that the defendants and their predecessor in-title had been in possession as absolute owners since 1872. A portion of the property in dispute had been transferred by the widow of Rosai, the vendee, by deed of gift, so far back as 25th of July 1899, and the defendants and their transferees had been claiming the absolute ownership of the land from the very beginning. In the result, he dismissed the suit. The plaintiff went up in appeal, contested the finding of the Munsif as to the interpretation put by him on the sale-deed claiming that the property which Musammat Azima sold was the property over which she was in possession in lieu of her dower-debt, that is to say, as a mortgagee and no question of adverse possession arose in the case. The District Judge, Mr. Mundle, was of opinion that the wording of the sale-deed was very ambiguous and was capable of several interpretations, but he did not come to any finding as to what was actually sold, inasmuch as he was of opinion that, having regard to the ruling reported as Muhammat

ABDULLAH v. SHAMSUL HAQ.

Husain v. Bashiran (1) a decision of this question was immaterial, inasmuch as a widow in possession in lieu of dower could only transfer her possessory right along with the claim of dower and not otherwise, and, as there was no assignment of the dower-debt in this case, the possession of the transferee could not be that of a mortgagee. It could only be adverse and the claim was barred by limitation. He, therefore, dismissed the appeal.

The plaintiff comes here in second appeal. His first contention is, that Musammat Azima sold her possessory right in the property of Amir, and, secondly, that the claim was not barred by limitation. The case has been argued fully and with great ability by Mr. Iqbal Ahmad for the appellant and Mr. Mukhtar Ahmad for the respondent. The first question we have to decide is, what was, as a matter of fact, transferred under this deed. The deed begins with a recital that the property, namely, 13 bighas, 8 biswas and 10 dhurs, was "the ancestral property of the executants over which Sheikh Kadir was in possession as an heir and Musammat Azima was in possession both as an heiress and in lieu of dower. Out of the aforesaid property we sell half, that is 6 bighas, 14 biswas and 5 dhurs to Sheikh Rosai, etc." Now, at first sight, and according to the ordinary rules of interpretation, it would appear that Kadir sold half out of the 6 bighas and odd aforesaid and Azima sold the remaining half which included part of both the proprietary and possessory rights which she had in it; that is to say, her 1/8th share as owner and her 7/8th share of which she was the possessor. So that, in any event, the plaintiff's suit must fail as to the $\frac{1}{2}$ plus 1/6th that is 9/10th of the property in suit. The next question which naturally arises is as to what is the legal consequence of the transfer by the lady of her possessory right in the 7/16th mentioned above. It has been contended on behalf of the respondents that the widow could not have transferred her right to possession apart from the dower debt; and reliance is placed on the case of Mohammad Husain v. Bashiran (1). It is sufficient to say that the ground on which the older cases were differentiated was that in the older cases the suit had been brought in the lifetime of the widow. The present case has, as is clear from the facts stated above, been brought during the lifetime of the widow and, therefore, strictly speaking, the case in Mohammad Husain v. Bashiran (1), mentioned above, would not apply. It has been held in the case of Rummur-ool-nissa Begum v. Mahomed Hussun (2): "At the same time we are satisfied that as the property in suit formed a portion of Umeda Begum's husband's estate, the whole of which was in her possession as security for her dowry the widow would have had the power to mortgage such hypothecated interest, and that during her lifetime the defendants, except by payment of the dowry, could not have released the mortgage." This case was quoted with approval in the case of Ali Baksh v. Allahdad Khan (3) where their Lordships observed: "the right is one which the widow secures as a creditor for her dower and it is one to continue holding until her debt is satisfied. Such a right is property and, prima facie, in the absence of any law or contract to the contrary, it is property which is both heritable and transferable." So that the argument of Mr. Iqbal Ahmad that the sale of her possessory rights by Musammat Azima, unaccompanied by a transfer of the dower-debt, was not warranted by law and, therefore, invalid, falls to the ground and on this basis alone the plaintiff's claim could not fail as being barred by the defendants having acquired adverse proprietary title in the property because of an invalid sale in their favour. Let us examine this position from another standpoint. It is now settled law that adverse possession can be acquired over limited rights, such as those of a mortgagee also, but adverse possession against a mortgagee would not of necessity be adverse to the mortgagor. So that the right which Rosai and his successors acquired by virtue of taking possession under the invalid deed, admitting it for the sake of argument to be invalid, would be the acquisition of the rights of Musammat Azima, but would not of necessity extinguish the rights of the other heirs.

There is nothing in the present case to show that there was anything which tended to destory the rights of the heirs. We have already said that the deed itself shows the nature of the possession of Kadir and Azima over the property which they purported to transfer, and the purchaser, Sheikh Rosai, could not be said to have been unaware as to the rights which he was purchasing. Article 134 of the Second Schedule of the Limitation Act would not, therefore, apply. This was so held in the case of Dirgpal Singh v. Kallu(4). We are, therefore, of opinion that the suit is not barred by limitation. The result of the view which we take in this case is that the plaintiff's suit must fail as regards 9/16th of the property in dispute. As to the remaining 7-16th of the property the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for possession on payment of such proportion of the dower-debt of Musammat Azima as might be chargeable against that share. The question of the amount of the dower-debt of Musammat Azima has not been tried by either of the Courts below. We, therefore, remit the following issue to the lower Appellate Court for trial,—What is the amount of the dower debt of Musammat Azima chargeable against the 7-16th share of the property transferred under the deed of the 7th February 1872? The parties are at liberty to produce such relevant evidence as they might think proper. The Court below is to send the evidence, along with its finding, at an early date. On receipt of the finding the usual ten days will be allowed for objection.

Landlord and tenant—Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), applicability of, to non-agricultural tenancy—Ejectment—Notice to quit—Matters to be ascertained—Rent paid annually—Tenancy, whether annual.

Where a tenancy is created for purposes other than agriculture, the tenant is not a cultivator and, consequently, not an under-raiyat or raiyat within the meaning of the Bengal Tenancy Act and his liability to ejectment does not depend upon the provisions of that Act. [p. 836, col. 1.]

In determining whether a notice served upon a tenant to quit is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff in an ejectment suit to a decree, the nature of the tenancy and whether it is a terminable tenancy must first be ascertained. [p. 836, col. 1.]

The mere fact that rent is paid annually is not conclusive proof that the tenancy is annual. [p. 836, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Panton, dated the 7the August 1919, in Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 1906 of 1918, against the decree of the District Judge of Murshidabad, dated the 8th June 1918, reversing that of the Munsif, 2nd Court at Jangipur, dated the 28th May 1917.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of PANTON, J.—(August 7, 1919).—This appellant, alleging that he is an occupancy raiyat of a certain holding, sued in the Court of the Munsif to eject the respondent, whom he described as an under-raiyat, from $10\frac{1}{2}$ kathas of bastu land forming part of this holding, after service of a notice under section 49 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The first Court gave the appellant a decree, but this decree has been set aside on appeal to the District Judge.

The learned Judge, in agreement with the Munsif, has found that the appellant is not a raiyat, but a tenure-holder, and on this finding is of opinion that the suit should fail.

The suit was brought upon the footing that the Bengal Tenancy Act applies. The lower Appellate Court found that such is the case, and that, for this reason also, the suit must fail, since the respondent is, in this view, a raiyat.

I am invited to send back the case for a further investigation of the question whether it is the Bengal Tenancy Act or Transfer of Property Act which governs the relationship of the parties. I think that this course is unnecessary. The appellant failed to make out the case set up by him in his plaint and the suit was rightly dismissed.

This appeal is dismissed with costs.

Babu Gopal Chandra Das (for Babu Nisith Nath Ghatak), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent from the judgment of Mr. Justice Panton in a suit for ejectment.

The claim was decreed by the Court of first instance That decree was reversed by the Subordinate Judge and his decree for dismissal of the suit has been maintained by the Court.

It is perfectly plain that the Courts below have got lost in a maze of phraseology which has no application to the admitted facts of this case. The defendant is not a cultivator and the tenancy was not created for agricultural purposes. Consequently, it cannot be maintained for a moment that the defendant is an under raiyat or a raiyat, within the meaning of the Bengal Tenancy Act, and his liability to ejectment does not depend upon the provisions of that Statute. The defence that the plaintiff had no title has completely failed and it has been found that the land is held by the defendant under the plaintiff. The plaintiff served notice to quit on the defendant on the 24th Magh, 1321 (7th February 1915) and asked the latter to vacate the land from the first day of the following year (14th April 1915). To determine whether, on this notice, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for ejectment, two questions have to be investigated, first, what is the nature of the tenancy held by the defendant; and, secondly, if it is a terminable tenancy has it been terminated by a legal notice to quit. As regards the nature of the tenancy, whether it is monthly or yearly, has to be considered. It is well settled that the mere fact that rent is paid annually is not conclusive proof that the tenancy is annual: Durgi v. Goberdhan Bose (1), Gobinda Chandra Saha v. Dwarka Nath Patita (2) and Aklu v. Emaman (3). The Court below will consequently investigate this matter first. If it is found that the tenancy was annual the notice was manifestly insufficient and the suit will stand dismissed. On the other hand, if it is found that the tenancy was monthly, the notice was ample and the suit will be decreed.

The result, is that the appeal is allowed, the decree made by Mr. Justice Panton in affirmance of that of the District Judge set aside and the case remitted to the Court of first instance to be re-tried, having regard to the above observations, on such evidence as the parties may find it necessary to adduce.

Costs will abide the result.

Mr. W. Wallach, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

GOKUL PRASAD, J.—This is a reference under section 51 of the Indian Income Tax Act, VII of 1918, by the Board of Revenue on the application of Messrs. A. John and Company, mill owners and merchants of Agra. In the course of the assessment proceedings the Assessing Officer held that the

JOHN & CO., In the matter of.

"annual value" of the business premises, that is those actually occupied by the mill, while being deducted from the profits of the business was to be assessed as income derived from house property.

The contention of the company was, that this sum which had been deducted according to the provisions of section 9, sub-section 2, clause (1) of the Act could not be re-assessed under section 8 as income derived from house property. The company went up in appeal to the Income Tax Commissioner. He came to the conclusion that the word "house property", used in the Act, was of much wider significance than the word "dwelling house," used in another section of the Act, and did include buildings like business premises, etc., and the annual value thereof was as such liable to assessment under section 5, clause (iii) of the Act. His reasons for arriving at this conclusion were, to use his own words—"At first sight this deduction for dwelling house in the latter part of section 9 (2) (i) seems to support petitioner's case, but a vital objection to the argument is that the Act has also allowed depreciation on the value of buildings which in time will recoup the total cost of the buildings to the owner. It also allows fire insurance and repairs. It may well be asked why should the State allow the annual value as a deduction and make a present of the allowance for depreciation and repairs? Obviously, there is a fallacy in the petitioners' argument, and the conclusion is that, just as the owner of the premises will be taxed when rent is deducted, so the owner will be taxed when the factory belongs to him.

"Stated in another way, the Act taxes all income unless it is specially exempted. The annual value of the factory represents income of the portion of capital locked up in factory premises which produces just as much as the machinery does."

And he further went on to say—

"Even if section 8 of the Act did not apply the amount would be liable to assessment under section 11 of the Act as income derived from other sources."

The Board of Revenue, however, was of opinion that it was a matter of considerable doubt whether mill premises could be treated as house property for the purposes of section 8. It goes on to say in its reference—

"8. The Chief Revenue authority, however, feels considerable doubt whether mill premises can be treated as house property for the purposes of section 8. In its view the whole tenor of that section concerns property of the nature of residential property, and the proviso itself reflects the rule, applicable to officials residing in houses constructed by the Government, that the rent shall not exceed ten per cent on their salary. To apply a ten per cent. limitation to a business like a jute or cotton mill is to subsidise business at the expense of the general tax-payer and it is very doubtful if such a course was contemplated. This view is supported by the rule made by the Government of India regarding section 24 (1) of Act II of 1886 in which it is said:—"The amount to be assessed under section 24, sub-section (1) of the Act on account of a building occupied by the owner thereof shall not in any case exceed ten per cent. of the aggregate income of the owner derived from all sources. It must not, however, be understood from this that a maximum of ten per cent of the aggregate income of the owner is to be assumed in every case as equivalent to the letting value of his house. The letting value should in all cases be ascertained on the best data available, in view of the circumstances of the locality in which the house is situated."

The Board of Revenue as Chief Revenue authority further held that the profits received from the occupation of a house by a company did not fall under Part D of Chapter III of Act II of 1886 (i. e. "other sources of income"), that section 24, falling as it did within part D, was not applicable, and that such profits were assessable under section 11 of the Act (i. e. "profits of companies").

The Chief Revenue authority is further supported in its view by the fact that clauses (iii) and (v) of section 8, and clauses (iv) and (viii) of section 9 (2), of the Act of 1918 deal with the same classes of expenditure, insurance premia and a charge of land revenue, thus implying that house property and business premises are in different categories, and by the differentiation in the incidence of local rates and municipal taxes [clause (viii) of section 9 (2)] which are fairly an item of expenditure in a business but are invariably held to fall on the owner of house property."

The questions referred to us by the Board for decision are :—

(1) Is the allowance on account of the annual value of business premises owned and occupied by an assessee given under section 9 (2) (i) of the Indian Income Tax Act, 1918, liable to assessment or not?

(2) If the answer to the foregoing is in the affirmative, is section 8 or section 11 applicable?

In arriving at a decision on these questions it is important to bear two things in mind, (a) that a fiscal Act has to be construed strictly: and (b) that we are here to carry out the provisions of the law and not to legislate or to consider what the law ought to have been.

As regards the applicability of section 8 of the Income-Tax Act, I have nothing to add to the reasons given by the Board of Revenue in its referring order that it does not apply to a case like the present. The only other section which could be said to be applicable is the omnibus section 11 of the Income Tax Act, but the difficulty in applying section 11 of the Act is that, where the law has made specific provision regarding a particular matter, it cannot be ignored. The omnibus rule comes into play only where the Legislature omits to make a provision for a particular contingency. It is, therefore, quite evident that, both, the general and the particular provisions cannot be applied together. They are mutually exclusive, and a general provision of the law cannot be applied on the ground that if the particular provision relating thereto is made applicable it would lead to anomalous results. During the course of a long argument advanced to us on behalf of the Company, a number of side issues were discussed which I deem unnecessary to consider in detail as they would tend to obscure the real issue. The point for consideration, put shortly, is whether the statutory deduction of the annual value of the business premises from the income of the business allowed by section 9 (2) (i) is liable to taxation under any other provision of the Act; or, in other words, can an amount expressly excluded from being taken into consideration in calculating the income derived from business for the purposes of the Income-Tax Act be included for such purposes under any other section? It is certainly an anomaly that a person carrying on a mill business in a rented house should be in a more unfavourable position than one who carries on the same business in his own house, and that, in the case of a rented house, the Government will be able to recover income-tax on the annual value of the premises but not so in the case of a person who owned both the mill and the premises. Supposing the profits, after paying the work expenses of the mill, excluding the rent thereof, came to Rs. 20 000, the tenant would have to pay income tax on Rs. 20,000 minus Rs. 5,000, the supposed amount of the annual rent, and the Government will realise its income tax on the Rs. 5,000, that is, the rent, from the owner; but if the owner himself owned both the business and the premises the Government would be getting income-tax on Rs. 20,000 minus Rs. 5,000, the annual value deducted under section 9 aforesaid, that is Rs. 15,000 only. This is a result which was possibly not contemplated by the framers of the Act but, as I have already stated above, we are here to interpret the law and not to act as legislators. I am distinctly of opinion that, having regard to the express provisions of section 9 which refers to income from business, we should not be justified in holding that the amount in dispute is chargeable, as income from other sources, under section 11 of the Income Tax Act. This provision has been newly added in the present Act and is apparently based on the provisions of the English Income Tax Act. Under that Act the owner is liable to pay income tax on such an amount under certain other provisions of the same Act, and it is quite possible that, whilst incorporating the former provision from the English Income-Tax Act, the framers of the Indian Income Tax Act inadvertently omitted to provide for the levying of income-tax on this amount. However, this is after all mere speculation, and, as I have said above, the amount in dispute is not liable to income-tax under either of the two sections 8 and 11 of the Income Tax Act. I would, therefore, answer the first question in the negative.

It is unnecessary to record a separate finding on the second question as it has already been discussed in connection with the first question.

PIGGOTT, J.—I agree that the assessee is not liable to pay any tax on what I may call the "nominal income," in respect of which this reference has been made, under the head of "income derived from other sources," by virtue of the provisions of section 11 of the Income Tax Act No. VII of 1918. The sum of money in question has been arrived at by the Income Tax Commissioner, working upon the definition of the expression "annual value" given in section 8 of the same Act. That definition is expressly limited to the purposes of section 8 and section 9 of the Act There is no warrant for applying that definition to the provisions of section 11 of the Act, or making use of it so as to create a so called item of income which the assessee is supposed to ha enjoyed by taking money out of one of his pockets and putting it into another. If, however, it had been necessary for me to decide this reference alone, I should not have felt it possible to return precisely the answer which has found favour with the majority of this Bench. Seeing that my difference of opinion can have no practical effect on the answer to be returned, I propose merely to indicate the opinion which has commended itself on a consideration of the arguments which have been addressed to us.

Under the former Income Tax Act, No. II of 1886, a firm of manufacturers carrying on business in buildings constructed by themselves found no provision in the law which authorised them to charge against the gross profits of their business any sum of money as representing, or forming an equivalent to, the rent which they would otherwise have had to pay to the owner of the premises. Consequently, the net assessable profits of the business were greater than they would otherwise have been by a sum of money representing, in a sense, the rent which the manufacturing firm were saved from the necessity of paying by reason of the fact that they had built their own factory. In this sense, it is true, as stated in the order of reference, that the extra profits enjoyed by a firm of manufacturers in virtue of their carrying on business in premises owned by themselves were assessed to income tax as the income of a company under section 11 of Act No. II of 1886. In the Act No. VII of 1918, which we are now considering, we find two changes made. By reason of a special proviso inserted in section 9 (2) (i) of this Act, an assessee who is carrying on businses in premises owned by himself is entitled to charge, as part of the expenses of his business, a sum equal to the annual value of those premises, the expression "annual value" being defined in the preceding section 8 of the Act. The other important change with which we are concerned is the enactment of the above mentioned section 8, which lays down that the annual value of house property is liable to pay income tax under the head of "income derived from house property," subject to certain conditions and deductions. One of these conditions is that an assessee occupying his own house property is only liable to pay the tax on five-sixths of the annual value. I agree generally with what Sir George Knox, J., has said regarding the danger of founding our decision in a matter of this sort on the provisions of the English Statute, but that Statute has been pointedly brought to our notice in the order of reference, and I think it is legitimate to consider such of its provisions as seem to have a direct bearing on the question now before us. There can be no doubt that, under the English Act, the assessee whose case is now before us could have claimed a deduction equivalent to the full annual value of these premises from the Assessing Officer who was drawing up an estimate of the annual profits of the business. On the other hand, the assessee, as owner of the premises, would have had to pay income tax on five-sixths, at least, of the annual value. We were informed in argument that under the English Act further deductions could be claimed by the assessee, thus making the sum, in respect of which he would be taxed, even less as compared with the sum which he was entitled to charge against his gross profits as part of the expenses of his business. We have not gone into this matter in detail and it is not of much importance. The point I wish to make is that, if there is room for the supposition that the changes introduced into the Indian Income Tax law by the passing of Act VII of 1918 were intended to bring the law in India into closer conformity with that in England, it does seem reasonable to take the changes effected by the passing of section 8, and by the insertion of the new provision in section 9 (2) (i), together, and thus to suggest the conclusion that the intention of the Legislature was to make a much slighter concession in favour of such an assessee than will result from the answer which we are returning to this reference, as a whole. If these premises fall within the meaning of the expression "house property" used in section 8, the result would be to give the assessee a deduction to the full amount of the annual value under section 9, but to assess him to income tax as a house proprietor in respect of five sixths of the said annual value. A number of reasons against adopting this view have been set forth in the order of reference and I cannot deny that they are entitled to considerable weight. To my mind, however, the issue always comes back to the plain question whether these factories or mills are or are not "house property" within the meaning of that nowhere defined expression as used in section 8 of the Indian Income Tax Act. The suggestion that the word 'house' always implies a building used for human habitation, or as the dwelling place of human beings, derives considerable support from a standard work, such as the Oxford Dictionary of the English language. There seems to me, however, much force in the argument pressed by the Income Tax Commissioner in connection with this very matter, to the effect that the expression 'house property' is in itself a wider one and is used in section 8 as meaning something more than the word 'dwelling house' in section 9 of the Act. Indeed, a good many of the reasons advanced in favour of limiting the expression 'house property' in section 8 of the Act to dwelling or residential houses seem to me to be met by the consideration that the business premises referred to in section 9 may, quite conceivably, include buildings such, for instance, as indigo vats or brick-kilns, which are certainly not "house property" in any sense of the term. It has to be noted, moreover, that the word 'house', when used in certain combinations, such, for instance, as "warehouse," "coffee-house" "play-house," undoubtedly includes buildings not used for human habitation. The difficulty which I have felt throughout is that, if a firm in the position of this assessee had been called upon for a return of its "house property" in or about the City of Agra, I think it would have been expected to include warehouses or factories as falling within the meaning of that expression. I should have been disposed, for these reasons, to answer the reference by saying that the annual value of these premises, to the extent indicated, is assessable to income tax under the provisions of section 8 of the Act. This difference of opinion on my part does not affect the answer which will be returned to the reference, and I admit the question to be one of considerable difficulty. If our decision has consequences not contemplated by the Legislature when Act No. VII of 1918 was passed, there can be no doubt that the responsibility must be laid to the account of the defective drafting of sections 8 and 9 and the failure to supply any definition of so crucial an expression as "house property."

KNOX, J.—At the request of Messrs. A. John and Co., Managing Agent of the Agra Spinning and Weaving Agency, Ld., a reference has been made to this Court under section 51 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The firm was assessed by the Collector of Agra as having an income liable to payment of tax of Rs. 4,00,930.

Among the items liable to payment of tax was one set out as House Property Rs. 59,548. The question for consideration is whether this item is liable to such payment. This figure is thus arrived at:—

| | | Rs. | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Business premises | ... | 59,537 | (i. e., 6 per cent. on cost of mill premises Rs. 9,92,293), |
| House property | ... | 11,920 | |
| | | 71,457 | |
| Less one sixth under section 8 | ... | 11,909 | |
| Balance | ... | 59,548 | |

Messrs. John and Co. objected to the inclusion of the annual value of the business premises, as section 9 (2) (i) of the Income Tax Act allowed a deduction of this sum to be made from the profits of the business. The Collector of Agra held that this sum, while deducted from the profits of the business under section 9 (2) (i), must be treated as income under another head, i. e., as house property.

The Income Tax Commissioner not only agreed with the Collector but went still further and held that, even if the items were not liable to assessment under section 8, they would be liable under section 11 of the Act.

The Chief Revenue Authority admits the existence of a doubt whether mill premises can be treated as "house property" under section 8 and has given, at considerable length, its reasons for holding this view.

Finally, it formulates the question for decision by this Court as—

(1) Is the allowance on account of the annual value of business premises owned and occupied by an assessee given under section

9 (2) (i) of the Indian Income Tax Act, 1918, liable to assessment or not ?

(2) If an answer to the foregoing is in the affirmative, is section 8 or section 11 applicable ?

The learned Counsel for Messrs. John and Co. contended that the allowance is not liable to assessment. He supported his argument by drawing analogy from the English Statute, under which income tax is assessed (8 and 9 Geo. V, Ch. 40) and upon which the fair presumption, he added, might be founded that the Indian Income Tax Act VII of 1918 was based, especially where it introduced differences from the Act previously in force. But, after having given full consideration to his arguments, I hold that such comparison and analogy is not firm ground for interpreting Act No. VII of 1918.

(1) The Statutes, 8 and 9 Geo. V, Ch. 40, consists of 239 sections, to which serveral Schedules are appended. I do not pretend to be familiar with its provisions or to have had the leisure to study it carefully.

(2) In important subject matters, notably, the nature of property in England differs from the nature of property in India. For these and other reasons, and bearing in mind that we are dealing with an Act imposing a pecuniary burden upon the subject, I think it fair to fall back upon the Indian Income Tax Act, 1918, itself.

While section 9 (2) (i) enacts that, in computing profits, allowance on account of the bona fide annual value of premises a special allowance shall, under certain circumstances, be made, it nowhere suggests that such allowance while remitted to a subject shall be burdened with a pecuniary obligation. Such procedure would in itself be strange, and if such a burden be contemplated we should expect to find clear and precise words imposing it. In this connection see Carr v. Fowle (1). A construction which would have the effect of a person liable to pay the same tax twice in respect of the same subject-matter would not be adopted unless the words were very clear. We have not been referred to such words. A suggestion was made that section 11 might contemplate the imposition of such a burden. But the language of the section clearly points in an opposite direction. There is no doubt as to the plain meaning of the words "if not included under any of the preceding heads."

There remains section 8, and the suggestion is that this allowance under consideration may and should be classed as "income derived from house property." House property is nowhere defined in this Act. The premises are used solely for business purposes and not for occupation as dwellings and I agree with the Chief Revenue Authority that they cannot be treated as house property.

I would, therefore, reply that, under the Act as it stands, the allowance on account of the annual value of business premises owned and occupied by the assessee is not liable to assessment at all.

By the Court.—Our answer, then, to the reference is that, as Act No. VII of 1918 now stands, the allowance on account of the annual value of business premises owned and occupied by the assessee is not liable to assessment at all. We grant the assessee's Counsel Rs 220 as costs in this and the connected reference the result of which is governed by this decision.

KIRANSASHI DEBI v. ANANDA CHANDRA.

Mr. Justice Newbould, dated the 27th May 1919, reported as 53 Ind. Cas 1004, in Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 180 of 1918, against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 1st Court, Hooghly, dated the 8th September 1917, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st Court, Hooghly, dated the 30th June 1915.

Babu Krishna Lal Banerjee (for Babu Kisori Lal Chatterjee), for the Appellant.

Dr. Dwarkanath Mitter and Babu Naran Chandra Kar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent from a judgment of Mr. Justice Newbould, in a suit for recovery of possession of what at one time constituted Chaukidari Chakran lands.

On the 20th May, 1806, one Chandra Mohan Banerjee, the predecessor in interest of the defendants, executed a patni kabuliyat in favour of Maharani Kamal Kumari of Burdwan. Under that document the patni was granted in respect of 17 villages for a premium of Rs. 10,000 and an annual rent of Rs. 12,687. The general words in the kabuliyat make it abundantly clear that all the lands included in the villages were intended to be demised to the patnidar. Prima facie, then, the Chaukidari Chakran lands, which, according to the decision of the Judicial Committee in Ranjit Singh v. Kali Dasi Debi (1) formed part and parcel of the permanently settled estate of the Zemindar, vested in the patnidar, subject to the rights of the Chaukidars. By a subsequent clause in the kabuliyat, specific lands were, however, excluded from the grant; these were the house, the garden and the tank which were at that time stated to be in the actual occupation of the Zemindar. Another parcel which had been dedicated to the worship of an idol was, in the same way, expressly excluded by another clause. There can thus be no doubt on the deed that the Chaukidari Chakran lands were transferred to the patnidar. When, however, the lands were subsequently resumed and settled by Government with the Zemindar, the latter granted a lease thereof to the present plaintiff, who seeks to recover possession from the representatives-in-interest of the original patnidar. The defendants resist the claim and urge that on resumption, the patnidar, by virtue of the putni contract, became entitled to hold possession of the lands.

The plaintiff relies upon a clause in the lease which entitles the Zemindar to appoint a Chaukidar, should there be a vacancy in the office of Chaukidar by reason of his dismissal, death or disappearance. In our opinion, that clause does not indicate that the Chaukidari Chakran lands were excluded from the putni lease. If, indeed, the lands were so excluded, it is inconceivable that a clause of this description should have been inserted; for, if the Chaukidari Chakran lands remained with the Zemindar, it would be superfluous to state that the Zemindar would be at liberty to fill up a vacancy in the office of Chaukidar. The view we take accords with that adopted in Nafar Chandra v. Bejoy Chand Mahatap (2), where an earlier decision of this Court in Girish Chandra Roy v. Hem Chandra Roy (3) followed.

We may add that the appellant has placed reliance upon what has been called the conduct of the patnidar. But it is well settled that the terms of an unambiguous document cannot be controlled by the conduct of the parties. As Lord Halsbury said in North Eastern Railway Co. v. Hastings (4), no amount of acting by the parties can alter or qualify words which are plain and unambiguous; though it is otherwise when we have to determine the true construction of an obscurely framed document: Hebbert v. Purchas (5). We hold, accordingly, that the view taken by Mr. Justice Newbould is correct and that his decree must be affirmed. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Muhammadan Law—Property acquired by one member of family—Presumption, whether acquisition out of joint funds—Arbitration—Estoppel—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 115.

Under the Muhammadan Law there is no presumption, in the absence of other evidence, that property purchased by one member of a family was purchased out of what was joint undivided property. [p. 843, col. 2.]

Two brothers of a Muhammadan family entered into a submission to arbitration for a division of the property left by their father to the exclusion of their mother. The final award approtioned the property to the brothers each of whom was to pay a maintenance allowance to the mother; the award was accepted by the brothers and was made a decree of Court On the death of the mother, one of the brothers claimed to recover his share of the property as his mother's heir:

Held, that he was estopped by his own proceeding in the arbitration from advancing his claim. [p. 844, col. 2]

Two consolidated appeals from two judgments and decrees, dated the 30th January 1913, of the Allahabad High Court (Sir Henry Richards, C. J., and Banerji, J.), which partly affirmed and partly reversed a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Cawnpore.

JUDGMENT.

LORD DUNEDIN.—Allah Bakhsh, a Muhammadan, died in 1863. He left a widow, Amir-un-nisa, and two sons, Ali and Wali, and three daughters. On his death, under Muhammadan Law, each son became entitled to 42/96ths of his property and his widow to 12/96ths. Wali being an infant of one year old, the whole properties were managed by Ali, whose name, along with that of his infant brother, was entered in the Government registers.

In 19.2, Wali being then past majority, a submission was entered into between the two brothers for a division of the property. An arbitration was accordingly held and the properties divided. The final award specified the names of the properties dealt with, and contained a statement that the properties were the whole properties which were subject to division and that nothing more fell to be divided. It apportioned the various properties nominatim to each son respectively, exhausting the whole list and added a maintenance allowance to be paid by each son to the mother in money. The award was signed by each of the parties and was made a decree of Court.

In 1904 Ali died. He left a widow, Zaitab, and two sons, Mohi-ud-Din and Moin-ud-Din, and other children who need not be specified by name. His mother, Amir-un-nisa, being still alive, she, by Muhammadan Law, became entitled to 7/96ths of Ali's property. In 1907 Amir-un-nisa died and her sole surviving son, Wali, became her sole heir.

The present suit was raised in 1908 by Wali against the family of Ali, and claimed—

(a) A half of four specified villages in his own right;

(b) Whether (a) was granted or not 12/96ths of the four villages as in right of his mother in respect of her right as widow to her share of the property of Allah Baksh;

(c) 7/9ths of three villages as in right of his mother in respect of her right to her share of the property of Ali;

(d) 12/96ths of the other properties belonging to Allah Bakhsh and dealt with in the arbitration;

(e) 7/96ths of the property of Ali as in right of his mother in respect of her succession to Ali.

It is convenient to deal with these claims separately.

(a) The four villages in question were purchased by Ali after his father's death but before the arbitration and were put by him into the name of his eldest son as a provision for him. Now to make out his claim to a share of these the plaintiff must show that the villages were either the property of Allah Baksh, which is impossible, as they were not purchased till after his death, or that they were purchased out of what was joint univided property. But, in the first place, as pointed out by the learned Subordinate Judge, there is no presumption in the case of a Muhammadan such as exists in the case of a Hindu joint family. The succession of a Muhammadan is an individual succession. Prima facie, therefore, in the absence of other evidence, property bought by Ali would be property bought with his own money. But there is much more than that. There is the arbitration, which recites that it dealt with all the property of Allah Baksh which fell to be divided, and specified the various elements of that property, and these villages are not mentioned. Both the learned Subordinate Judge and the Court of Appeal held this view, and their Lordships agree with them.

(b) The villages are, as stated, entered in the register as the property of Mohi-ud din. In order to get a right as in right of his mother, the plaintiff must, therefore, show that this transaction was benami. Now, there are concurrent findings of both Courts that it was not benami but was made as a provision for his eldest son, and it cannot be said that there is no evidence on which to base this finding. The plaintiffs, therefore, here again fail.

(c) The three villeges. There must be here made a further sub division between the case of one of the villages and that of the other two. The one was bought by Ali after the date of the arbitration and settled on his second son Moin-ud-din as a provision. The only question, therefore, as to this was whether this was benami. The Subordinate Judge and the Court of Appeal both found that it was clearly not. These concurrent findings end the matter. The other two villages are in a different position. They also were settled on Moin-ud-din by Ali, but they were villages which originally formed part of the state of Allah Baksh. In the arbitration they had been allotted to Wali, but they had become the property of Ali by exchange, he having given other villages to Wali. The Subordinate Judge thought that, though this also was not benami and consequently the claim for the 7/96ths as in right of the mother's succession to Ali was bad, yet that, as the mother was no party to the arbitration, her right to 12 96ths of these villages, and also to 12-96ths of the other properties dealt with in the arbitration—this being claim (d)—still survived and passed to Wali as her heir. He decreed accordingly. The Court of Appeal reversed this part of the decree. Their Lordships agree with the Court of Appeal. They consider that in this matter Wali is estopped by his own proceeding in the arbitration He received his full half of the whole properties belonging to Allah Baksh upon the footing of the exclusion of the mother, and entered into possession of his share. He cannot now be allowed to come back and say he will take as heir to his mother what was by his own act not allotted to her but was divided between himself and his brother.

(e) The plaintiff got a decree for 7/96ths of the property of Ali, but was not allowed immediate possession as the property was held by the widow Zainab in respect of a dower unpaid. The only question as to this, which is admitted to be otherwise correct, is as to the amount of the dower. As to this which is a pure question of fact, there are concurrent findings of both Courts.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty to dismiss the appeals with costs.

A suit to recover possession of land claimed by the plaintiff as raiyat or under-raiyat implies that the plaintiff was previously in possession and that he has been deprived of possession by the defendant. The mere fact, however, that he obtained a lease from the defendant but did not obtain possession does not amount to a dispossession such as would attract the operation of Article 3 of Schedule III to the Bengal Tenancy Act. Under section 185 (2) of that Act the period of limitation applicable to such a suit is that contained in Article 144, Schedule I, to the Limitation Act.

JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—This is an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent from the judgment of Mr. Justice Newbould, in a suit for recovery of possession of land.

On the 20th January 1909, the plaintiffs took a lease of 12 cottas of land from the defendants; they obtained delivery of possession of 7 cottas only, and the defendants, who had their dwelling-huts on the remaning 5 cottas, agreed to vacate that portion after three months. The defendants, however, failed to carry out the terms of the agreement and continued in occupation of the 5 cottas, notwithstanding the lease in favour of the plaintiffs. These facts have been established by the plaintiffs, but their suit has been dismissed as barred by limitation under Article 3 of Schedule III to the Bengal Tenancy Act. That Article provides that a suit to recover possession of land claimed by the plaintiff as a raiyat or an under raiyat must be instituted within two years from the date of dispossession. This plainly implies that, in respect of the disputed land, the plaintiff was previously in possession and that he has been deprived of possession by the defendant.

As was pointed out by this Court in Brojendra Kishore Roy v. Bharat Chandra Roy (1), the term "dispossession" implies the coming in of a person and the driving out of another from possession, while "discontinuance" implies the going out of the person in possession and his being followed into possession by another.

In the present case, the defendants never placed the plaintiffs in possession of the 5 cottas which is the subject matter of the litigation. Consequently, there was no dispossession, such as would attract the operation of Article 3 of Schedule III to the Bengal Tenancy Act. Section 185 (2) accordingly makes Article 144 of the Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act applicable, and the suit is in time, as it was instituted on the 20th May 1916, which is within 12 years from the date when the possession of the defendants became adverse, after the lapse of three months from the 20th January 1909. We cannot possibly accept the argument that there was 'dispossession' in law though not in fact, on the 20th April 1909, for this Court has emphatically discouraged recourse to the fiction of "constructive dispossession," which, however attractive, has tended to create much confusion; Sonatan Sheikh v. Chaku Sheikh (2), Basanta Kumari v. Nanda Ram (3), Rudra Narain v. Natabar Jana (4), Kedar Nath v. Mohesh Chandra (5).

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decrees of all the Courts are set aside and the suit is decreed with costs in all Courts.

JUDGMENT.

VISCOUNT CAVE.—These are consolidated appeals from the decree of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, dated the 13th September 1916, which reversed a judgment and three decrees of the Subordinate Judge of Partabgarh, dated the 9th September 1914.

The suits relate to lands in the Taluq of Dhangarh, in Oudh. Lal Sitla Bakhsh Singh was Taluqdar of the Taluq, and his name was entered in the fourth list prepared under section 8 of the Oudh Estates Act of 1869. He died in the year 1896 having survived his only son and his eldest grandson, and leaving him surviving his great-grandson, the appellant, Lal Jagdish Bahadur Singh, and three grandsons, the respondents, Babu Mahabir Prasad Singh, Babu Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh and Babu Sidhpal Singh.

Lal Sitla Bakhsh Singh, by his Will, dated the 30th August 1892, devised the Taluq to the appellant and appointed the appellant's mother to be his guardian and the respondent, Babu Mahabir Prasad Singh, to be manager and Sarbarahkar of the estate during the appellant's minority. Clauses 6 and 7 of the Will provided for the maintenance of the respondents and were as follows:—

"(6) That when Babu Mahabir Prasad Singh, Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh, Sidhpal Singh, uncles of Lal Jagdish Bahadur Singh, minor, separate themselves from him, they shall receive from Lal Jagdish Bahadur Singh, the owner of the estate, maintenance allowance as per following detail. The maintenance allowance should be allowed in the form of the grant of land of the entire village or a portion thereof, so that, after the payment of the Government revenue and 10 per cent. Taluqdari dues, maintenance allowances to the following extent be left over to the Guzara holders out of the gross rental of the village or the land, i.e., to the extent of Rs. 950 annually to Babu Mahabir Prasad Singh Rs. 700 to Sidhpal Singh and Rs. 400 to Babu Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh. In case of the Guzara holders' separation, the land or the entire village given to them shall not be interfered with by the proprietor of the estate except that he shall receive the Government revenue and 10 per cent. (his own dues). The responsibility, preservation and supervision of the boundary line and the Sewana and the compliance with Government orders shall rest with the Guzara-holders, the owner of the estate having nothing to do with the same. So long as Sidhpal Singh and Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh remain joint with Lal Jagdish Bahadur Singh, minor, the former may get Rs. 200 cash and the latter Rs. 100 annually, besides food and raiment, to meet their personal needs; and in case of separation, they will get the maintenance allowance mentioned above, and the cash allowance will be stopped.

"(7) That the maintenance allowance of the aforesaid Guzara-holders shall always continue without the power of alienation, generation after generation; but in case of there being no male issue to the Guzara-holder or children in direct line of descent from him, the maintenance allowance shall not devolve upon any heir under the Hindu Law or to any other person, irrespective of the fact that he is one of the Guzara-holders or not; rather the allowance, having been resumed, shall be included in the Taluqa in possession of the proprietor thereof though he may be lower in degree by descent."

The testator died, as above stated, in the year 1896, the appellant being then about nine years of age. The respondent Mahabir thereupon entered on the management of the estate in accordance with the directions of the Will, and retained such management until the year 1908, when the appellant attained the age of twenty one years. In the last mentioned year the appellant assumed possession and control of the estate, his uncles continuing to reside with him.

In the year 1910, when the appellant was about twenty-three years of age, disputes arose in the family, and it was determined that the respondents should live separately from him and should receive maintenance in the form of villages to be appropriated for that purpose under the Will. The appellant, to whom the Will gave the power and duty of selecting villages for this purpose, allotted to the respondent Mahabir the village of Miranpur, to the respondent Gajadhar three other villages, and to the respondent Sidhpal two other villages. Possession of the villages so allotted was given to and accepted by the three respondents who subsequently paid rent to the appellant for the allotted villages. Shortly afterwards, the respondents, who were desirous of being entered as proprietors of the villages allotted to them respectively, took proceedings for mutation of names. The appellant, who had no objection, petitioned that the mutation should be allowed "by virtue of the deed of Will," and on the 6th January 1911, he attended personally before the Tahsildar and made a statement in support of his petition. This statement, which shows the position then taken up by the appellant, was in the following terms:—

"In accordance with the condition of Lal Sitla Bakhsh Singh's Will, dated the 30th August 1892, I having given village Miranpur to Mahabir Prasad Singh, villages Nagiamau and Bhitari to Babu Sidhpal Singh, and Sarai Nain Kuar, Pura Kharagman, included in Pura Basdeo and Pura Chamela, Mahal of 9 annas share, to Babu Gajadhar Bakhsh, delivered possession to them. Mutation in their favour be effected separately according to their applications. I have no objection.

"Again stated—In the above-mentioned villages only under proprietary right was transferred to these Guzaradars. The superior right will remain vested in me, and I will be liable for depositing the Government revenue.

"The Guzaradars will have this right, generation after generation, but without any right of transfer. The mutation should be effected in the same manner."

Orders were accordingly made on the 17th February 1911, that mutation be made in favour of the several respondents "generation after generation, without any right of transfer, in lieu of maintenance allowance."

So far no difficulty had occurred; but unfortunately a question subsequently arose in the office of the Registrar as to the form in which the record should be made, and in connection with this question the appellant and Mahabir again attended before the Tahsildar on the 20th October 1911. At this meeting the appellant again affirmed that he "had given the village Miranpur as Guzara, generation after generation, without any right of transfer, according to the terms of the deed of Will executed by the late Lal Sitla Bakhsh Singh, Taluqdar," and stated the rental of the property allotted, with a view to the mutation being completed; but after this statement had been taken down Mahabir, for the first time, alleged that he had got the village Miranpur as a reward for his services during the Taluqdar's minority and not as Guzara under the Will. This claim, for which there was no justification, appears to have greatly irritated the appellant, who said that he would give nothing over and above the maintenance provided by the Will, and, afterwards, viz., on the 22nd November 1911, retaliated by applying for leave to withdraw the three applications for mutation of names. The Tahsildar, on the 24th November, refused this application and directed the mutation to proceed, adding that if the appellant was dissatisfied, the Civil Court was open to him. An application by the appellant to the Assistant Collector to set aside the registration was successful, but this decision was reversed by the Deputy Commissioner on appeal, and thereupon these suits were brought.

By the present suits the appellant, who was the plaintiff, claimed against each of his uncles possession of the villages allotted to him, alleging (1) that the rent of the villages greatly exceeded the allowances to which the respondents were entitled under the Will, and that the allotments and subsequent mutation of names had been obtained by the undue influence of Mahabir; and (2) that the transfer of the villages was void, as not having been made by registered deed. The Subordinate Judge, by whom the cases were heard, held that no registered deed was necessary, but that there had been undue influence, and accordingly decreed the plaintiff's claims for possession. On appeal to the Judicial Commissioner's Court, the finding as to undue influence was reversed and the three suits were dismissed. Thereupon this appeal was brought.

Their Lordships are satisfied that the plea of undue influence cannot be sustained. The appellant, at the time when he allotted the villages as maintenance to the respondents, was 23 years of age, was a man of some intelligence, and had for some years had the active management of his estates. The rental of the villages at the time of the trial somewhat exceeded the maintenance allowances fixed by the Will; but it was proved that there was not any substantial excess at the date of allotment, and it would not have been practicable to find villages producing the exact sums prescribed. It is admitted that the management of the estates by Mahabir from 1896 to 1908 was efficient and honest; and it is stated by the Judicial Commissioners that Counsel for the appellant admitted before them that there was no trickery and no deceit, and that all was honesty and loyalty up to the time of Mahabir's unfortunate outbreak on the 20th October 1911. The charge of undue influence completely breaks down.

The contention based on the absence of a registered deed depends on section 16 of the Oudh Estates Act. This section, as amended, is as follows:—

"No transfer, otherwise than by gift, of any estate, or of any portion thereof, or of any interest therein, made by a Talukdar or grantee, or by his heir or legatee, or by a transferee mentioned in section 14, or by his heir or legatee, under the provisions of this Act, shall be valid unless made by a registered instrument signed by the transferor and attested by two or more witnesses."

By section 2 of the Act "transfer" is defined as meaning an alienation inter vivos. It was held both by the Subordinate Judge and by the Appellate Court that section 16 had no application to this case, the title of the respondents depending on the Will, which was duly registered under section 13 of the Act, and the Judicial Commissioners gave the following reasons for their conclusion:—

"We are of opinion that this section has no application. Lal Jagdish Bahadur Singh received the estate under a Will which admittedly created a charge upon the estate: the Will ordered that, in the event of separation, certain complete villages and portions of land were to be given to the three uncles of the legatee, and that they were to receive such villages with a heritable and non-transferable right, in lieu of their maintenance. Had the plaintiff respondent proved dishonest and declined to make any allotment such as the Will provided, the appellants could have sued to enforce compliance with the provisions of the Will; and their suits would have been based, not on any title conferred, or promised to be conferred, by the respondent but upon a title arising out of the Will. In promptly and honourably carrying out the provisions of the Will of his great grandfather, the respondent was merely recognising the existing title of the others, and not conferring a new distinct title upon them: while those others, in accepting possession of their respective estates were relinquishing, for that consideration, the charge which existed in their favour upon the Taluqa as a whole. The true character of the transaction indeed was an arrangement between the various beneficiaries under the Will, an arrangement which it is the duty of the Courts to uphold and give full effect to."

In their Lordships' opinion this is the true view of the transaction. The respondents' right to maintenance out of the estate was conferred by the Will, which imposed on the Talukdar the duty of selecting the particular villages out of which the maintenance should be received. In making this selection, the Talukdar imposed no additional burden on the estate, but limited and defined, in accordance with the Will, the burden imposed by that instrument. The selection, once made and accepted, could not be disturbed either by the Talukdar or by the Guzara holders; and if it had been necessary to confirm it by a registered and attested instrument, it would have been the duty of the Talukdar to furnish such confirmation. But in their Lordships' opinion no such instrument was required, and the provisions of the Will, followed by the appropriation of villages and delivery of possession, vested in the Guzara-holders a good and sufficient title. The appellant has certainly no equitable claim to relief; indeed, it would be most inequitable if, after making the appropriation, and delivering possession and collecting rent upon the basis of the appropriation so made, he were permitted to repudiate the transaction and recover possession of the allotted villages. This contention, therefore, also fails.

Their Lordships will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that these appeals fail and should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Ramnad at Madura, in Original Suit No. 102 of 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. C. S. Venkatachariar, for the Appellant.—The Subordinate Judge ought to have given a mortgage and not a simple money decree. The whole of the property mortgaged was intended to be security. The question of value of any portion which gives jurisdiction to a particular Sub Registrar is immaterial. Even if the motive for its inclusion was to register the document in a particular Sub-District, it cannot be said to be in fraud or violation of the registration law. The Subordinate Judge has misunderstood the effect of the Privy Council decisions in Harendra Lal Roy v. Hari Dasi Debi (1) and Hari Ram v. Sheodayal Mal (2), See Sankaran Nambiar v. Narayanan Thirumumpu (3).

Mr. K. V. Krishnaswamy Iyer, for Respondents, relied on Harendra Lal Roy v. Hari Dasi Debi (1).

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal preferred by the 2nd plaintiff, who is also the legal representative of the 1st plaintiff, against the decree of the Subordinate Judge in a suit on a mortgage. The Subordinate Judge has given a simple money-decree holding that the hypothecation-bond was not duly registered and, therefore, was invalid in law. The 1st and fourth defendants executed the mortgage. The 2nd defendant is the undivided son of the 1st defendant, the 3rd defendant is the son of the 1st defendant's brother. But it is found that he was divided and, therefore, the mortgage will not bind him, and Mr. Venkatachariar, the learned Vakil for the appellant, has now sought to impeach that finding. Therefore, so far as that defendant is concerned, the decree will not bind him and his share in the property. The lower Court found that the consideration for the mortgage had been satisfactorily proved, although that appears to have been questioned as the main defence in the suit, and no argument has been addressed to us on behalf of the respondents against this finding of the lower Court.

The Subordinate Judge also found that the document was duly attested as required by law; that is to say, the attesting witnesses saw the execution of the document and subscribed their names as attesting witnesses. That finding has been sought to be re-opened before us by the learned Vakil for the respondents, but we have no hesitation in accepting the finding as correct. In our opinion the evidence of plaintiff's 2nd witness on the point is quite clear.

The Subordinate Judge, however, refused to give a mortgage-decree on the ground that a portion of the property, that is, 39 cents of land in Sittubotti village within the jurisdiction of the Sub-Registrar of Peraiyur, was inserted in the mortgage-deed with the intention of having the document registered at Peraiyur as it was not convenient to the parties to go to the Waltrap Sub Registrar's office on account of the weather and distance. He seems to be under the impression that, if parties to a mortgage-deed include certain properties as security for the money advanced but, primarily, in order to have the document registered by the Sub-Registrar within whose jurisdiction the property is situate, according to the law of registration the document must be held not to be duly registered, in accordance with the ruling of the Privy Council referred to in Harendra Lal Roy v. Hari Dasi Dabi (1). All that the Privy Council, however, decided in that case was that, if the parties to a document have entered certain properties which did not belong to the mortgagor and which they never intended to use as security, then such a fictitious entry would not validate registration by the officer in whose jurisdiction the property, as entered, is alleged to be situate. They do not lay down that if a certain property is included in the deed, mainly with the object of giving jurisdiction to the officer in whose jurisdiction it is situate, although the value of such properties may be very small, that would not satisfy the requirements of the law of registration. In fact, the ruling of the Judicial Committee in Hari Ram v. Sheodyal Mal (2) shows that registration in such circumstances would be entirely in accordance with law. They point out, that the smallness of the value of any item of property can make no difference in this connection, because the Act says that the parties can have the document registered within the jurisdiction of any Registrar where any portion of the property is situate. The recent ruling of this Court, to which one of us was a party, in Sankaran Nambiar v. Narayanan Thirumumpu (3) also bears out this proposition.

The Subordinate Judge seems to have confounded the question of the intention of making a certain property part of the security and the question of value of that property in proportion to the rest of the mortgage property. If the parties intended a particular property, however small in value as compared with the rest, to be part of the security, although the motive for its inclusion might be to have the document registered by a particular Sub-Registrar, that motive cannot, in any way, be said to be in fraud of, or in violation of the Registration Act.

As regards the facts of this case, the Subordinate Judge finds that Schedule I, containing 39 cents of land within the jurisdiction of Peraiyur Sub Registrar, was inserted in the document at the Registration office, and upon, that finding an argument has been addressed to us by the learned Vakil for the respondent that the document must be held to be invalid unless it was proved that there was a fresh execution and fresh attestation after the new insertion. The argument is that as such an insertion was material for the purpose of valid registration the execution and attestation prior to that insertion will not be in compliance with the requirements of the law of registration. This particular point is bare of authority and, we may observe, it was not raised either in the written statement or by the issues, nor at the time of the trial before the learned Judge, for nowhere in the judgment does he allude to this question. The question is not altogether free from difficulty. But it is not necessary for us to decide it, as we are unable to accept the finding of the Subordinate Judge on the evidence that the Schedule relating to 39 cents, of land in the Sittubotti village was written after the execution and attestation of the document. It is unfortunate that much of the evidence as to what happened is not available, owing to deaths of persons who played a part in the transaction. The 1st plaintiff himself had died before trial, so also his agent and the writer of the mortgage-deed. The evidence of P. W. No. 2 is to the effect that the clause, and the schedule relating to the land within the jurisdiction of Peraiyur Sub-Registrar, had already been written before the execution. The only thing against it is the appearance of the writing, which is undoubtedly in darker and fresher ink than the rest of the document. That, in our opinion, is not sufficient to throw suspicion on the evidence of P. W. No. 2. The Subordinate Judge, it seems to us, relied not only too much on the colour of the ink but also appears to have been influenced by the fact that only two Schedules are numbered on the margin instead of three, as comprising the mortgaged lands and villages, and also by the fact that 39 cents in the Settubotti village is not included in the total area given at the end of the Schedule.

As regards the first, the idea of the parties apparently was to indicate the two Sub-Registrar's districts in which the mortgaged lands were situate and not to numbers of the villages. As regards the total area, that only gives the area of land in the Watrap Sub Registry, for the area of the land in the Settubotti village had been already mentioned along with the description. In dealing with the evidence of the witnesses he was very much influenced by what is called intrinsic evidence in favour of subsequent interpolation. In our opinion, there is really nothing in the intrinsic evidence as furnished by the appearance of the document which necessarily leads to the inference that the entry in question was made after the execution of the document. On the other hand, it was the duty of the Sub Registrar, under section 20 of the Registration Act, to satisfy himself whether any interpolation had been made after the execution, and the fact that the Registrar did not make any note to that effect shows that he was satisfied that the writing in question existed before execution. We have considered the evidence in this connection. D. W. No. 4 undoubtedly suggests that Schedule 1 was interpolated after execution and so also the other witnesses on the side of the defendants. We prefer to accept the evidence of the plaintiff's witness No. 2 which undoubtedly is in accordance with the ordinary presumption of law. In Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume X page 411, paragraph 739, it is laid down "any alteration, erasure, or interlineation appearing on the face of the deed is presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have been made before the execution of the deed." Similarly, in Norton on Deeds, page 26 "Alterations and interlineations in a deed are presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have been made prior to the execution." This presumption of law is strengthened in this case by the omission of any note by the Registrar that, at the time the document was presented to him for registration, it contained any interpolations made after execution. We, therefore, hold that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in finding that Exhibit A was not properly and validly registered.

Only one other thing remains, namely, that of interest. The original rate of interest stipulated for was $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In default of payment of interest on the specified dates, the defendants agreed to pay 12 per cent. compound interest. The Subordinate Judge has given a decree for $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. simple interest without giving any compensation as agreed in case of default.

We allow $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. compound interest from the date of default. The plaintiff is entitled to interest at this rate up to the date of payment. The decree of the Subordinate Judge will be modified in accordance with the above finding. The respondents Nos. 1, 2 and 4 will pay the costs of the appellant throughout. The appellant, who has failed as against the 3rd respondent, will pay his costs of this appeal. Time for redemption will be extended to six months from this date.

JUDGMENT.

LORD BUCKMASTER —By an agreement, dated the 31st May 1911, David Sassoon & Co., Limited, appointed Raghumull and Juggomull of the firm of Madhoram Hurdeodas, to be their brokers for the sale and purchase of sugar for a period of five years from the date of the agreement, or for such further period as should mutually be agreed, unless the agreement should be sooner determined under provisions therein contained.

The agreement contained a clause for the appointment of under-brokers in the following terms:—

"2. The brokers shall employ such under-brokers as shall or may be necessary or required for the purposes of the company's sugar business, and that such under-brokers shall be under the control of the company, and the brokers shall from time to time be responsible for the fidelity of the said under brokers and dismiss such of the under-brokers as the company may direct, and employ others in their place."

And also a clause imperfectly worded, but intended to provide, and accepted by all parties as providing, that the agreement might be ended by three calendar months' notice on either side.

On the 8th June 1911, the brokers so constituted entered into an agreement with the appellants constituting them under-brokers. This agreement recited the original contract, and effected the appointment by clause 1 in these words:—

"The brokers shall appoint and do hereby appoint the under-brokers and the under-brokers do hereby agree to become and act as under brokers for the said brokers for the sale and purchase of sugar in respect of all contracts to be entered into by them for or on behalf of the said David Sassoon & Co., Limited, under the aforesaid agreement and during the subsistence of the said agreement or for such further period as the said brokers and the said company may further extend."

The other clauses of the agreement followed the provisions of the earlier contract, but contain nothing material to the real question raised by this appeal.

On the 27th April 1912, Juggomull died and, though it was at first urged that the contract was thereby ended, this point was decided against the respondent and was not raised before their Lordships. On the 24th May 1912, a new agreement appears to have been made between Sassoon & Co. and the respondent, the surviving partner of the firm of Madhoram Hurdeodas, but it has not been produced and their Lordships are ignorant of its contents.

On the 12th August, 1912, the appellants' contract was summarily ended by the respondent on the ground of alleged breaches of duty. On the 2nd December 1912, a new agreement was entered into between David Sassoon & Co., and the respondent, differing in many material respects from the contract of the 31st May 1911, and appointing the respondent broker in the same business for a new period of five years on different terms. On the 28th July 1913, the appellants instituted the proceedings, out of which this appeal has arisen, claiming against the respondent damages for wrongful termination of their agency, and accounts both under the written contract and under a verbal contract, to which further reference will be made.

A defence was put forward that the dismissal was justified, but this wholly failed, and the only questions now open are (1) the measure of damages for wrongful dismissal, (2) as to the basis on which accounts ought to be directed for monies due under the contract, and (3) a subsidiary claim in respect of the verbal agreement.

The questions are independent of each other and need separate consideration.

With regard to the damages, the learned trial Judge thought that, the period of the contract being five years, the appellants were entitled to compensation for loss of employment upon that footing and the gross earnings being admitted as Rs. 30,000 for the 14 months during which the agreement had run, after allowing for expenses, he fixed Rs. 1,000 a month as the average net profit. This would produce Rs. 46,000 for forty six months the residue of the term, and from this sum he deducted Rs. 16,000 as prospective earnings, leaving Rs. 30,000 as the estimated damages. It is true that in arriving at this conclusion he had not before him the critical contract of the 2nd December 1912, and it is impossible and unnecessary to conjecture why a document of such importance was not forthcoming at the trial. It was, however, produced before the High Court on appeal, who held that this contract necessarily ended the original appointment of the respondent's firm as brokers to Sassoon & Co., and that with its termination the appellants' contract likewise came to an end. They altered the rate of prospective earnings per month to Rs. 1,250, and allowed this sum up to the 2nd December 1912.

In so deciding, their Lordships think, that the High Court rightly interpreted the bargain between the parties and awarded damages on the correct principle.

The contract of the 8th June 1911 was a contract which, in its very nature as well as in its terms, depends for its existence and duration upon the continuance of the contract of the 31st May 1911. It is stated that the appointment it effects is for "the sale and purchase of sugar in respect of all contracts to be entered into by them, [i. e., the respondent] on behalf of the said David Sassoon & Co. Limited, under the aforesaid agreement, [i. e., the agreement of the 31st May 1911] and during the subsistence of the said agreement, or for such further period as the said brokers and the said company may further extend," Even apart from the words which make the period of the contract identical with that of the covering authority, the mere fact that the appointment is an appointment to act as brokers in respect of the sugar bought and sold by the respondent's firm under their bargain with Sassoon & Co., shows that when they ceased to buy and sell sugar in accordance with that authority, the appointment of the appellants as brokers would necessarily come to an end.
